"But there is another matter. Somebody has said that this covenant was an arrangement for the dominance of Great Britain, and he based that upon the fact that in the assembly of the council there are six representatives of the various parts of the British Empire. There are really more than that, because each member of the assembly has three representatives, but six units of the British Empire are represented, whereas the United States is represented as only one unit. Let me be didactic for a moment and tell you how the league is constituted. There is an assembly made up of three members of each of the constituent States, and there is a council. The council is the only part of the organization that can take effective action. No powers of action rest with the assembly at all, and it is only in the assembly that the British Empire is represented as consisting of six units—for brevity's sake I will say as having six votes. There is only one case when the assembly can vote at all, and that is when the council refers a matter in dispute to the assembly, in which case the assembly can decide a matter by a majority, provided all the representatives of the nations represented in the council vote on the side of the majority. So that, alike in the assembly and in the council, the one vote of the United States is an absolute veto. I have said that there was only one case upon which the assembly could vote, and that is literally true. The council of the league is made up of one representative from each of the five principal allied and associated powers; that is to say, the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, and four other nations selected by the assembly of the league. The present members are Spain, Brazil, Belgium, and Greece. In the council is vested all the active powers of the league. Everything that is done by the league is formulated and passed by the council, and a unanimous vote is required. Indeed, my fellow citizens, that is the only thing that seems to me weak about the league; I am afraid that a unanimous vote will sometimes be very difficult to get. The danger is not action, but inaction. The danger is not that they will do something that we do not like, but that upon some critical occasion they will not do anything. If there is any weakness in it, it is the safeguard that has been thrown around the sovereign power of the members of the council. If a matter in controversy arises and one of the parties demands that it shall be taken out of the council and put into the assembly, the council is obliged so to refer it, but in the final vote in the assembly the affirmative action is not valid unless all the States represented in the council shall also in the assembly vote in the affirmative. As we can always veto, always offset with one vote the British six votes, I must say that I look with perfect philosophy upon the difference in number.

"The justification for the representation of more than one part of the British Empire was that the British Empire is made up of semi-independent pieces, as no other Empire in the world is. You know how Canada, for example, passes her own tariff law, does what she pleases to inconvenience the trade of the mother country. Canada's voice in the assembly is merely a debating force. The assembly is a great discussing body. It is a body in which some of the most valuable things that the league is going to do can be done, for I want to ask you, after you have read article 10 again, to read article 11. Article 11 makes it the right of any member of the league, however weak and small, to call attention to anything, anywhere, that is likely to disturb the peace of the world and to draw it into debate, draw it into the open, draw it where everybody can get the facts and talk about it. It is the only time, my fellow countrymen, in the history of the world when weak and oppressed and restive peoples have been given a hearing before the judgment of mankind. Nothing is going to keep this world fit to live in like exposing in public debate every crooked thing that is going on. If you suspect your friend of being a fool, the best way you can prove it or disprove it is by advising him to hire a hall. Then your judgment will be confirmed or reversed by the popular verdict. If you think a policy is good, you will venture to talk about it. If you think it is bad, you will not consent to talk about it. The league of nations takes everything into the public. It makes every secret agreement of every kind invalid; it provides that no treaty hereafter shall be valid unless registered with the secretary of the league and published. And after bringing everything into the open, it authorizes the assembly to discuss anything that is likely to affect the peace and happiness of the world. In every direction you look the safeguards of this treaty are thrown around those who are oppressed.

"Unless America takes part in this treaty, my fellow citizens, the world is going to lose heart. I can not too often repeat to you how deep the impression made upon me upon the other side of the water is that this was the Nation upon which the whole world depended to hold the scales of justice even. If we fail them, God help the world! Then despair will ensue. Despair is just at the door on that side of the water now. Men do not hope in Europe as they hope in America. They hope tremblingly. They hope fearfully. They do not hope with confidence and self-reliance as we do on this side of the water. Everywhere in Europe there is that poison of disorder and distrust, and shall we take away from this unsteady world the only thing that reassures it? If we do, then where is the boasted independence of America? Are we indeed independent in our life of the rest of the world? Then why did we go into the war? Germany had not directed her efforts immediately against us. We went in because we were partners with mankind to see that an iniquity was not practiced upon it. You know how we regard the men who fought the Civil War. They did the greatest thing that was to be done in their day. Now, these boys here, and the others like them, have done the greatest thing that it was possible to do in our day. As their fathers saved the Union, they saved the world, and we sit and debate whether we will keep true and finish the job or not! My friends, that debate can not last one minute longer than the moment when this country realizes what it means. It means that, having sent these men to risk their lives and having sent some, whose mothers' hearts can count, to die in France, in order to redeem the world, we, in cool debate, in distant assemblies, say we will not consent that the world should reap the fruit of their victory! Nothing less than that hangs in the balance. I am ready to fight from now until all the fight has been taken out of me by death to redeem the faith and promises of the United States.

"I leave the verdict with you, and I beg, my Republican fellow citizens, that you will not allow yourselves for one moment, as I do not allow myself for one moment, as God knows my conscience, to think of 1920 when thinking about the redemption of the world. I beg that you will cut that 'but' out of your sentences, and that you will stand up, as you are entitled to stand up by the history of your party, and say, 'I am a Republican and therefore I am for the league of nations.' I do not admit the indictment which has been brought against the Democratic Party, but I do admit the distinguished history of the Republican Party; I do admit that it has been the creator of great constructive policies, and I should be very sorry to see it lose the prestige which it has earned by such policies. I should be very sorry to have any man feel that there was any embarrassment in supporting a great world policy because he belonged to a great constructive party, and that party a party of America—the constructive force in the world, the people who have done the most advanced thinking in the world, and the people who, God helping them, will lead and save the world."

THE PRESIDENT AT STADIUM, TACOMA, WASH., SEPTEMBER 13, 1919.

"My friends and fellow citizens, it is very delightful to find myself in this beautiful spot and very thrilling to find myself surrounded by so great a company of my fellow citizens. I can not in these circumstances make you a speech, but I can say something from my heart. I can say that I am profoundly glad to see you and profoundly touched by a welcome like this. I want to express my particular interest in this charming circle of school children, because one of the thoughts that has been most in my mind recently is that we are making decisions now which will mean more to the children than they mean to us and that as we care for the future generations we will be careful to make the right decisions as to the policy of the United States as one of the factors in the peace of the world. I give you my most cordial greeting and my most profound thanks for this generous welcome."

THE PRESIDENT AT ARMORY, TACOMA, WASH., SEPTEMBER 13, 1919.

"Mr. Mayor, Mr. Chairman, your excellency, my fellow countrymen, it is with very great pleasure that I find myself in your presence. I have long wanted to get away from Washington and come into contact with the great body of my fellow citizens, because I feel, as I am sure you feel, that we have reached one of the most critical periods in the history of the United States. The shadow of the war is not yet lifted from us, my fellow countrymen, and we have just come out of the depths of the valley of death. I thought that it might be useful if this morning I reminded you of a few things, lest we forget. It is so easy, with the strong tides of our life, to be swept away from one situation into another and to forget the real depths of meaning which lie underneath the things that we are merely touching the surface of. Therefore I thought it would not be impertinent on my part if I asked permission to read you the concluding passage of the address in which I requested the Government of the United States to accept Germany's challenge of war:

"'We shall fight,' I said, 'for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts, for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as will bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free. To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and the happiness and the peace which we have treasured. God helping her, she can do no other.'

"That is the program we started out on. That is the program which all America adopted without respect of party, and shall we now hesitate to carry it out? Shall we now falter at the very critical moment when we are finally to write our name to the standing pledge which we then took? I want to remind you, my fellow citizens, that many other nations were put under a deeper temptation than we. It would have been possible for little Belgium at any time to make terms with the enemy. Belgium was not prepared to resist. Belgium knew that resistance was useless. Belgium knew that she could get any term of advantage from Germany she pleased, if she would only submit, and at the cost of everything that she had Belgium did nothing less than underwrite civilization. I do not know anywhere in history a more inspiring fact than that. I have seen the fields of Belgium. I have seen great spaces swept of cities and towns as clean as if there had never been anything there except piles of stone; and, farther in, in that beautiful country, the factories are standing, the houses there, but everything that could be useful taken out of the factories; the machinery taken out and shipped to Germany, because Germany feared the competition of the skillful Belgians, and where it was too bulky to take away it was destroyed under the direction of experts—not broken to pieces, but the very part that made it impossible to use it without absolutely destroyed. I have been over great plants there that seemed to the eye to have much of the substantial machinery left, but experts showed me that it could never work again. Belgium lies prostrated because she fulfilled her pledge to civilization. Italy could have had her terms with Austria at almost any period of the war, particularly just before she made her final stand at the Piave River, but she would not compound with the enemy. She, too, had underwritten civilization. And, my friends, this passage that I have read you, which the whole country accepted as its pledge, is an underwriting of civilization.

"In order to let you remember what the thing cost, just let me read you a few figures. If I did not have them on official authority I would deem them incredible. Here is what the war cost. These figures do not include what the different powers loaned each other; they are direct war costs:

"It cost Great Britain and her dominions $38,000,000,000; France, $26,000,000,000; the United States, $22,000,000,000; Russia, $18,000,000,000; Italy, $13,000,000,000; a total, including Japan, Belgium, and other countries, of $123,000,000,000. It cost the Central Powers: Germany, $39,000,000,000; Austria-Hungary, $21,000,000,000; Turkey and Bulgaria, $3,000,000,000; a total of $63,000,000,000. A grand total of direct war costs of $186,000,000,000—an incredible sum—to save civilization. Now, the question is, Are we going to keep it saved? The expenditures of the United States were at the rate of $1,000,000 an hour, including the nighttime, for two years!

"The battle deaths—and this is the cost that touches our hearts—were: Russia, 1,700,000; Germany, 1,600,000; France, 1,380,000; Great Britain, 900,000; Austria, 800,000; Italy, 364,000; the United States, 50,300 dead. A total for all belligerents of 7,450,200 men dead on the field of battle! Seven and a half million! The totals for the wounded are not obtainable at present, but the number of torn and wounded for the United States Army was 230,000, excluding, of course, those who were killed. The total of all battle deaths in all the wars of the world from the year 1793 to 1914 was something under 6,000,000; in all the wars of the world for more than 100 years fewer men died than have been killed upon the field of battle in the last five years. These are terrible facts, my fellow citizens, and we ought never to forget them. We went into this war to do a thing that was fundamental for the world, and what I have come out upon this journey for is to ascertain whether the country has forgotten it or not. I have found out already. The country has not forgotten, and it never will permit any man who stands in the way of the fulfillment of these great pledges ever to forget the sorrowful day when he made the attempt.

"I read you these figures in order to emphasize and set in a higher light, if I may, the substitute which is offered to us, the substitute for war, the substitute for turmoil, the substitute for sorrow and despair. That substitute is offered in the covenant of the league of nations. America alone can not underwrite civilization. All the great free peoples of the world must underwrite it, and only the free peoples of the world can join the league of nations. The membership is open only to self-governing nations. Germany is for the present excluded, because she must prove that she is self-governing; she must prove that she has changed the processes of her constitution and the purposes of her policy; but when she has proved these things she can become one of the partners in guaranteeing that civilization shall not suffer again the intolerable thing she attempted. It is not only a union of free peoples to guarantee civilization; it is something more than that. It is a league of nations to advance civilization by substituting something that will make the improvement of civilization possible.

"I call you to witness, my fellow citizens, that our present civilization is not satisfactory. It is an industrial civilization, and at the heart of it is an antagonism between those who labor with their hands and those who direct labor. You can not compose those differences in the midst of war, and you can not advance civilization unless you have a peace of which you make the peaceful and healing use of bringing these elements of civilization together into a common partnership, in which every man will have the same interest in the work of his community that those have who direct the work of the community. We have got to have leisure and freedom of mind to settle these things. This was a war against autocracy; and if you have disorder, if you have disquieted populations, if you have insurgent elements in your population, you are going to have autocracy, because the strongest is going to seize the power, as it has seized it in Russia. I want to declare that I am an enemy of the rulership of any minority, however constituted. Minorities have often been right and majorities wrong, but minorities cease to be right when they use the wrong means to make their opinions prevail. We must have peaceful means; we must have discussion—we must have frank discussion, we must have friendly discussion—and those are the very things that are offered to us among the nations of the world by the covenant of the league of nations.

"I can not too often remind my fellow citizens of what the real heart and center of that covenant is. It lies in the provisions by which every member of the league—and, mind you, that means every great nation in the world, except, for the time being, Germany—solemnly engages never to go to war without first having either submitted the subject to arbitration—in which case it agrees to abide absolutely by the verdict—or submitted it for discussion to the council of the league of nations, laying all the documents, all the facts, before that council; consenting that the council shall publish all the facts, so as to take the world into its confidence for the formation of a correct judgment concerning it; it agrees that it will allow six months for the deliberation of the council upon the facts, and that, after those deliberations are concluded, if the advice of the council is not acceptable, it will still not go to war for three months after the rendering of that opinion. In other words, we have the pledge of all the nations of the world that they will sit down and talk everything over that is apt to make trouble amongst them, and that they will talk it over in public, so that the whole illuminating process of public knowledge and public discussion may penetrate every part of the conference. I believe, for my part, that that is a 99 per cent insurance against war. I take it you want some insurance against war rather than none, and if it is not 99 per cent, I dare say you would like 10 per cent. You would like some insurance rather than none at all, and the experience of the world demonstrates that this is an almost complete insurance.

"My fellow citizens, imagine what would have happened if there had been a league of nations in 1914. What did happen was this: Some time after the Crown Prince of Austria had been assassinated in Serbia, after the world had begun to forget even so tragical an incident, the Austrian Government was prompted by the Government at Berlin to make that the occasion for war. Their thought was, 'We are ready. The others are not. Before they can mobilize, before they can bring this matter even under discussion, we will be at their gates. Belgium can not resist. We have promised, solemnly promised, not to cross her territories, but promises are scraps of paper. We will get across her territories into France before France can mobilize. We will make that assassination a pretext.' They therefore made unconscionable demands of Serbia, and, notwithstanding the fact that Serbia, with her sense of helplessness, practically yielded to all those demands, they would not even tell the world that she had yielded; they went on with the war. In the meantime every foreign office was telegraphing to its representative at Berlin, begging that there might be an international conference to see if a settlement could not be effected, and Germany did not dare sit down in conference. It is the common judgment of every statesman I met on the other side of the water that if this thing had been delayed and discussed, not six months, but six days, it never could have happened.

"Here we have all the Governments of the world agreeing to discuss anything that is likely to bring about war, because, after that famous article 10 there is an article 11—there are 26 articles altogether, although you are not told about any of them except article 10—and article 11 says that it shall be the friendly right of any member of the league, big or little, to bring to the attention of the league—and, therefore, to the attention of the world—anything, anywhere, which is likely to disturb the peace of the world or to disturb the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends. Wherever there are oppressed nations, wherever there are suffering populations, wherever there is a smoldering flame, the trouble can be uncovered and brought to the bar of mankind, and the whole influence of public opinion the world over will be brought to bear upon it. It is the greatest process of international conference and of international discussion ever conceived, and that is what we are trying to substitute for war. That is what we must substitute for war.

"Then, not in immediate connection with the league of nations covenant but in a later part of the treaty, there is what I have ventured to call the Magna Charta of labor. There is the provision for the constant regular international discussion of labor problems, no matter where they arise in the world, for the purpose of lifting the whole level of labor conditions; for the purpose of safeguarding the health of women and of children, for the sake of bringing about those international comities with regard to labor upon which the happiness of mankind so much depends. There is a heart in the midst of the treaty. It is not only made by prudent men but it is made by men with hearts under their jackets. I have seen the light of this thing in the eyes of some men whom the world deemed cynical. I have seen men over there, whose emotions are not often touched, with suffused eyes when they spoke of the purposes of this conference, because they realized that, for the first time in the history of mankind, statesmen had got together, not in order to lay plans for the aggrandizement of governments but in order to lay plans for the liberation of peoples; and what I want everybody in every American audience to understand is this: The first effective impulse toward this sort of thing came from America, and I want to call your attention to the fact that it came from some of the very men who are now opposing its consummation. They dreamed the dream that has now been realized. They saw the vision 20, 25, 30 years ago which all mankind are now permitted to see. It is of particular importance to remember, my fellow citizens, at this moment when some men have dared to introduce party passion into this question, that some of the leading spirits, perhaps I may say the leading spirits, in the conception of this great idea were the leading figures of the great Republican Party. I do not like to mention parties in this discussion. I hope that there is not a real thoughtful, conscientious person in the United States who will determine his or her opinion about this matter with any thought that there is an election in the year 1920. And, just because I want you to realize how absolutely nonpartisan this thing is, I want you to forget, if you please, that I had anything to do with it. I had the great privilege of being the spokesman of this splendid Nation at this critical period in her history, but I was her spokesman, not my own, and when I advocated the things that are in this league of nations I had the full and proud consciousness that I was only expressing the best thought and the best conscience of my beloved fellow countrymen. The only things that I have any special personal connection with in the league of nations covenant are things that I was careful to have put in there because of the very considerations which are now being urged. I brought the first draft of the covenant of the league of nations over to this country in March last. I then held a conference of the frankest sort with the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate. They made a number of suggestions as to alterations and additions. I then took all of those suggestions back to Paris, and every one of them, without exception, was embodied in the covenant. I had one or two hard fights to get them in.

"You are told, my fellow citizens—it is amazing that anybody should say it—that the covenant does not satisfactorily recognize the Monroe doctrine. It says in so many words that nothing in that covenant shall be construed as impairing the validity of the Monroe doctrine. The point is that up to that conference there was not a nation in the world that could be induced to give official recognition to the Monroe doctrine, and here in this great turn of the tides of the world all the great nations of the world are united in recognizing the Monroe doctrine. It not only is not impaired but it has the backing of the world. And at every point where suggestions were made they were accepted; and the suggestions came for the most part from the Republican side of the committee. I say that because I am particularly interested, my fellow citizens, to have you realize that there is no politics in this business, except that profoundly important politics, the politics of civilization. I have the honor to-day of speaking under a chairman who, I understand, is a member of the Republican Party, and every meeting that I have spoken at on this trip, so far as I remember, has been presided over by a Republican. I am saying these things merely because I want to read the riot act to anybody who tries to introduce politics.

"Some very interesting things happened while we were on the other side of the water. One of the most distinguished lawyers in the United States, Mr. Wickersham, of New York, who was the Attorney General in Mr. Taft's Cabinet, came over to Europe, I am told—I did not see him while he was over there—to oppose the things that he understood the American peace commission was trying to accomplish, and what happened to Mr. Wickersham? He was absolutely converted, above all things else, to the necessity for a league of nations not only but for this league of nations. He came back to the United States and has ever since, in season and out of season, been preaching in public advocacy of the adoption of this covenant. I need not tell you of the conspicuously fine work which his chief, Mr. Taft, has been doing in the same cause. I am very proud, my fellow citizens, to be associated with these gentlemen. I am very proud to forget party lines, because there is one thing that is so much greater than being a Republican or a Democrat that those names ought never to be mentioned in connection with, and that is being an American. There is only one way to be an American, and that is to fulfill the pledges that we gave the world at our birth, that we have given the world at every turn in our history, and that we have just now sealed with the blood of some of our best young men.

"Ah, my fellow citizens, do not forget the aching hearts that are behind discussions like this. Do not forget the forlorn homes from which those boys went and to which they never came back. I have it in my heart that if we do not do this great thing now, every woman ought to weep because of the child in her arms. If she has a boy at her breast, she may be sure that when he comes to manhood this terrible task will have to be done once more. Everywhere we go, the train when it stops is surrounded with little children, and I look at them almost with tears in my eyes, because I feel my mission is to save them. These glad youngsters with flags in their hands—I pray God that they may never have to carry that flag upon the battle field!

"There have been, if I may make a slight digression, some very amusing incidents on this journey. At Billings a number of boys were chasing the train as it pulled slowly out with flags and yelling all sorts of pleasant things to their friend "Woody." On this occasion one youngster in his enthusiasm insisted that I should take his flag and he handed it up to me. The boy next to him did not have a flag and he looked a good deal disconcerted for a moment, but then he put his hand in his pocket and said, 'Here, I will give you a dime.' I would like to believe that that dime has some relation to the widow's mite—others gave something; he gave all that he had. After all, though that is merely a passing incident, it is illustrative of the spirit of this country, my fellow citizens. There is something in this country that is not anywhere else in the world. There is a confident looking forward to better times. There is a confidence that we can work out the most difficult problems. There is none of that heavy, leaden discouragement that rests upon some other countries. Have you never crossed the sea in times of peace and noticed the immigrants who were going back to visit their folks, and then, on the return voyage, the immigrants who were coming in for the first time—the extraordinary contrast in the appearance of the two groups? The group going out, having felt the atmosphere of America, their faces bright, a sort of a sense of initiative about it, having been freed to be men and individuals; and those coming back, bearing all sorts of queer bundles, looking a bit anxious, just a little doubtful of the hope with which they are looking forward to the new country. It is the alchemy, the miracle of America, and it is the only country in the world, so far as my observation goes, where that miracle is wrought, and the rest of the world knows that. The rest of the world implores America's aid—not her material aid; they are not looking for our dollars; they are not looking for our guns. They are saying, 'Show us the road that led you out of the wilderness and made you great, for we are seeking that road.' Now that the great treaty of peace has established the oppressed peoples of the world who were affected by this treaty on their own territory, given them their own freedom, given them command of their own affairs, they are looking to America to show them how to use that new liberty and that new power.

"When I was at that wonderful stadium of yours a few minutes ago, a little child, a little girl in white, came and presented me with some kind of a paper—I have not had time read it yet—from the Poles. I dare say that it is of the sort that I have received a great many of—just an expression of a sort of childlike and pitiful thanks that America assisted to free Poland. Poland never could have freed herself. We not only tore Germany's hands away from where she meant to make ravage of the rights of the others, but we took those old peoples who had been under her power before and said, 'You could not free yourselves, but we believe in liberty. Here is your own land to do with as you please.' I wish that some of the men who are opposing this treaty could get the vision in their hearts of all it has done. It has liberated great populations. It has set up the standards of right and of liberty for the first time, where they were never unfurled before, and then has placed back of them this splendid power of the nations combined. For without the league of nations the whole thing is a house of cards. Just a breath of power will blow it down. Whereas with the league of nations it is as strong as Gibraltar. Let them catch this vision; let them take in this conception; let them take counsel of weeping mothers; let them take counsel of bereaved fathers who used to have their sons at their sides and are now alone; let them take counsel of the lonely farms where there used to be a boy to help the old man and now he can not even get a hired man to help him, and yet he is trying to feed the world; let them realize that the world is hungry, that the world is naked, that the world is suffering, and that none of these things can be remedied until the minds of men are reassured. That is the fundamental fact, my fellow citizens.

"If I wanted to have a joint debate with some man who wanted to put our part in this business down on the lowest possible level of how much money we were going to make out of it, I could silence him by showing that so long as the world is not reassured its industries will not begin again, that unless its industries begin again, there will be nothing to pay for anything with, that unless its industries begin again there will be no market for the goods of America, and that we will have to rest content with our domestic markets at the very time when we had enlarged our enterprises in order to make peaceful conquest of the world. The very processes of war have driven our industries to a point of expansion where they will be chilled and ruined if they do not presently get a foreign outlet. Therefore, on the lowest basis, you have got to guarantee and underwrite civilization or you have ruined the United States. But I do not like to talk about that side of it. I believe in my heart that there is hardly a man in America, if you get really back of his superficial thoughts, who is not man enough to be willing to make the sacrifice to underwrite civilization. It is only sacrifice that tells. Don't you remember what we used to cry during the liberty loans, 'Lend until it hurts. Give until it hurts.' When I heard, in some Western States, that people drew their savings out of banks that were giving them 4 per cent on the savings and invested them in the first liberty loan that was to yield them 3½ per cent, I said to myself, 'That is America.' They were helping the Government at a sacrifice. They were not thinking of the dollars. They were thinking of the dignity and might and majesty and destiny of the United States, and it is only that vision, my fellow citizens, that will ever lift us out of the slough in which men now are wading.

"It is a pitiful spectacle that the great bodies of our fellow citizens should be arrayed against each other. One of the most startling things that I ever realized was, months and months ago, when I was trying to moderate and assist in settling some of the difficulties between the railroads and their employees. I asked the representatives of the railway brotherhoods to come to the White House, and I asked the presidents of the great railway systems to come to the White House, and I found that each side had a profound suspicion of the other, that the railway presidents were not willing to trust what their men said and the men were not willing to trust what the railway presidents said. When I took over the railroads in the name of the Government, I said to a group of fine-spirited men, a group of railway presidents, who were trying to unify the administration of the railroads for the purposes of the war—I said, smilingly, but with a little sadness, 'Well, at any rate, gentlemen, these men will trust me, and they do not trust you.' I did not say it with pride; I said it with sorrow. I did not know whether I could justify their trust or not, but I did know that I was willing to talk things over with them whenever anything was the matter, and that if we were equally intelligent and equally conscientious, we could get together whenever anything went wrong. I could not help suspecting that this distrust, this mutual distrust, was the wedge that was being driven into society, and society can not live with a great wedge at the heart of it. Society can not get on industrially or socially with any such wedge driven into its heart. We must see that the processes of peace, the processes of discussion, the processes of fairness, the processes of equity, the processes of sympathy penetrate all our affairs. I have never known anybody who had a good cause who was unwilling to discuss it. Whenever I find a man standing out stiffly against consulting with the other side, I know his case is bad. The only unconquerable thing in the world is the truth, and a man who has the truth on his side need not be afraid of anybody. You know what witty and eloquent old Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes once said. He said, 'You needn't fear to handle the truth roughly; she is no invalid.' The truth is the most robust and indestructible and formidable thing in the world. There is a very amusing story of a distinguished lawyer at Charleston, S. C., of a very much older generation than ours, who was followed out of the court one day after losing a civil suit by his client, who abused him. He called him a thief and a liar and everything that was disagreeable, and Mr. Peddigrew paid not the slightest attention to him, until he called him a Federalist, and then he knocked him down. A friend said to him, 'Why, Mr. Peddigrew; why did you knock him down for that? That was the least offensive thing he said.' 'Yes, damn him,' Peddigrew said, 'but it was the only true thing he said.'

"Now, the nations of the world have declared that they are not afraid of the truth, that they are willing to have all their affairs that are likely to lead to international complications brought into the open. One of the things that this treaty incidentally does is absolutely to invalidate all secret treaties. Everything is to be open. Everything is to be upon the table around which sit the representatives of all the world, to be looked at from the point of view of everybody—the Asiatic, the African, the American, the European. That is the promise of the future; that is the security of the future. I hope that no attempts will be made to qualify or embarrass the great process which is inevitable, and I confidently predict that some day we shall look back with surprise upon the fact that men in America, above all places, should ever have hesitated to do this great thing.

"It has been a privilege, my fellow citizens, to make this simple presentation of a great theme to you, and I am happy in carrying away with me recollections of the generous response you have made to a plea which I can only characterize as a plea which has come from the heart of a true American."

THE PRESIDENT AT HIPPODROME, SEATTLE, WASH., SEPTEMBER 13, 1919.

"Mr. Spangler, ladies, and gentlemen, it was agreed that I should make no address on this occasion, and I am not going to inflict upon you anything that can bear so dignified a name, but when Mr. Spangler asked me if I would extend a word of greeting to you I at once thought of the wonderful greeting that you and your fellow citizens have extended to me, and it would indeed be ungracious if I did not say how much I have appreciated your welcome and how delightful it is to be associated with you even for a few hours in this great city of Seattle.

"I have been in Seattle before, when I attracted less attention. I admired the city then, as I admire it still, and I could see it better then than I have seen it to-day. To-day I had too much of an escort to be really able to see the new features of the city with which I was not familiar. I was reminded of some of our experiences on the other side of the water, when we had to be careful not to let anybody know we were coming to a particular place for fear we would be escorted by so many persons that we would not see the place; and I have found in Washington that I am not to see the interesting things in Washington until my term is over, because all the officials in public buildings feel it necessary to escort me all over the buildings, and I either see the things that I did not care to see, because they insist upon it, or I see nothing.

"But, jesting aside, by fellow citizens, it was very delightful to see so many friendly faces on these beautiful streets. What I liked about it was not so much the cheers as the facial expressions that accompanied the cheers. They made me feel really welcome, and I could only fancy and hope that it was the reflection in their faces of the way I felt toward them. I suppose that a man in public life must renew himself constantly by direct contact with his fellow citizens, get the feel of the great power of opinion and of sentiment in this country, and nothing else heartened me so much as I have crossed the continent as to feel the uniformity of impulse and sentiment from one ocean to the other. There is no essential division in the thought or purpose of the American people, and the interesting thing to me is their steadiness. No amount of debate will set them off their balance in their thinking, because their thinking is based upon fundamental impulses of right, and what they want to know is not the difficulties but the duties ahead of them, and if you point the duties out to them they have a contempt for the difficulties. It is that consciousness which I have so often gained in moving from one part of this beloved country to another that makes me so profoundly proud to be an American. It was not, indeed, my choice to be an American, because I was born here, and I suppose that I can not ascribe any credit to myself for being an American; but I do claim the profoundest pleasure in sharing the sentiments and in having had the privilege for a few short years of trying to express the sentiments of this free Nation, to which all the world looks for inspiration and leadership.

"That is the dominating thought that I have. I will not say the dominating thought; it is the controlling knowledge that I have, for I learned to know on the other side of the water that all the world was looking to us for inspiration and leadership, and we will not deny it to them."

COAL-MINING SITUATION.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, on yesterday I presented and had read into the RECORD a letter from the president of the Pennsylvania Coal & Coke Corporation. I then stated that I would have read for the information of the Senate the demands made by the bituminous coal miners to the mine operators. I now send to the desk the report of the scale committee of the United Mine Workers of America, and I ask that it be read in connection with the letter which I send to the desk, and also the reply of the mine operators to the mine workers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA
COAL PRODUCERS' ASSOCIATION,
Altoona, Pa., September 24, 1919.

Mr. T. H. WATKINS,
910 Whitehall Building, New York.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed herewith find copy of report of the scale committee of the United Mine Workers convention at Cleveland, Ohio, which was adopted yesterday. The adoption of this report, in my opinion, precludes all hope of averting a nation-wide strike in the bituminous, and possibly the anthracite, coal industry.

This demand includes $8 a day for six hours; 60 per cent increase in all tonnage, yardage, and dead-work rates; elimination of the automatic penalty clause; and establishment of a weekly pay day.

You will note by the terms of the proposed demands that the scale committee representing the United Mine Workers of America has no power to negotiate an agreement, but must reconvene the convention which adopted these demands for ratification.

I am also inclosing copy of the nationalization plan adopted Saturday.

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES O'NEILL,
General Secretary.

REPORT OF SCALE COMMITTEE OF UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA.

To the Twenty-seventh Consecutive Constitutional and Fourth Biennial Convention of the United Mine Workers of America.

GREETINGS: We, your scale committee, to whom has been delegated the duty of drafting a proposed wage scale, herewith submit for your consideration and acceptance the following report:

First. We recommend that this report be accepted as a substitute for all wage-scale resolutions that have been presented to the convention.

Second. We recommend that this convention demand a 60 per cent increase to be applicable to all classifications of day labor and to all tonnage, yardage, and dead-work rates throughout the central competitive field.

Third. We recommend that this convention demand that all wage agreements that are negotiated to replace existing agreements shall be based on a six-hour work day, from bank to bank, five days per week.

Fourth. That all day labor shall be paid time and a half for overtime and double time for all work done on Sundays and legal holidays.

Fifth. That all agreements entered into by the United Mine Workers of America shall have incorporated therein a provision providing for a weekly pay day.

Sixth. That all double-shift work on the coal shall be abolished except as may be necessary for development and ventilating purposes, and development for increased tonnage shall not be regarded as being a reason for double-shift work, it being understood that this rule shall not be applicable to new mines that are in the process of development.

Seventh. That no automatic penalty clause shall be written into any agreement entered into by the United Mine Workers of America.

Eighth. That all internal differences not covered by joint interstate agreement shall be referred back to the respective districts for adjustment.

Ninth. That all contracts in the bituminous field shall be declared as having automatically expired November 1, 1919, and that no sectional settlement shall be allowed; and new contracts must run concurrently for a period of two years in all bituminous districts under our jurisdiction.

Tenth. That agreements negotiated for outlying districts shall be retroactive and become effective on the date upon which the agreement for the central competitive field becomes effective.

Eleventh. That no agreement for the central competitive field shall be concluded until after this convention has been reconvened and the agreement has been ratified by the reconvened convention, which reconvened convention shall also define a policy to be applicable to outlying districts, and that the reconvened convention shall be held in Indianapolis, Ind., on such date as may be designated by the resident international officials.

Twelfth. We recommend that in event a satisfactory wage agreement is not secured for the central competitive field before November 1, 1919, to replace the one now in effect, that the international officials be authorized to, and are hereby, instructed to call a general strike of all bituminous miners and mine workers throughout the United States, the same to become effective November 1, 1919.

Thirteenth. That this convention go on record as favoring the ratification of the wage demands made by the anthracite miners in their tri-State convention, which was held in Wilkes-Barre, Pa., from August 10 to 23, inclusive, and that we pledge to the anthracite mine workers our power and influence in aiding them to the fulfillment of their demands.

(Signed by District Presidents.)

NATIONALIZATION.

This plan for nationalization of coal mines was adopted by delegates to the United Mine Workers' convention Saturday, September 20:

"Coal mining is a basic industry, indispensable to the economic life of the Nation and to the well-being of the Nation's citizens.

"The all-important coal resources of our country are owned and controlled by private interests. Under the prevailing system of private ownership coal is mined primarily for the purpose of creating profits for the coal owners. The production of coal under this system is characterized by an appalling economic waste.

"The incomparable natural resources of America, and particularly those of timber and coal, are being despoiled under a system of production which wastes from 33 to 50 per cent of these resources in order that the maximum amount of dividends may accrue to those capitalists who have secured ownership of these indispensable commodities.

"OWNERSHIP.

"We hold that the coal supply of our Nation should be owned by the Commonwealth and operated in the interest of and for the use and comfort of all of the people of the Commonwealth.

"Countless generations of men and women will doubtless follow us, and the American people of this generation owe a solemn duty to them in protecting with zealous care and conserving with wise administration those great treasures that a bounteous nature has bestowed upon us in such generous measure.

"Our coal resources are the birthright of the American people for all time to come, and we hold that it is the immediate duty of the American people to prevent the profligate waste that is taking place under private ownership of these resources by having the Government take such steps as may be necessary providing for the nationalization of the coal-mining industry of the United States.

"PRIVATE RIGHTS.

"Under private ownership, where production is conducted for private gain, the spirit of the times seems to be 'After us the deluge.'

"This must be supplanted by a system where production will be for use and the common good, and economic waste will give way to conservation of the Nation's heritage in the interest of posterity.

"We, the United Mine Workers of America, in international convention assembled, representing the workers who have their lives and the welfare of their dependents invested in the coal mines of our country, do therefore resolve:

"That we demand the immediate nationalization of the coal-mining industry of the United States.

"That we instruct our international officers and the international executive board to have a bill prepared for submission to Congress containing the following provisions:

"'1. That the Government, through act of Congress, acquire title to all coal properties within the United States now owned by private interests by purchasing said properties at a figure representing the actual valuation of said properties as determined upon investigation by accredited agents of the Federal Government.

"2. That the coal-mining industry be operated by the Federal Government and that the mine workers be given equal representation upon such councils or commissions as may be delegated the authority to administer the affairs of the coal-mining industry, authority to act upon the question of wages, hours of labor, conditions of employment, or the adjudication of disputes and grievances within the industry.

"3. Realizing as we do that the masses of the American people, while they have been dispossessed of their right of ownership to the coal and other natural resources upon which their well-being depends, still own and control the Government of the United States whenever they care to exercise their power in the matter; and realizing that the success of our effort to secure nationalization of the coal-mining industry depends upon our ability to convince a majority of the American people of the justice of this proposal, we herewith further instruct our international officers and international executive board to use their influence to bring our demand for nationalization to the attention of the American people and to endeavor to secure the cooperation and support of every progressive force and every liberal, fair-minded individual with a regard for our duty to posterity and a belief in the principle of common ownership of our national resources, to the accomplishment of this end.

"PLUMB PLAN.

"We further instruct our representatives to urge in the coming conference with the representatives of the railroad workers' unions a working alliance for the purpose of securing the adoption of the Plumb plan for nationalization of railroads as the initial step in the fight for the principle of nationalization, with the understanding that such alliance will continue to press the issue with unabated vigor until the principle of nationalization has been extended to embrace the coal-mining industry of the Nation.

"And be it further resolved that our organization, for the reasons set forth above, carry its fight for nationalization of mines into the Dominion of Canada and throw its influence wherever possible behind our members in Canada to the accomplishment of that end."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] is very anxious to get his banking bill up; and I ask that the reply of the operators to the demands of the United Mine Workers be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPLY OF THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE BITUMINOUS COAL MINE OPERATORS TO THE DEMANDS OF THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE MINERS OF THE CENTRAL COMPETITIVE FIELD.

BUFFALO, N. Y., September 29, 1919.

We have carefully considered the demands and position of the mine-workers' representatives, transmitted to us in writing by Acting President Lewis on September 26. Our reply and position are as follows:

Purpose of conference—this conference was called at the request of the miners—"To negotiate a contract to be effective upon the expiration of the present agreement."

Present agreement: The present wage agreement, modifying and extending the scale contract of April 1, 1916, runs "during the continuation of the war, and not to exceed two years from April 1, 1918." It was executed by the accredited and duly authorized representatives of both operators and miners on October 6, 1917, at Washington, D. C., under the supervision and with the participation of United States Fuel Administrator H. A. Garfield, representing the President of the United States, acting under provisions of the Lever Act, a statute still effective. At that time it was definitely understood that "the continuation of the war" would be until formal proclamation of peace by the President of the United States. That agreement is therefore in full force and effect until such proclamation, unless terminated by its expiration on March 31, 1920.

The operators are here for the purpose of negotiating a contract to be effective immediately upon the legal expiration of the present contract, to prevent unsettlement of the industry and hardship to the public during the busy winter months should peace be proclaimed prior to April 1, 1920, and the present agreement be thereby suddenly terminated.

DEMANDS OF THE MINERS.

Your acting president, Mr. Lewis, has transmitted to us, and moved the acceptance of, a list of demands. These demands are radically extravagant and manifestly impossible of acceptance. In addition to which they indicate (1) a disregard by the United Mine Workers of America of their obligations under an existing contract solemnly entered into and still in force; (2) a complete lack of authority on your part to negotiate as provided and intended by the call; and (3) include an autocratic notice that unless we accept these demands you are instructed to call a general strike of all bituminous coal miners and mine workers of the United States on November 1.

Passing for the moment the arbitrary and wholly un-American way in which we are asked to act without regard to our contract rights or to public welfare, and with the unqualified strike order as an implied threat, let us review briefly the more important of your demands.

(1) In place of the existing 8-hour day, 6-day week, you demand a 6-hour day from "bank to bank" five days per week, which result in only 25 hours or less of actual work per week, and which, with no double shifting of working places or productive machinery as also demanded, would be a reduction of possible productive effort to practically one-half of present and altogether reasonable standards, with resulting increase in costs. Such a demand can not be entertained. National necessity demands the greatest possible production of essential commodities.

(2) You demand a 60 per cent increase in wage scale, time and one-half for over time, and double time for legal holidays and Sundays. Acceptance of these demands, with the indirect increases inherent to other items of your demands, would more than double the already high cost of producing coal, with consequent large direct and indirect additions to the cost of living of every citizen and a demoralization and prostration of the industry. Such wage increases are impossible, and their attempted enforcement would react with great harm equally on the Nation and on the individual miners you represent.

(3) You demand that no automatic penalty clause be written into any agreement entered into by the United Mine Workers of America. The present automatic application of penalty clauses, applying both to operators and to miners, and by the Government made a requirement contingent to the Government approval of our Washington agreement, is an outgrowth of the inability of union officials to prevent illegal strikes in violation of their orders or contract obligations. The provision has been effective and present conditions of unrest and radicalism make such policing power in the hands of the responsible officials of the contracting parties more than ever imperative. Such penalty clauses contain no terrors for those who in good faith abide by their self-made agreements.

(4) You demand a change from the long-established customs of having wage agreements expire in the spring, when there is least danger and inconvenience to the public, to an expiration November 1, which is the time of maximum demand for coal. You demand other items, none of which have apparent constructive merit but all of which tend to increase cost and decrease production. We must also dismiss these points as undesirable.

POSITION OF THE OPERATORS.

The operators have sent their accredited representatives to this conference with full power to negotiate a contract as provided by the call. We regret to find that the miners convention from which you come has failed to vest in you corresponding power and discretion. With your authority apparently limited to a presentation of the excessive demands above set forth and to reconvene your convention or execute your instructions to call a general strike November 1, we are faced with the alternative of granting your demands in full or of requesting you to go back for authority to negotiate with us in conformity with the call.

The operators hold that no abrogation of the existing contract can be had prior to its legal termination, except by the mutual agreement of all parties thereto, the operators, the miners, and the Government. We are ready and willing to negotiate a new contract to succeed at its legal expiration the contract now in effect, but we must insist that such negotiation be entered into in a spirit of reasonableness and that the representatives of the miners be vested with their usual discretionary power to really negotiate. Only under such conditions is it possible to reach a prompt and definite conclusion and to preserve the principles of collective bargaining.

The operators come to this conference with a consciousness of the more than usually grave responsibilities resting upon them because of their duty to cooperate in the processes of post-war adjustments with which the Nation is confronted. They expected the miners to approach these important negotiations in the same spirit. But with your hands tied by the nature of your instructions, and a strike threat your only impelling argument, we ask you if there is any possibility of securing results by continuing our present conference under such limitations.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE FOR THE OPERATORS.
THOMAS T. BREWSTER, Chairman.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement in regard to the coal situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, some weeks ago the Interstate Commerce Committee was instructed by the Senate to make an investigation of the coal situation in the country, with a view to ascertaining whether there would be sufficient coal for the needs of the country during the coming winter, and also to ascertain the reason for the sustained increased price of coal. In an effort to study this situation the committee called before it many of the mine operators, the representatives of the miners, the coal companies, the coal associations, and the agencies of the Government that had to do with this industry. The effort made by the committee was not a sensational one, for publicity, but an honest effort to see if some improvement could be brought about in the situation.

We found that there was a shortage of production; that unless something was immediately done undoubtedly there would be a shortage of bituminous coal during the coming winter. We found that the anthracite situation was in much better shape; that there was sufficient production, and the distribution was practically up to the average of previous years. But in the bituminous situation we found that, owing to the shortage of cars at many of the mines, due to the fact that there had been during the summer no market, the purchasers of coal had not bought from the mines, the mines had been idle, and the production was considerably behind the average of previous years.

We called the Director General of Railroads before us, and pointed out to him the situation. He stated that many of the cars that he had had under his control needed repairs; that they had felt, in view of the fact that there was no market, that they could postpone the repair of those cars, but that he realized that it was necessary, if a proper supply of coal was to be produced for the coming year, to do something; and he asked the committee to ascertain the amount of bituminous coal needed for consumption during the coming year.

We made an effort to ascertain that, but found that the agency of the Government, the Geological Survey, which had furnished statistics to the Fuel Administration during the war, had ceased to function, owing to the fact that the Congress had failed to appropriate a sum sufficient to carry on that work. However, a haphazard estimate was made, and it was practically concluded that it was necessary to supply 11,000,000 tons per week in order to meet the approximate needs of the country from now until the 1st of April.

The committee suggested to the various mine operators who were producing coal that they forward, through the committee, by telegram, reports of car shortages; and hundreds of telegrams were sent to the committee, and we sent them to the Director General, and he allocated cars to those mines, as far as he could, without interfering with the regular traffic of the transportation lines. He did more than that. He sent the wooden cars and the smaller cars back to their roads, utilizing them there for other traffic—the carrying of building materials, cinders, and road material—and directed the larger hopper cars to the mines. The result was that whereas in the latter part of August the production from the mines had been about 8,000,000 tons per week, it rose, I think, about a week ago, to nearly eleven and a half million tons, showing that cooperative effort had produced results.

We investigated the anthracite situation and found that the shortage of cars did not exist in that industry; that there were sufficient cars. We also found that the independent operators, who had asked 75 cents advance arbitrarily on anthracite coal, had a reason for doing so. There are 100,000,000 tons of anthracite produced in the country annually and consumed by the public. Seventy-five million tons of that are produced by the coal-mining roads, the roads that operate coal mines and run their railroads in connection with those lines. The independent operators are the operators that own no mines, but lease from landlords coal-mining properties. They produce 25,000,000 tons per year. They lease these mines from the landlords; and of their production of 25,000,000 tons, 20,000,000 are under lease, under royalties. These royalties have generally been at the rate of an average of 37 to 45 cents a ton, as nearly as I can remember the figures; but the leases are limited to 15 years, and they have been expiring, and the landlords have been asking increased royalties up to 28 per cent of the price of the coal at the mines.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this applies only to anthracite coal?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Anthracite only. This increases the price approximately $1.25 paid for royalties by the lessees of these mines; and therefore the independent operators ask 75 cents more per ton for their anthracite coal by reason of that condition.

In the bituminous coal industry the country uses practically 500,000,000 tons during the coal year. That is approximately from the 1st of September to the 1st of April. Last year we produced 579,000,000 tons. So accurate was the estimate of the Geological Survey that they estimated the production at 585,000,000 tons, and 579,000,000 tons of bituminous coal were produced. That is the principal industry of the country, upon which all of the industrial vitality of the country depends. It is utilized largely for industrial purposes, although a considerable portion is used for domestic purposes; and it is extremely important to the country not only that that coal should be produced but that it should be properly distributed, and that the miners should continue at work, for if there is a cessation in any way the industries of the country will be paralyzed.

We have estimated that the country will consume this year 500,000,000 tons; and in our cooperative effort with these various agencies of the Government we have tried to see that the cars shall be allocated to the mines in order that the coal may be moved. We have said to the operators, "This investigation will be carried further. We are going to investigate the prices, and we are going to recommend through some agency of the Government that the facts needed by the Government and the Congress for its information shall be compiled and procured"—facts tending to show the needs of the transportation to carry the coal, the needs of the consumers, and how much coal is needed. I feel that the committee should recommend that these mine operators publish every month in a bulletin, for the information of the public, the price of the coal at the mines; not only that but that the Federal Trade Commission or some other agency should investigate costs of production; not only that but that this bureau or agency should have the authority to inquire of the wholesaler and the retailer the price he is charging for purveying that coal.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. For some considerable time the Bureau of Mines published such information as the Senator now speaks of, but the appropriation to continue that work was omitted from the last general appropriation bill. Has the Senator some views to express upon the advisability of continuing that service?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I believe that the research conducted by the various bureaus of Government should be continued, because Congress can not legislate in this great problem unless it has the information. I think the Bureau of Mines should continue the work of investigating the coal deposits and the exhaustion of those deposits entirely separate from the statistics compiled by the Geological Survey. I think that the work of the Geological Survey in compiling statistics of the production at the mines and also the consumption of coal should be continued. I have an amendment to offer to the deficiency appropriation bill providing $40,000, in order that the Geological Survey may carry on that work. I am in favor of the Bureau of Mines carrying on their investigations. The Fuel Administration were enabled to estimate the needs of the country through the investigations of the Geological Survey and distribute the coal throughout the country, not only supplying the needs of this country but also the needs of our Allies during the war. The Government appropriated $400,000 for that purpose. This year, when it was just as important, when we were coming out of the war, when we were endeavoring to sustain the prosperity of the country, Congress refused to grant the estimate made by the Geological Survey of $40,000 to carry on the work.

I agree with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that the work of the Bureau of Mines should be carried on. Not only that, but the Federal Trade Commission, who have been investigating the cost of production, should be allowed to continue their work, so that Members of Congress, who must legislate for this important industry, may have information on which to base legislation. When you realize that 33⅓ per cent of all the traffic carried by the railroads of the country is coal, it is quite important that Congress should have information on this important question.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator a moment ago referred to the question of car shortage. The Senator has not stated, I believe, what number of new cars were provided by the railroad companies. What information has the Senator on that point.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, if I remember the testimony before the committee, there were 80,000 new cars purchased by the Railroad Administration. These cars were the modern, large-hopper cars, built especially for carrying coal. For some reason or other, which has never been definitely ascertained by the committee, there was delay in distributing those cars to the various railroads.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I offer this suggestion? I had some information some two months ago, when I began to investigate this subject, that a large number of the hopper cars, and perhaps other coal cars, were standing on the sidings throughout the country, and had not been distributed to the several companies, but it was said that they were awaiting painting and stenciling. Is that correct?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is correct. There was considerable delay in stenciling these cars with the name of the road to which they had been sold or were allotted, and that was due to the fact that there was some difficulty, I understand, in the financial arrangements and the settlement for the cars. It was probably purely a financial problem, but I think that the committee succeeded in inducing the Director General to appreciate the seriousness of the situation, and that whatever red tape there was, if there was any, was cut. I understand that practically all those cars have now been distributed to the various carriers to whom they were assigned in the first place.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may direct the Senator's attention to another subject, I also gathered a good deal of information to the effect that there were a large number of cars out of repair, but which were not sent to the repair shops. To illustrate, one witness who had investigated the subject advised me that cars marked as out of repair and ordered to the repair shops as early as April 25 were still found on sidings near the place where they had been condemned, and remained there for four months or such a matter before being moved to the shops. What information has the Senator on that point?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, this is a very important and interesting subject, but I understand the Senator from New Jersey is proceeding by the unanimous consent of the Senate, and if it is the intention of the Senator from Ohio to occupy the morning hour in asking the Senator questions I will ask that this matter be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think there is no justification for the Senator from Connecticut to question my motives. I have asked two or three questions on a very important subject. I have no desire to interfere with the consideration of the other subject, but when the Senator who has had charge of this investigation is giving to the Senate some information I thought that it was not improper to direct his attention to one or two phases of the subject which he had not touched upon.

Mr. McLEAN. I am perfectly willing to take the Senator's word as to his purpose in engaging in this debate, but if it continues beyond 1 o'clock I must object.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry. I understand that the Senator from New Jersey asked unanimous consent to make a statement and that consent was given. I do not understand that anyone can raise an objection now and take him off the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That question has not been raised. If it is raised, the Chair will rule that the Senator from New Jersey can not be taken from the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thought so. While I am on my feet I would like to ask the Senator from New Jersey just one question that will not divert him from answering the question of the Senator from Ohio. I would like to know if the hearings to which the Senator from New Jersey has alluded, which were conducted by a subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, have been printed?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. They are in galley proof, but I do not think they have been bound as yet.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I sent for a copy of them, but have not been able to get it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. You can get the galley proof, I think, but they have not been bound.

Before answering the Senator from Ohio I want to say to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] that I have no desire to delay the bringing up of his bill, and I will finish in a very few minutes, but not before 1 o'clock.

In answering the Senator from Ohio, it is true that there were a large number of coal cars out of repair. I think the number of cars that are utilized for carrying coal are approximately 1,000,000 or 1,100,000. If I remember correctly, at the beginning of the investigation about 113,000 of those cars were out of repair and out of use. The last reports that we had, a week or two ago, showed that the number had been reduced to 95,000, showing that there had been improvement.

The Director General delayed repairing the cars for a number of months; it has never been clearly ascertained why. It was probably due, in a great part, to the shopmen's strike, which also affected the production of coal. But I feel sure that at the present time the situation is improving, although I am informed by the Director General that a large number will continue to be out of repair, and that at the present time, and likely for some time in the future, there is apt to be a shortage of cars.

Mr. President, I simply want to allude to and express my views on another phase of the situation—the demands of the mine workers at the present time. Whatever we may do to bring about cooperation between the mine owners and the Government in regard to production, the most important factor in the situation is the question of the miners continuing at work. All of our efforts will be in vain if they do not continue at work. In what I have to say, I speak for myself individually, and not for the committee.

I have had read at the desk the demands of the mine workers at the present time. I have also had read from the desk the reply of the operators.

Before proceeding further I should state that the daily papers, within the past 48 hours, indicate that the officials representing the anthracite miners have just reached an agreement with the coal operators continuing until March 31, 1920, the existing wage scale. All honor to them for that decision.

But the officials representing the bituminous miners have pursued a radically different course.

The correspondence which I am about to offer presents an ominous situation, affecting, in the highest degree, the prosperity, peace, happiness, and health of the American people.

I have been a friend of labor, of organized labor, throughout my public career, both in the senate of my native State and in the Senate of the United States, but I am not a friend of tyranny, whether it be the tyranny of the capitalist or the tyranny of the professional labor agitator.

I believe that the laborer is worthy of his hire, but I do not believe that any man or set of men is entitled to a wage that will mean the placing of an intolerable burden upon the great mass of our population, already weighed down by high taxes and the high cost of living.

This action of the United Mine Workers of America should evoke, as I feel sure it will evoke, an outburst of indignation on the part of an outraged public.

Only a man of impaired intellect will fail to see that this is not a controversy which alone affects the coal operators and their employees. It is one that affects and seriously affects every house in the land, especially the home of the humblest citizen who depends upon coal for fuel purposes.

Over a hundred millions of our citizens who have never owned a dollar of coal stock anywhere and have never been near a mining town are vitally concerned in this controversy, for if the United Mine Workers of America shall have their demands granted it would add from $2 to $2.50 to the price of every ton of bituminous coal marketed, and a billion dollars would be filched from the pockets of those who can ill afford any such tax, in view of the innumerable other demands made upon the family purse.

What are these demands? The public should know. I shall not reproduce them in detail. They are set forth in the correspondence I am submitting herewith. I shall, however, present a few of them, in nontechnical language.

First. That the present wage agreement between the operators and the miners, which it was generally understood would not expire until April 1, 1920, shall be considered as null and void after November 1, 1919.

Second. That hereafter the miners shall work only five days a week and only six hours a day.

Third. Wages shall be increased 60 per cent.

Fourth. For overtime there shall be a 50 per cent additional compensation, and for all work on Sundays and holidays the extra pay shall amount to 100 per cent.

I shall not particularize the other demands, though these are on a par with those cited.

We must not, however, lose sight of the final demand, the crux of the matter, to wit:

> We recommend that in event a satisfactory wage agreement is not secured for the central competitive field before November 1, 1919, to replace the one now in effect, that the international officials be authorized to and are hereby instructed to call a general strike of all bituminous miners and mine workers throughout the United States, the same to become effective November 1, 1919.

These demands were presented to the bituminous coal mine operators assembled in Buffalo, September 29, 1919, who made reply, inter alia, as follows:

> Acceptance of these demands, with the indirect increases inherent to other items of your demands, would more than double the already high cost of producing coal, with consequent large direct and indirect additions to the cost of living of every citizen and a demoralization and prostration of the industry. Such wage increases are impossible, and their attempted enforcement would react with great harm equally on the Nation and on the individual miners you represent.

The operators, moreover, expressed a willingness to negotiate a new contract, but insisted that "such negotiation be entered into in a spirit of reasonableness and that the representatives of the miners be vested with their usual discretionary power to really negotiate." This power, however, the representatives of the miners indicated that they did not possess. The exact terms as laid down by the convention of the United Mine Workers of America must be met or the strike would take place on November 1, 1919. In effect, they declared that there was nothing to negotiate.

What is the situation which we face? Here we are on the threshold of winter. There is, comparatively speaking, but a scant supply of coal in the Nation's bins. If these men have their way, a state of famine will be precipitated upon the land or those sections dependent upon bituminous coal. An epidemic of pneumonia or influenza is likely, owing to the scarcity of fuel. Distress and hunger will affect all classes.

But who will suffer most? The poor, of course; the widows and the orphans who have been unable to lay in any winter supply. These will be the chief victims.

The shame of this, the crime of this, will rest upon the heads of these officials of the United Mine Workers of America, who have refused to abide by existing contracts and have demanded greatly reduced working hours and a greatly increased wage.

How does this spirit of selfishness compare with the noble sacrifices of our brave young men—4,000,000 of them—who entered the service of their country at a modest wage to help right the wrongs of the world and put tyranny under foot?

Not content with their unprecedentedly large weekly war-time incomes, they now issue their defiant demands, threatening to paralyze the industries of the Nation and jeopardize the health and lives of our people if such demands are not met within 30 days.

This program of the United Mine Workers of America is one of the links in the chain with which it is proposed to strangle the political and economic fabric of American civilization. It is altogether in sympathy and alliance with the scheme of Mr. Fitzpatrick, leader of the striking steel workers, who announced on the first day of the strike:

> We are going to socialize the basic industries of the United States. This is the beginning of the first fight.

It is also in line with the declared policy and purpose of Mr. Fitzpatrick's chief of staff, Mr. Foster, an apt disciple of Trotski and Lenin.

In one of the papers I am submitting herewith is a demand for the nationalization of the mines of the country—that the Government shall raise a few billions of dollars to buy the mines and turn them over to the miners, to be operated by the latter—a Plumb plan for taking over the mining industry.

The American people have never yet been weighed in the balance and been found wanting, nor will they be now, in my humble opinion.

A Nation which so nobly rose to the occasion in 1917 and 1918 and crushed the tyranny which dominated Europe and menaced the peace of the world will not fail in this crisis.

A greater despotism menaces America than before or during the war with the Imperial Government of Germany; chiefly greater because it is at our very doors. We are at the crossroads of our national destiny. The issue is, Shall this continue to be a democracy, governed by the people as a whole, or shall a faction, a class, an organization of any sort, defy public opinion, ignore the needs, the necessities of the common people, and set itself above the law and above the public welfare? That is Bolshevism pure and simple, for Bolshevism is the antithesis of democracy.

I stand in this public place and issue this solemn warning to the American people. If you would remain a free people, arise in your majesty and defeat this conspiracy against law, order, and the common weal.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. McLEAN. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7478.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed, and the Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill he has indicated.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, on yesterday, when the consideration of the bill was interrupted by the taking up of the peace treaty, I was discussing the provision which has been referred to as paragraph 3 of the pending bill, which authorizes the loaning of 25 per cent of the paid-up capital and surplus to an individual borrower on notes secured by shipping documents.

Under paragraphs 1 and 2, which provide for the discount of bills of exchange and drafts, commercial and business paper secured by shipping documents, the borrower is permitted to get not 10 per cent of the paid-in capital and surplus, not 25 per cent of the paid-in capital and surplus, but 100 per cent of the entire assets of the bank, save and except the legal reserve.

It is said with respect to this provision that it was contained in the original national-banking act and is continued in the Federal reserve act, but that was before these other limitations were changed. Now, what is the situation? If this bill should become a law as now proposed a borrower can take his notes, secure them by shipping documents such as bills of lading, and get 25 per cent of the paid-in capital and surplus, or he can go with United States bonds and can now, under the act of Congress and the order which is made by the Comptroller of the Currency, get $100 in cash for every $105 of bonds he hypothecates, without any limitation whatever, except the legal reserve. At the same time, in giving proper effect to this provision, we must bear in mind that the market value of the bonds, I mean the 4's and 4½'s, runs about 95 or 96 per cent of the face value. In addition to that, if he goes to his local bank and draws on a drawee with the shipping documents attached, he can get out of the bank 100 per cent, not only of the capital and surplus, but of the deposits as well, except legal reserves.

Senators, in my humble judgment, when these banking laws were prepared, while Congress had in mind no doubt the necessity that borrowers were under to get money from the banks, they had at least equal consideration for the safety of the stockholders, and particularly for the safety of the depositors. Under this law, if a bank has a capital and surplus amounting to $100,000, under the general provisions one borrower can get $10,000. If he brings notes secured by shipping documents he can get $25,000, provided he presents shipping documents with a margin of 15 per cent. In addition to that he can draw his draft with the shipping documents attached and get all the deposits of the bank except the legal reserves.

Now, what is the reason that is urged for this change? It it said that when it comes to the products of the farms or of the factories, under the limitations as they have existed for years, they can not finance the crops. Let us see whether they can not: Assuming that a borrower needs $100,000 in order to finance his marketing, and he goes to one bank, and the limitations under the present law would enable him to get only $50,000, there is not anything in the statutes which prevents him from going to another bank to get another $50,000 and thus distribute the risk which the one bank would undertake if it were furnishing the $100,000. There is no prosperous community in any section of the country that does not have two or more banks in the county, at least. I do not understand why any banker would wish to run the risk of jeopardizing his assets by seeking to limit the number of borrowers. I submit that the bank is doing the best business which has many borrowers, and that bank is doing a poor business which has one borrower. So if these men want to finance their business they can get their accommodations at two banks instead of getting them at one bank. I need not remind Senators what it means to a community or to an entire section of a country to have a bank fail.

But we are told that there are no risks to run, because the drafts provided for in paragraphs 1 and 2 are drawn against existing values. While they are drawn against existing values, and it may be that at the time of shipment the existing values are equal to the amount of the draft, yet when the cargo reaches the consignee on whom the draft is drawn the market value of the cargo may have materially depreciated.

It is urged that this is legislation in the interest of the small bank; that the larger banks do not seek this latitude, but it is the smaller banks that do; in other words, reduced to its final analysis, the logic of the men who use that argument is that the depositor in a small bank only needs one-half the security and the safeguards that the depositor in a large bank needs.

It is also said that the dollar has depreciated in its purchasing value. Well, if the dollar has depreciated in its purchasing value, it does not necessarily follow that the borrower should have more dollars. It probably follows that the bank needs more capital stock or surplus.

Mr. President, I have presented these objections in this way because I believe them sound, and I am not at the present time willing to take away from bank depositors the securities which belong to them. In my judgment, in the present state of the financial market, what is needed is more security and not less.

Let me give you the benefit of an argument which was made when this subject was presented to the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. An experienced banker—I do not care to be more specific in my reference than that—made the statement, as applied to the South, that most of the cotton buyers who got their accommodations at the banks in the South could not get a credit of $2.50 if it were not for the collateral in the shape of the shipping documents. That statement does not apply to the South alone, for there are men in every section of the country during certain seasons of the year buying up live stock, buying manufactured products, or other commodities—it may be grain—who are going around and getting a certain line of credit, because the credit is secured by existing values; or, in other words, by the shipping documents. I submit there ought to be a limit to the credit a man of that kind can get at a bank. If there is not a limitation placed upon borrowings of that kind, I am afraid in certain sections of the country it is going to lead to the breaking of banks and to the loss to the depositors of their savings.

For the reasons I have stated, I have presented the two amendments, the one to reduce the amount which can be borrowed on notes secured by shipping documents from 25 per cent to 20 per cent of the capital and surplus, and the other limiting the amount that a borrower can get on drafts secured as provided in paragraphs 1 and 2 to an amount equal to the capital and the surplus.

I think that is all I care to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment, which has been proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

The SECRETARY. The first amendment proposed by Mr. POMERENE is in section 1, page 3, line 13, before the words "per cent," to strike out the figures "25" and in lieu thereof to insert the figures "20."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I hope that amendment will prevail. It seems to me that conservative banking can be none too well provided for and that it would not be too well provided for even were the amount of loans reduced to an even lower percentage than that proposed by the Senator from Ohio. To those of us who have had to borrow in times past, when 10 per cent only of the capital stock of a bank was the absolute limit, without regard to the surplus, it seems somewhat startling that it is now proposed to allow national banks to loan one-quarter of their capital and surplus to one individual.

The Senator from Ohio has very well said that a man who has good enough credit in a bank to command a quarter of its capital certainly would have good enough credit to enable him to borrow in more than one bank. I think it will not be denied by anyone at all conversant with banking affairs that the better banking plan is to have a great many borrowers, with lesser amounts on each loan, rather than to have a one-man bank either on the borrower's side or the bank's side. Let the loans of those who have to borrow large amounts be distributed in several banks, so that if loss comes the loss will be distributed, and should loss not come the benefits will also be distributed. I shall take great pleaure in voting for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, and I trust that it may be agreed to.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] understands that the purpose of the proposed law is to enable the national banks to compete with the State banks on single lines of credit. I think the Senator from Wyoming will find that the State of Wyoming allows single lines of credit up to 25 per cent of capital and surplus.

I think the Senator will also admit that there might be a case where a small bank in the country—and there might be only one bank in the town—would have a customer whose credit was beyond question, and in the fall of the year, in the purchase of agricultural products, it would be hardly good banking, in my opinion, to prohibit this bank from affording an accommodation to a customer that was absolutely safe which was in excess of 25 per cent of the capital stock and surplus of the bank.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as to that, the national banks chartered and backed by the Nation should not, I think, follow off after State banks or private banks. Of course, it may be said that a State bank may loan a higher percentage; but here come the private banks, which, of course, do business as they please. If a man, even in a small town, has sufficient credit with a State bank so that he is considered good for a quarter of the capital of that bank, he certainly must have a reputation and his business affairs must be sufficiently well known, or could be put in proper shape to be known, to national banks as well as private banks, to enable him to borrow all he wants to borrow in different places instead of from one bank.

I think the whole scheme of heavy borrowing by one person at one bank, crippling that bank as to its ability to furnish accommodations to others in the community whose credit, while perfectly good, may not be as good as that of some certain large borrower, is bad policy.

Mr. McLEAN. I call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to another fact, namely, that it was urged at the time the Federal Reserve Banking System was organized that its main purpose was to provide for an extension of credits in the autumn in order to accommodate the financing of the crops, and that it was very important that the system should be made so popular as to invite State banks to enter it. Now, as a matter of fact, some banks already organized under the national system are liquidating their charters and going out of the system and reorganizing under State charters, because they feel that this limitation is not in accord with sound banking. I do not think the Senator will find a writer upon the subject who will agree with him that this bill permits unsound banking. I do not think he will find another country in the world that places such a limitation upon its banks. If Congress adopts the policy of punishing 999 sound bankers for the purpose of protecting one weak one, Congress may as well go out of business so far as regulating banking is concerned, because if it does not the bankers will have to go out of business.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, this bill comes to the Senate with favorable action by the House and with the indorsement and the approval of the governor of the Federal Reserve Board. The Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, after the subject matter of this bill had been discussed at length upon the floor of the Senate, reexamined it and, after amending it to meet certain objections made to it, reported it with a strong recommendation in favor of its passage.

The demand for its passage is very general and urgent, especially in the agricultural sections of the country, where the crops are now beginning to move and where large sums of money are required in order to finance the marketing of these products.

It is said that to increase the present limitation upon the amount of money which national banks may lend will result in bad banking; and yet, Mr. President, the demand for this legislation comes largely from the banks. They do not see any danger, and they urge this legislation as necessary to enable them to supply the funds needed to do the most important business of the community in which they are located, namely, that of marketing the raw products of the sections in which they are located, thereby promoting its general prosperity and preventing that stagnation which inevitably follows inability to dispose of the surplus products of industry.

These banks have the money needed to meet these requirements, but on account of the limited amount that, under the present law, they are permitted to lend they are unable to render the necessary help. I can not conceive anything more disastrous to general prosperity than a condition which makes it impossible to promptly market the products of industry. That is especially true with respect to agricultural products.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator explain——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a moment. I repeat, the banks have the money, they are satisfied with the security, and they are anxious to lend it to help the community in which they operate, but the limitation of the present law stays their hand.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator wish us to understand that the banks in his community are so full of money that they are not able to place loans unless they have the existing limit raised?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I have not stated anything of that kind. I have stated that the banks have sufficient money to lend in order to enable the prospective purchasers of farm products which are ready to be thrown upon the market to make the purchases and to relieve a situation that otherwise would result in congestion and in stagnation.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator knows that the sum total of the amount of money loaned to various people undoubtedly uses the money that the banks have to loan; and if the limit is doubled twice and a half, and if you borrow to the limit, what becomes of the others who wish to borrow in the same community?

Mr. SIMMONS. The proposition here is to limit the total amount that may be loaned to one person or corporation to 25 per cent of the capital and surplus. The provision to which the Senator refers is not a loan at all. It is merely a cashing in of a draft something like the way in which checks are cashed. The amount paid out is speedily returned. The present law limits the amount that may be loaned to one person or corporation to 10 per cent, and imposes no limitation upon the amount that may be advanced in payment or discount of certain drafts drawn against nonperishable products. It is proposed to increase this limitation to 25 per cent of the capital and surplus, but there is included in this 25 per cent increase allowance a permissible loan of 10 per cent upon notes secured by Government bonds. The Senator from Ohio did not advert to this fact. So that the increase on account of the advances made on nonperishable products is not so great as would appear from the general statement that the bill allows as much as 25 per cent of the paid-in capital and surplus to be loaned to one person or corporation.

Mr. President, it is not a case of the inflation of the currency. It can not be. Neither is it an inflation of credits. It is simply a case of loaning to one person or corporation the amount of money necessary to do a given thing necessary to the prosperity of the community. As I have stated, the banks have the money; this money is needed to move the crops; they are satisfied with the security, and the pretext that it will expand credits to permit these banks to loan a sufficient amount to accomplish this purpose is, to my mind, far-fetched and untenable.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the fact that if these small banks in the South are not permitted to use their credits, the customers are forced to go to the large cities to get accommodations, and the large cities take a toll every time they grant this accommodation; and the South for years has suffered under that burden.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is entirely right about that. For years and years the South at this season of the year has been compelled to draw heavily upon the great central cities for money to move the crops. Now, for the first time in the history of the South, the South has sufficient money of its own, without calling upon the banks in the great centers of the country, and our banks are ready to lend this money. The banks are not afraid of these securities. In the interest of their communities, they ask permission to lend their customers the money necessary to carry on the business of the community.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DIAL. Is it not true, too, that there is no compulsion in this law to loan anybody anything?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no compulsion whatsoever. If the bank is satisfied with the security, it loans the money; otherwise, it refuses.

Mr. DIAL. And the protection to the stockholders and depositors is in the management of the bank, after all.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; and I will say to the Senator that I believe some of this opposition to the proposition of allowing these banks to make these loans comes from those interested in depressing the price of agricultural products.

Mr. DIAL. They can get accommodations from the State banks, but they can not get them from the national banks.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no; there is no trouble so far as the State banks are concerned. They are not bound by any such limitation. It is the national banks which, by the present narrow limitation imposed upon their loaning capacity, are unable to assist in meeting the emergency I have been discussing.

This limitation was embarrassing in normal conditions. It is more embarrassing now that prices of products are greatly inflated. The paid-in capital and surplus of these banks have not increased much since prewar times, but the prices of products have doubled, so that it takes twice the amount of money to market these products as it required before the war. It is evident therefore that the amount a national bank can lend now for this purpose will only go half as far in purchasing and distributing the products of industry as formerly. Upon such a basis as that how is it possible to facilitate the distribution of the products of industry? How is it possible to avoid stagnation and congestion, especially in agricultural communities where the fruits of the year's work are thrown upon the market at the end of the season and must be marketed quickly if the general interest and business of that community is to prosper? If the views of the Senator from Ohio should obtain, it would greatly embarrass the business in some sections of the country.

There has been much talk about the dangers of banks lending money on drafts, bills of lading, and so forth, secured by nonperishable products. Mr. President, I fail to see any force in these arguments. Of course, a bank does not lend money or advance money without being satisfied with the security. They are the guardians of the interests not only of the stockholders but of the depositors. They exercise the same precaution with reference to this class of paper as they do with reference to any other security upon which they advance money. Besides, these drafts and these discounts are mere temporary loans, some of them only for a few days. Many of them partake of the nature of checks—the money is paid out and soon put back. There is the double security of the product pledged and the personal liability of the individual making the draft. In addition to this, the banks frequently require additional security for a line of this character. I have not heard outside of the Senate of this being a dangerous system of banking, and the arguments used here against it do not appeal to me at all.

The 25 per cent limitation proposed in this bill includes the 10 per cent limitation imposed in the present law and an additional 10 per cent limitation upon money advanced on Government bonds. This latter provision is new. It is intended to prevent the depreciation of Government bonds, and in recognition of the absolute solvency of Government obligations. This provision is dictated by wise policy, and I do not believe it is subject to the criticism that has been made against it.

Taking into consideration that 10 per cent of this 25 per cent may be absorbed in loans made on bonds, this bill only provides for an increase of 5 per cent of the amount that may be loaned under the present law under subsection 3, which deals with loans or advances made upon nonperishable products.

Mr. President, the proponents of this measure are anxious to have a vote before 2 o'clock, when the treaty will be taken up, because they know the importance of speedy action upon this measure, and as but little time remains before that hour, I forego much that I would like to say in support of this measure, much that ought to be said in the interest of getting action this morning.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I do not pretend to be an expert in finance, and I hesitate to discuss this bill at all for that reason; but from the speeches that have been made by the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from North Carolina, I am convinced that I am correct in my opposition to this bill. I am opposed to the bill because it seems to me that it provides for an expansion of credits, when if there was ever a time in the history of the United States when expansion of credits ought not to be permitted it is now.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Just on that one point, because that seems to be the main thought in the Senator's mind, we were assured by Gov. Harding at the hearing that expansion could not possibly follow under this legislation; and the Senator, I think, will see the reason of it. This paper is not eligible under sections 9 and 13 of the Federal reserve act, and it could not result in expansion for that reason.

Mr. LENROOT. That would be expansion of currency. I am not speaking of expansion of currency. I am speaking of expansion of credits.

Mr. FLETCHER. With reference to that, let me say to the Senator that the reason why expansion of the currency would not follow is because this business is already being done by the State banks. The credit is there now, and the State banks are actually doing the business; and if you authorize the national banks to do what the State banks are doing, you do not, of course, expand a credit which already exists. The whole purpose of this is to prevent the centralization of credits in the big institutions in the big cities, and to open the facilities of the various communities to the people in those communities, instead of driving the whole system into the big centers.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with the very high esteem in which I hold both the Senator from Florida and the Senator from North Carolina, I hardly know which statement to accept, because the statements are diametrically opposed to each other. The Senator from North Carolina just a very few moments ago said that this legislation was necessary in order to enable the people of the South to finance their crops; that the national banks had the money, but that they could not loan it; and that this legislation was necessary to enable producers to secure the necessary credits. If that is true, the statement of the Senator from Florida can not be true. The Senator from Connecticut made the statement that unless the restrictions that are proposed to be removed by this bill are removed the national banks of this country will increasingly surrender their charters and accept charters as State banks. If that be true, Mr. President, it is because of the restriction in the present law upon the line of credit that the national banks may extend to their customers.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes, Mr. President; on the line of credit, but not upon the total of the credits. The reserves are not increased a dollar. If I have 30,000 bushels of wheat to sell, and sell that wheat to 3 customers instead of to 10, I have not increased the quantity of wheat by a grain. It is precisely the same in regard to credits. If I have $30,000 in credits to sell, and the law permits me to sell those credits to 3 men instead of to 10, I have not increased the credits; I have simply distributed them so that they will to a greater extent accommodate the needs of the public.

Mr. LENROOT. I, of course, agree with the Senator, if all of the credit of the bank is utilized. But let us take the case stated by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. If a bank has money that it is not using, in other words, if its reserves are very much larger than the minimum required by law, and those reserves are continued, if this bill permits them to utilize those reserves in this way, where they would not be utilized but for the bill, does the Senator say that there is no expansion of credit?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the small banks would be helpless. The banks of the South would be compelled to do what they have done in the past. They have sent their credits on to New York to help the New York banks finance Wall Street, and they have to pay the banks in New York for the accommodation which they ought to have in the South.

Mr. LENROOT. That may or may not be true. I rather prefer to take the statement of the Senator from North Carolina that that is not the situation to-day; and, taking the statement of the Senator from North Carolina, it is clear to me that the passage of this bill will result in a larger line of credit than the present law permits. If that be true, whatever may be said about this being a reasonable provision in normal times—I am not prepared to say that I would not support it under normal conditions—I do say that this is not the time when we ought to permit any sort of possible expansion of credits, and especially of the character that is permitted under the pending bill.

The bill is not limited alone, Mr. President, to drafts and bills of exchange. This line of credit is permitted, in fact, to notes secured by chattel mortgages upon such products as may be the subject of warehouse receipts. It was only three or four years ago that Congress passed the warehouse-receipt law, and under that law anyone owning the products named in the bill may take them to a warehouse and secure a receipt for them. There need be no transfer of title except as the warehouse receipt carries the transfer. Then he can, under the law, secure this credit for what is practically the security of a chattel mortgage; and it authorizes a loan upon the products to about 90 per cent of their value.

Take the case of cotton alone. The Senator is aware, as we are all aware, that in 24 hours the market price of cotton has varied to a degree greater than the margin that is provided for in this bill, and it may well happen again. While I am an optimist as to the future of this country, and I have an abiding confidence that we are going to get upon a permanent basis of prosperity, that man would be foolish indeed who does not look forward with a great deal of apprehension to what may occur in the industrial and financial circles of the country before we get to a normal basis. Assuming that we do have a period of depression, is it right to permit any bank to loan 25 per cent of its capital and surplus to a single individual?

So I am opposed to the bill, Mr. President, both because it clearly seems to me that it does permit an expansion of credits, and because, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has clearly set forth, it does deprive the depositors, for whose interests this limitation of 10 per cent was originally made, of that security which they are entitled to have.

I expect, Mr. President, that the bill will pass. I do not apprehend that any opposition to the bill will be effectual in preventing its passage. But the time may come, Mr. President, and that in the very near future, when the passage of this bill will result in national bank failures where they might have survived but for its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to executive business in open session for the consideration of the German treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a minute or two?

Mr. LODGE. For what purpose?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to have inserted in the RECORD an article by Prof. Charles Seymour entitled "The League of Nations."

Mr. LODGE. That could just as well be inserted after my motion is agreed to. However, I will withhold the motion for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has yielded for the purpose for which I rose. I ask leave to insert in the RECORD an article in the Yale Review of October entitled "The League of Nations," by Prof. Charles Seymour, and I ask in printing it that where I have placed a lead-pencil mark on the margin that that part be printed in italics. The italics are mine, of course, and not Prof. Seymour's.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[By Charles Seymour.]

"THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"One of the most interesting of all the sensations experienced by Americans who were abroad last spring was reserved for their return in early summer, when, without adequate warning, they were suddenly cast into the dust and turmoil of the debate on the league of nations. They felt, if one may generalize, as if they were playing Rip van Winkle with the rôles reversed—as if they were returning to a home which had slept briefly but soundly. Questions and phrases, vaguely familiar but echoing from a dim past, sounded in their ears: 'Is a league feasible?' 'Human nature will never change.' 'Remember Washington's advice!' 'Europe for the Europeans and America for the Americans.'

"Our returning friends found themselves sadly confused and as ill prepared for arguments on the league of nations as you would be if suddenly asked to discuss, from the point of view of mother earth, the desirability of having a sun in the sky. As far back as January they had given up asking 'Will a league work?' and had substituted for it the question, 'Can the treaty work without a league?' By the middle of April they had answered the latter question with a categoric negative. After leaving an atmosphere where the idea of a league had become as essential as oxygen, it was disconcerting to enter a world where one was asked whether a league was 'advisable.'

"The process of translation by which the idea of a league of nations passed from the stage of a rather fantastic possibility over to one of desirability and finally to one of absolute necessity forms one of the most interesting aspects of the recent peace conference. When the American peace commission sailed for France last December, the status of the league was ill defined and its future dubious. It is true that a league had been stipulated in the 14 points, which had been accepted as a basis of peace by both enemy and allied powers; President Wilson was known to give to the league the chief place in his program, and influential statesmen abroad were believed to be determined that the coming conference should inaugurate it. And yet, on both sides of the Atlantic it remained one of the most debatable points of the approaching settlement.

"In America the idea of a league found enthusiastic backing in certain quarters, especially among the younger radicals. But there was a general tendency to look upon it as a presidential fad borrowed from Mr. Taft; and the man in the street was apt to regard it as a beautiful and distinctly impractical fantasy. A large element in public opinion was frankly opposed to it. In Europe one found a similar mixture of feelings. The more liberal-minded of the British approved a league of nations heartily; and they were fortunate in having as their spokesman Lord Robert Cecil, who is, perhaps, the most capable of British statesmen, and who was put in control of the section of the British peace delegation designed to study plans for the league. In France Leon Bourgeois, who was also working on various plans, brought the weight of his long political experience, his tested sagacity, and well-earned respect to the support of the league.

"The chiefs of the different peace delegations, however, seemed to question or else to be frankly opposed to any kind of a league which would supersede the old system of separate treaties and alliances. Lloyd-George had refused to commit himself definitely. Clemenceau stated in the Chamber of Deputies, toward the end of December, that he remained true to the principle of protective alliances for France, which had saved her in the past, however fine might be the 'noble simplicity' of Mr. Wilson's doctrines. The Italians signified, without enthusiasm, their willingness to enter and support a league, but did not conceal their hopes that, in return, their territorial aspirations in the Tyrol, along the Adriatic, and in Asia Minor might receive the approval of the Americans.

"When the preliminary conversations which proceeded the formal opening of the conference were begun, the league was thus simply one of the series of difficult problems which confronted the delegates. To some of them it was the most important of all the questions at issue, and according to the manner in which it should be decided would stand or fall the whole work of the conference. By others the league was looked upon as a serious and important question, certainly, but one that had no direct relation to the vital work of the delegates, which was primarily to make peace with the enemy. The league could be attended to when the treaties were framed and ready for signature; instead of being made the foundation of the treaties, it ought to be the culmination. Still others believed that the league was no business of the peace conference whatever; the treaties ought to be made and signed, relations with the enemy resumed, Europe restored to order, before this difficult and dangerous experiment was attempted. With the return of peace and normal life in Europe, the stipulations of the 14 points might be fulfilled by a conference especially called to elaborate plans for a league, which could not be expected to pass safely through its early childhood unless conditions were particularly advantageous. There were thus two opposite poles of opinion—at the one stood those who contended that peace could not be maintained unless a league were established; at the other those who insisted that unless peace were first established a league could not be maintained.

"The triumph of the point of view which demanded that the league be made the foundation and not the culmination of the treaties was due primarily to the position and the persuasive powers of Mr. Wilson. He was ably assisted by Cecil, Bourgeois, and Smuts, who later were to assume a most important rôle in the drafting of the covenant. But if Mr. Wilson had not been in Paris, the league would almost certainly have been left to the latter days of the conference and possibly to the Greek Kalends. His determined belief that the league was to be the most important work of the conference, the one concrete factor that would make it different from earlier conferences, was inflexible; and he alone was in a position to impress that belief upon the doubtful conferees. At the moment when the conference opened he had been carried to a crest of popularity with the European masses, manifested by a hundred demonstrations, which no government, however strong at home, could afford to disregard. He could count upon the support of the delegates of the smaller nations, by whom he was looked upon as the representative of the one State which had no interest in the settlement except justice and tranquillity—a man who might be trusted to see that a fair deal was given to the weak nations as well as to the strong. And his personal prestige was strengthened by their unshaken belief that his written and spoken word had aroused the revolution in central and southeastern Europe which had so largely contributed to the military victory on the western front. The President used his position skillfully.

"The first open victory of the league was won on the 25th of January, when at a plenary session of the peace conference the delegates approved, first, the principle that a league of nations was essential to the maintenance of the world settlement, and, second, the principle that this league should be treated as an integral part of the general treaty of peace. A distinct phase in the history of the league was thus accomplished. It had passed definitely into the category of things desirable, it was approved by the chiefs of the most important governments of the world as practicable, and, through its incorporation in the peace treaty, it became a matter of immediate moment demanding immediate attention. The action of the conference in thus acquiescing in Mr. Wilson's policy was certainly popular in Europe. It was hailed with enthusiasm in all liberal circles; and even those who could not accept the idea of the league as capable of revolutionizing human nature and perpetuating peace, and who still held firmly to their trust in hard and fast alliances of the old style and in strategic frontiers, felt that no harm was done and that the league might after all prove to be useful.

"It should be observed that the chief arguments advanced for the league at this time were based primarily upon the contention that it was eminently advisable rather than that it was absolutely essential. The old system of the balance of power had gone bankrupt. With its principle of maintaining an equilibrium between opposing camps, it had, so far from discouraging a belligerent spirit because of the danger of defeat from an enemy equal or almost equal in strength, led directly to militaristic competition, and, therefore, necessarily to an attitude of aggression. How much better, said the advocates of the league, was the principle of concert. But few of them seemed to perceive at this time that the strongest argument for the league was to be not its desirability but its necessity.

"In some quarters, generally outside of Paris and doubtless far more frequently in this country than abroad, critics voiced the complaint that the attention given to the league of nations was delaying the framing of the treaties and postponing a settlement at the moment when Europe, threatened with anarchy, had dire need of peace. A little later everyone was to perceive that the time spent upon the league, instead of postponing a settlement, accelerated the work of the conference beyond calculation, for without the league no agreement could have been reached. But even in January and February those who were close at hand did not feel that the work done on the league was preventing the work necessary to the solution of other problems.

"The conference did not work as a whole. For each important problem a special commission of experts were appointed, and the commissions sat simultaneously. Commissions were working on reparations, financial and economic problems, international labor laws, control of rivers, ports, and ways of communication, as well as on the various territorial questions, at the same time that the special commission was drafting the covenant of the league. The work of these other commissions was in no way delayed by the study of the league. As a matter of fact, the first draft of the covenant was ready on the 14th of February, which was a full month before any of the territorial commissions had reported their recommendations on boundaries; and the final revised text was ready on the 11th of April, or about three weeks before many of the economic commissions had prepared their draft articles for the treaty with Germany.

"The commission which drafted the covenant included in its membership a large share of the best political ability present in Paris—Wilson, Cecil, Smuts, Bourgeois, Orlando, Veniselos, Hymans. Each one of the five principal powers was represented, as well as the other powers most vitally interested—Belgium, Brazil, China, Greece, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Serbia, and the Czecho-Slovak Republic. It would have been difficult to find a group more capable of fulfilling the task that had been set them, a task which demanded that they put into concrete form a scheme at once practical and yet not bereft of idealism. They were men who see things as they are and also as they ought to be, and who understood that their business was to translate them so far as possible from the one condition to the other. But they did not fall into the attractive mistake of drafting an elaborate constitution of impracticabilities.

"It would have been interesting and pleasant to do for the world what the revolutionists of 1789 tried to do for France, but the commission on the league of nations resisted the temptation admirably. What was necessary was to avoid intricate mechanism, exact definition of powers, prescription of specific action under circumstances yet to be determined by an uncertain future. It was necessary in the first place because, in the process of constructing such an elaborate piece of machinery, as, for example, the league to enforce peace, agreement could never have been reached. It was necessary in the second place because the league, if it were to prove useful, must be elastic. It must be able to change and develop in order to meet future contingencies of which no one could foretell the character. Constitutions written out of whole cloth and elaborated to the last degree have not, according to historians, lasted for long. The strongest of all modern constitutions, the British, contained in the laws of Parliament, is entirely a natural growth.

"The members of the commission on the league were convinced, as were most other students of peace problems, that the essential characteristic of the settlement ought to be elasticity. Earlier peace conferences of history had failed, not so much because the arrangements they had made were bad at the moment as because they were inflexible and unsuited to the changing conditions of the future. We are accustomed to regard the treaties of 1815 as the quintessence of wickedness, because historians, with marvelous hindsight, have shown us how completely they failed to take into account the principles of democracy and nationalism. But after all the professional diplomats of Vienna restored Europe to tranquillity, after a quarter century of convulsions, in general accordance with the spirit of the times. Their mistake was that, unable to forecast the future, they made no adequate provision for the peaceful alteration of the settlement they drafted. Hence when change became necessary it came in violent form.

"The peacemakers of 1919, conscious of the mistake of their predecessors, were anxious to avoid the future breaking of the peace by violence; and yet they recognized that the settlement they made could hardly be permanent in all respects, for no one could tell what the future might bring forth. No one can estimate, for example, the future importance of the natonalistic movement, which has recently received a tremendous but possibly ephemeral imptus. No one can evaluate the future of Bolshevism. The world must be prepared for change and must have ready methods by which beneficial change can take place easily and peacefully. With this in mind the conference realized that provision must be made for an elastic settlement, and for this reason the supporters of the league began to insist on its necessity. And if it was through the league that the settlement was to be capable of change and development, it was essential that the league itself should be elastic and equally subject to amendment.

"Hence the character of the covenant, which provides for the least possible amount of machinery and lays down the least possible number of specific stipulations. For the success of the league would depend not so much upon the written guarantees of the States which composed it, as upon the spirit of their governments. No one was sure exactly what kind of league was must desirable, but the commission believed that if the spirit of the governments was right and the character of the covenant was general, the right kind of league would develop naturally.

"The commission on the league worked rapidly. Between the 28th of January and the 14th of February it held 10 meetings, as a result of which it produced, as its preliminary report, the first draft of the covenant, which was read at the plenary session of the conference on the latter date. As a result of this reading and of the publication of the covenant, a great deal of criticism was aroused, of which some was clearly carping, but much of it was constructive and designed to improve. Further criticism of a specific nature came from consultations with representatives of 13 neutral States. The various recommendations thus secured by the commission formed the basis of discussion for its later meetings and led to a thorough reconsideration and amendment of the covenant. On the 11th of April the covenant, presented to the conference and later incorporated in the treaties, was finally agreed upon.

"During the period when the special commission was drafting, reconsidering, and amending the covenant of the league, something approaching a revolution had taken place in the attitude of the conference as a whole toward the idea of a league of nations. When the principle of the league had first been approved, although the decision received the approval of the vast majority of the delegates, the idea of the league still remained something rather abstract. It was felt to be desirable that there should be a league and that the league should be the foundation for the different treaties. But many, even of those most enthusiastic, regarded it as something apart from the material stuff of the treaties. The delegates were inclined to look upon the league of nations commission as different from the commissions, economic or territorial, upon which they themselves were serving, and the difference was not entirely due to the distinguished character of its membership. Its work was doubtless on a higher plane, but on one that seemed at first to have little relation to the practical solution of the treaty problems which formed the subject of their own discussions. Some of the delegates did not hesitate to say, that while the league was all very well and they hoped that it would work, they thought that the treaty problems ought to be solved without reference to it.

"Such an attitude was not long-lived. For when, during the months of February and March, the commissions had racked their brains for weeks over the complex questions presented to them and often failed to find any answer, they finally discovered that the league was not merely desirable but absolutely essential to a just and satisfactory settlement. The league, they learned, was not an abstract advisability, but a concrete necessity; it was no longer a question of the league's being able to work, but an acknowledgment that without it the treaty could not work.

"The change came imperceptibly, as a result of constant study of the various complexities of the European situation and a constant searching for solutions to the problems which the delegates had to face. It came with a realization that for many problems an ideal solution was impossible, not so much because of the selfish attitude traditionally attributed to diplomats, but because of larger and more elemental forces over which the Paris conference had little or no control. Thus, in the case of central and southeastern Europe, solutions which many persons might believe to be most likely to stand the test of time, and in the end most likely to contribute to the future happiness of the peoples concerned, could not be adopted because of the present attitude of these peoples. It is easy to see the weakness of a settlement which provides for the splitting up of the old Hapsburg monarchy and the creation of a number of little States, the frontiers of which will probably give rise to economic difficulties, racial quarrels, and the atmosphere which we are accustomed to associate with the Balkans. Whatever our sympathy with the Czechs, the Poles, the Jugo-Slavs, we are bound to regret the multiplication of small States.

"And yet there was nothing for the peacemakers to do but to approve this 'Bankanization' of Austria-Hungary. They might contend that they knew what was best for everyone concerned, but they could not impose their own solution upon the peoples who claimed the right to fulfill their destiny in their own fashion. The doctrine of self-determination fell to the ground if the conference dictated a settlement totally repugnant to these peoples, even if its dictation proceeded from the most laudable motives. There was no choice for the delegates except to adopt the next best solution. And because they realized its weaknesses and the future dangers that might result from its application, they felt the necessity of a permanent international organization which should oversee the settlement, be ready to meet any possible perils, and be eager to eliminate any factors of future trouble when the time should seem ripe and the peoples in question should be further developed. We have the testimony of so distinguished an expert as Mr. Hoover that States like Poland and Jugoslavia cannot live without the kind of assistance which a league of nations alone can give. From the territorial, financial, and political advisers came the unanimous opinion that if the small States were not to be torn by internal disorder and mutual strife, the supervision of a league is essential.

"The necessity of the league was still more clearly recognized in the case of problems where the delegates could not be sure that they had hit upon the right solution. The basis of the settlement, if we boil down the 14 points, was roughly to be found in the principles of reparations and guarantees. The wrongs of the past were to be righted, so far as possible, and the most complete security for the future was to be guaranteed. Frequently the enforcement of the principle of reparations satisfied that of guarantees. This was true in the case of Alsace-Lorraine, where the righting of an ancient wrong provided the best guarantee of future peace; for Europe could never remain safe from disturbance so long as the Provinces were under the German yoke. But in some cases the principles of reparations and guarantees clashed; it was impossible, often, to right a wrong committed in earlier days without committing a new wrong likely to unsettle the future peace. In this clash came the great difficulty of the conference. How much weight should be laid upon justice, how much upon reconciliation? How could satisfaction be given to the just claims of the Czechs without doing injustice to the rights of the Bohemian Germans and thus sowing the seeds for future trouble? How could a respectable frontier be assured to Italy in the north without arousing the bitter nationalistic ardor of the Austrian Tyrolese, who in the days of Andreas Hofer had begun the movement which led to Napoleon's fall? Poles and Czechs claimed all of Teschen, Roumanians, and Jugo-Slavs each claimed the Banat; how was the conference to be sure that its decision was the right one?

"The delegates were not long at work before they made the discovery that the finding of a solution satisfactory to all parties to an issue was infinitely difficult if not impossible. No matter how many facts they had at their disposal nor how carefully they might weigh those facts, they could not escape the conviction that no body of men, however wise, could decide correctly all the problems of the peace. Time alone would show in which cases the decisions were right and in which wrong. In these circumstances the idea of the league came as a relief and seemed to the delegates the one essential to the maintenance of tranquillity. For with a league the mistakes of the conference could be rectified peacefully and the germs of future disturbance destroyed. The good that was contained in the settlement could be thus preserved and the evil could be quietly transformed into good. But without a league the good would perish with the evil in the gigantic cataclysm which threatens to follow any resumption of the reign of unlawful force.

"There was a third class of problems to which, for a time, it seemed as if there was no solution whatever, for the reason that the conferees could not agree. Some of the delegates found it impossible, from the point of view of conscience or interest, to accept the propositions favored by other delegations. The work of the conference threatened to be held up completely by a deadlock. It was not a question here of the league as a desirable organism for the maintenance of peace after the treaties were signed; the treaties could not even have been framed had not the league offered a means of reconciling the opposing points of view and a basis for a final agreement. It was through the league that several of the problems which threatened to produce discord at the moment when unity at Paris was a vital necessity, were settled at a minimum of dissatisfaction to all concerned.

"In the matter of the Saar, for example, although all were close to agreement on the point that France had the right to ownership of the coal mines, as compensation for the wanton destruction of her own mines at Lens, and while it was recognized that the economic interests of the mining population of the Saar attached those people closely to Lorraine, at least two of the influential delegations were opposed to giving France absolute sovereignty over the district; for they felt that its pure German population might form an irredentist focus and a germ of future disturbance. In these circumstances a solution of the difficulty became possible only through the league, which is to govern the district through a commission during the time necessary to give the inhabitants a fair opportunity to decide whether they wish to be French or German. Similar disagreement in the case of Dantzig was finally settled through the league, which is to supervise the government of the free city constituted, protecting the political life of the German population, while assuring the economic interests of the Polish hinterland. Many other instances might be cited, amongst them notably the problem of the German colonies, in which the unanimity of the conference was secured for propositions which were possible only upon the assumption that there would be a league of nations. In this way, almost imperceptibly, the idea of a league, which had been accepted as desirable if possible, eventually became in the minds of the delegates an axiom. Unconsciously and of necessity the league was tied up in the treaties.

"Belief in the necessity of the league was reenforced by the sudden realization that the conference itself had, since the month of January, been performing all the functions of a league of nations. It had done far more than merely prepare treaties and covenants. It had supervised and controlled every phase of European life that seemed likely to produce trouble; it had dispatched troops to agitated districts, sent out commissions of inquiry and arbitration, looked after the distribution of food for starving regions, the running of railway trains, the operation of mines, the settlement of strikes; in short, prevented the revival of the reign of force. It had to do this or see Europe perish. And it continued to do this even after the council of four dispersed, for Europe needed a league of nations; indeed, future historians will find it difficult to decide where the conference ended and where the league began.

"Another axiom assumed by the delegates at Paris was that the United States would play its full part in the league. Everyone realized that we are essential to the existence of the league, not merely because of our strength and the important part we have played in world affairs since the days of Roosevelt, but also because we are the sole power whose attitude in European affairs is disinterested. It is impossible to overstate the degree of trust in our honesty manifested by the smaller powers of Europe. Some of them, perhaps, have been irritated by the cold impartiality which our delegates showed toward them in their disputes with neighboring States. But their confidence in our sense of justice is unqualified. The leader of the Ukrainian delegation in Paris, who had felt that his claims had received small consideration and who was not in a complimentary state of mind, remarked, after Mr. Wilson's declaration of policy on Adriatic problems: 'We will accept any decision made by the council of four, so long as America is represented on it.' If the league is to last and if peace is to be maintained, the smaller nations must have absolute confidence in the integrity of the league's leaders, and that confidence depends upon the full participation of the United States.

"It was thus with mingled horror and incredulity that the various delegations at Paris listened to the reports of opposition in the Senate to the league. And almost invariably foreign delegates finished their questions as to the attitude of the different Senators with the remark, 'When America learns what conditions are, the opposition will die.' They assumed that we would go into the league for the same reasons that had led us into the war, reasons based upon duty and upon self-interest. We could not, as a matter of conscience, allow Europe to approach the brink of destruction so long as we had means to help her. We could not, as a plain matter of business, afford to see her torn by revolution or war. The interests of the different portions of this globe are now too closely interdependent to permit us in the New World to go quietly about our business while the Old World burns.

"It seems superfluous to emphasize the vital interest which we in America have in the tranquillity of Europe. But one hears so frequently the assertion that it is no business of ours whether Czechs quarrel with Poles, or Jugo-Slavs with Italians, that it is wise to remember that the Great War itself began in a dispute between Austria and Serbia, and that it seemed impossible to prevent its development into a world-wide conflagration which was so much a matter of interest to us that we sent overseas an Army of more than 2,000,000 men. It is because we do not wish to spend again the blood and money which the last war cost us, that we must concern ourselves in the business of stamping out the incipient blazes which threaten to arise from the sparks of the great fire that have not yet been completely extinguished. We may not approve the creation of the new little States, potential germs of new wars, but they are there and can not be left to themselves. The only choice for us is whether we care to help them to live peacefully and profitably or whether we are going to let them set the train to a new explosion. Nor can we expect successfully to allay the rising tide of industrial and social unrest in this country, so long as our own business conditions are disturbed by the danger of revolution and war abroad.

"Everyone will admit that the league in its present form ought to be amended sooner or later; the covenant was constructed exactly with a view to such amendment and development. No one can say whether or not the league, even when amended, 'will work'; certainly no one would be so foolish as to assert that it will insure us absolutely against war. It is a fact, however, that the idea of the league was necessary to the successful termination of the labors of the conference, and is equally necessary if the treaties are to be carried into effect. So essential is a league of nations to the tranquillity of Europe that it was only by performing the functions of such a league that the conference tided over a period as critical as any produced during the war itself. There are not many of those who spent last spring abroad who will not agree with the remark of Veniselos: 'Without a league of nations Europe would face the future with despair in its heart.'"

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota for the purpose of having something printed.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Walsh County Record, published at Grafton, N. Dak., entitled "Idealistic metamorphosis." It has reference to the league of nations.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Walsh County Record.]

"IDEALISTIC METAMORPHOSIS.

"It is a strange and peculiarly interesting thing to the people of the United States, says the Detroit Free Press, that their Monroe doctrine, which the league of nations vitiates, was forced into existence to safeguard America against the outworkings of the Holy Alliance—that idealistic prototype of the league of nations covenant itself. Odd, indeed, that the milleniumesque league of a hundred years ago should have been advocated, insisted upon, and brought into being by a Czar of all the Russias. Yet such was the fact. Alexander I, that unbalanced contrast of rabid goodness and devilish ruthlessness, grandson of the despotic and immoral Catherine II, successor to the czardom by a conspiracy in which his own father, Czar Paul, was strangled in his scarf, fell under the mystical philosophy and the pietistic dreaminess of the notorious Baroness Krudener. This occurred after Alexander had gone to Paris, following the fall of Napoleon. As the Czar's 'conscience' was instrumental in filling him with a rush of sentimentalism which culminated in his forcing Prussia and Austria to join with Russia in the Holy Alliance, a scheme of pious idealism whereby the relations of the States of Christendom were to be regulated by the principles of Christian charity, to wit, that:

"All the powers which shall choose solemnly to avow the sacred principles which have dictated the present act will be received with equal ardor and affection into this holy alliance.

"The famous article 1 of that sweet dream reads as follows:

"The three contracting monarchs will remain united by the bonds of a true and indissoluble fraternity, and, considering each other as fellow countrymen, they will on all occasions and in all places lend each other aid and assistance; and regarding themselves toward their subjects and armies as fathers of families, they will lead them, in the same spirit of fraternity with which they are animated, to protect religion, peace, and justice.

"Along with the three 'principal powers,' to use the phraseology of the league of nations covenant, this post-Napoleonic dream of a community of Christian States was acceded to by Naples, Sardinia, France, and Spain, as 'allied and associated powers,' and it received as well the commendation though not the signature of the prince regent of Great Britain. Metternich, though he privately sneered at the treaty, and though no one, save the Russian Czar, had any utopian illusions about it, adroitly proceeded to use it as the basis for the conferences of Troppau and Laybach and the congresses of Karlsbad and Verona, which were intended to unite the powers in support of absolutism everywhere. The most noteworthy development from this Holy Alliance was the attempt to extend its operation to the New World by the coercion af Spain's revolted colonies. This threatened invasion of American autonomy, together with the proposed colonization of the Pacific coast of North America by Russia, the leader in the alliance, brought from the Government of the United States the enunciation of that very same Monroe doctrine which the present league of nations covenant, if it be unamended, relegates to the innocuous and important status of a 'regional understanding.'"

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article by Israel Zangwill, appearing in the New York American, with reference to the league of nations.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"'LEAGUE OF DAMNATIONS' ADDS WILSON'S FAILURE TO THE WORLD'S, SAYS ZANGWILL—DECLARES PRESIDENT, HAD HE RETURNED FROM PARIS HEARTBROKEN AT DEFEAT BY DARK FORCES OF EUROPE, WOULD HAVE BEEN GREATEST SUCCESS IN HISTORY—SOLD THE PEACE IN EXCHANGE FOR THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"[By Israel Zangwill.]

"LONDON, September 15.

"I doubt if ever in human history anything has been so written about and so little thought out as the league of nations.

"One imagined from certain noble and luminous utterances that at least President Wilson understood it. But 'tis a wise father that knows his own child, and the complacency with which he carried back to America the grotesque changeling argues that he has no real acquaintance with the cherub he begot on the world's imagination. We have, indeed, his own confession of the humorous surprise with which he suddenly realized that under his league there would be no neutrals, so that the vexed question of the freedom of the seas would not arise. But even this confession was a further error, for, apart from the nations excluded, the conditions of the league allow any existing member to withdraw after due notice, and thus to become a neutral in any wars waged by the league or by other nations similarly standing outside it.

"Months before he sailed to Paris he had pontificated upon the league and upon the indispensability of its inclusion in the peace treaty, but his sense of infallibility seems unshaken even by his own avowal of his misconception or by the consciousness he can hardly escape that on the question of peace or war he has boxed the political and spiritual compass. He still stoutly maintains that 'the work of the conference squares as a whole with the principles agreed upon as the basis of peace.' It is a happy and enviable temperament, but it belongs rather to the Chadbands than to the Christs.

"IF WILSON HAD ONLY NOT VACILLATED.

"Had President Wilson returned home heartbroken at his defeat by the dark forces of Europe, he would have been the greatest success in human history. But that he should triumphantly wave scraps of paper from which the fourteen points have been practically erased, here is the true tragedy of his downfall.

"It adds his own failure to the world's.

"We need only compare Wilson's appraisal of his own achievement with that of Gen. Smuts, who has replaced him as humanity's hope. The President's voice is now that of the politician pleading that the intricate pattern of international relationship was cut too deep by historic circumstances to be ignored or reversed.

"The belated discovery does as little credit to Mr. Wilson, the historian, as his failure to transcend the historic obstacles does to the man of action. Before entering the war, whose issue he held in the hollow of his hand, he should have bound Europe by contract to his principles and swept away the 'old entanglements,' even though—and it is a curious indictment from the man who had allied America with these Governments by reason of their unmitigated righteousness—these entanglements were 'promises which governments had made to one another in days when might and right were confused.'

"To break with past history was precisely what he had preached as the world's great need. Mankind was to take a leap in the light and to rise into a new plane of world unity. A new heart, Gen. Smuts reminds us, was to be given to us, no less than to our enemies, being, as we were, all members of one another. We were to be just to those even to whom we did not wish to be just. Alas! The peace is less just than many a treaty under the old order. So far from the spirit of a new brotherhood of mankind pervading the conference, the big four who made the peace treaty could hardly keep it among themselves.

"IN A STRAIT-JACKET AT INTRIGUE.

"Not that Mr. Wilson had forgotten his ideal. Indeed, it was his undoing. Lured on by his dream and fooled to the top of his bent, he sold the peace in exchange for the league of nations. And the league of nations that was palmed off on him is merely a device for guaranteeing the injustices of the peace treaty and eternalizing them. Both as a bargainer and an apostle President Wilson suffered defeat.

"Not only is the league not a league of nations nor the peace treaty a treaty of peace, but President Wilson's tenaciously achieved embodiment of the first in the second is a triumph as hollow as the rest. For the whole point of the incorporation of the league in the peace treaty was that the coexistence of this covenant of cooperation, this new world order, would react enormously on the nature of the settlement, substituting good will for hate, and reducing racial frictions to a minimum by the world policy of the open door and free and equal access to ports, harbors, and railways. In particular, boundary questions would be denuded of their significance, for the security of the individual frontier would depend not on its fortresses or its geographical barriers but on the joint protection of the peoples.

"But instead of the new world order influencing the peace settlement, that treaty is drawn upon the assumption of the constancy of the bad old world order, and security of frontier has been pursued even to the sacrifice of the vaunted 'principle of nationality.' Indeed, so far from the league reacting on the peace settlement and mitigating it, it is—as already indicated—the harshness of the peace settlement that has reacted on the league. Being associated with the peace treaty, the league of nations has touched pitch and been defiled. Far better had the league been created in the calm of peace.

"Instead of facilitating and simplyfying the peace settlement, as complicated issues are lightened the moment parties come together in good will, it has added its own asymmetry and lack of principle to the cumbrous complexity of the treaty. The two covenants have indeed been signed as one, but despite their common taint the union remains monstrous and hybrid. The mountain in labor has produced an uncouth and sinister bat.

"It is not in fact a league of nations that has been brought forth, but a league of damnations. Despite the promise of preferential treatment to a democratized Germany, the united vengeances of England, France, and America have been wreaked upon the German Republic in the concoction of the peace terms, and these nations further ally themselves to see that the conditions are exacted and the handicap of them never henceforth transcended.

"In diminishing and crippling Germany to the utmost possible and in building up against her resurrection a barrier of new nations, revived or created, is at once punishment and security. The procedure is not illegitimate. Germany herself admits a measure of guilt, and had challenged the forces by which she is abased and chastised.

"Hate as well as love, death as well as life, may possibly bring peace. The spine of Germany may be irremediably broken and the proved colossal cost and ferocity of modern war may suffice to keep a soulless peace among her imperialist rivals, even though France celebrates her victory by the sinister symbolism of the Gallic cock crowing above the piled German guns in the Champs Elysees.

"What is revolting, however, is the pretense that the league of hate is a league of love, that the disintegration of Austria and the magnification of Poland are due primarily to a reverence for nationality, and that a new world order can be erected on Nemesis.

"ARTICLE 10.

"No less brazen than Mr. Wilson, Mr. Lloyd-George denies that the triple agreement with the covenant 'shows a lack of faith in the league of nations.' 'On the contrary,' he urges bouncingly, 'the league of nations will be of no value unless it has the sanction behind it of strong nations, prepared at a moment's notice to stop the aggression.'

"There is no need at all of strong nations inside the league so long as there are no strong nations outside. By the notorious article 10 every member undertakes to preserve every other against aggression. Why, then, limit this duty to the 'strong nations' or confine it to German aggression? Even while the peace conference sits a dozen aggressions by the smaller nationalties continue to keep Europe a cockpit.

"Lord Robert Cecil, the only British statesman who seriously desires the league, argues that this reinsurance of France outside the league does but specifically repeat an obligation already inherent within it. But why this duplication, this double-dealing? Is not the league of damnations rock based enough? Is it feared that at some future date a member friendly to Germany will refuse to commit the league to a joint attack upon her? If so, how foolish to have made a unanimous decision necessary! That was what destroyed the old Polish Diet and incidentally Poland. Any member had only to say 'Nie pozwalam' (I won't have it) and the proposed measure collapsed; nay, the Diet itself was dissolved.

"These leagued 'Leviathans' haughtily declare that they remain masterless, unbound even by their union. The lawless caprice of the individual nations is to be replaced by the united will of mankind, yet in the voting each may veto any measure against itself! Even when they are unanimous the league carefully commits them to nothing. They are still free to decide what action the council shall take. Our Catos are truly comical.

"They excogitate a system of world government under which each great power can do exactly as before, and to put an end to the grabbing of territories they devise a system of mandates under which each, if he so desires, administers the precise territory he has conquered. Such solemn fooling makes a record even in high politics. It leaves the invention of a swift lumbering in its rear.

"President Wilson has defined the object of his league is to keep justice between nations. That is hardly insured by a clause like article 10, which seeks to entail the spoils of war and render them the inalienable property of the present conquerors.

"The article in question might lead to monstrous injustices not only against the defeated countries but even among the present Allies. Instead of a pact to guarantee one another's territorial integrity, the leagued nations should have undertaken to readjust one another's frontiers when necessary according to the variations of populations or their economic situation.

"ARBITRATION SETBACK.

"It is true there is a provision that disputes shall be referred to arbitration, but the arbitrators would surely have to recognize that such disputes can not embrace redistribution of territories, since any diminution of boundaries has been barred for all time by article 10.

"Moreover, were the league's object really to do justice between the nations, it would at once apply self-determination to the conquests of its own members. Shantung would cease to trouble and Egypt be at rest. A British Gibraltar or a French Syria would become unthinkable. All rankling grievances thus removed and their recurrence provided against, a small common force would suffice to police the planet.

"But the league being not a league of nations but of damnations, justice other than punitive can not enter into it. Here, too, lies the explanation of the embarrassment of its founders when confronted with the problem of admitting Germany.

"How, indeed, invite Germany into an anti-German league? But unable to confess the truth, even to themselves, they can only flounder and prevaricate. The popular slogan that Germany is not to be trusted provides a convenient cover for delay.

"President Wilson, like Lord Robert Cecil, finds consolation for the deficiencies of the treaty in the imperfections of the league. The league is a live thing, not a dead system, they urge; it will grow and reshape the treaty. But how, on the farcical basis of unity, anything can be amended in the treaty contrary to the selfish interest of a member of the council is not explained.

"As for improvements in the league itself, they are only possible if ratified by the majority of the outer assembly, and even then it is expressly provided that 'no amendment shall bind any member of the league which signifies its dissent therefrom,' though 'in that case it shall cease to be a member of the league.'

"Seldom has a contract been made with so many loopholes. An agreement designed by a firm of shady solicitors to protect the operations of a gang of swindlers could hardly be less binding than the covenant in which President Wilson finds 'the only hope of mankind.'

"If mankind is ever to cure itself of war, it will not be by making a false diagnosis of the disease. At the historic session of the Paris conference on January 27, Mr. Lloyd-George, in seconding the resolution to concert a league of nations, told how on the previous Sunday he had visited a French battle zone, so dismally devastated—even by France's own guns—and so populous with murdered youth that his feeling was, 'Surely it is time, surely it is time that a saner plan for settling disputes between peoples should be established than this organized savagery.'

"WAR IS NOT ABOLISHED.

"The disputes between nations being always in essence, which is the stronger? What other way is there of deciding them save that of physical force? The friction between peoples invariably arises from the collision of two life forces. The nations are biological organisms which in their expansiveness press upon one another, and seek to restrict, impede, override, or even absorb one another, so that the survival of the smaller powers is only secured by their diplomatic alliances or ententes with the great powers, or by the mutual rivalries of these latter which will allow none of them to swallow the morsel coveted by all. But since it is always nowadays a question of clashing interests—for even revolt against alien domination comes under this head—there is no arbitrament but that crude trial of strength we call war, and no nation ever goes to war unless it feels it has at least a fighting chance of success. Even a little people like the Boers stands up against the great British Empire in the hope that victory will cost the distant people too dear for pursuance, as the American revolutionists did.

"The price of nationality is war, and with war eradicated patriotism would become planetary. It is to guard against such a consummation that the instinct of the elder statesmen has set up the league of damnations."

STEEL STRIKE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I was unable to be here during the morning hour, but I ask unanimous consent at this time to submit, out of order, a resolution with reference to the steel strike investigation now in progress before the Committee on Education and Labor.

The resolution (S. Res. 202) was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, or any subcommittee thereof, having been heretofore directed to investigate the steel strike, is hereby empowered to sit and act at such time and place as it may deem necessary; to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents; to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Subpœnas for witnesses shall be isued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or subcommittee thereof. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The expense thereof shall be paid from the contingent funds of the Senate on vouchers ordered by said committee signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

NEW JERSEY PARTY PLATFORMS.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I desire permission to insert in the RECORD a dispatch regarding the political State conventions held in New Jersey yesterday. An extract from the platform adopted by the Democratic Party at the State convention in New Jersey held yesterday is short, and I will read it. The resolution declares—

That the league of nations covenant should not be approved without giving recognition to the Irish republic.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"JERSEY PARTY PLATFORMS—DEMOCRATS AGAINST LEAGUE UNLESS IRISH REPUBLIC IS RECOGNIZED.

"TRENTON, N. J., September 30, 1919.

"The Republican and Democratic State conventions were held here to-day, and each adopted a platform for the campaign in New Jersey.

"The Republicans declared that as the prohibition amendment is part of the Federal Constitution, it will not be necessary for New Jersey to ratify it, and that, in fact, it is no longer a political issue. This plank met with the approval of the New Jersey Antisaloon League, and an announcement was made that the league would not therefore put up an independent candidate. The Republicans also recommended that the question of New Jersey's ratification of the woman-suffrage amendment be put to a referendum of the State.

"The Democratic convention, after some contention, adopted a plank for the immediate ratification of the woman-suffrage amendment and declared for opposition to the prohibition amendment by all lawful means. The administration of President Wilson was indorsed, and he and the Democratic Party were congratulated on the successful outcome of the war.

"A resolution was adopted declaring that the league of nations covenant should not be approved without giving recognition to the Irish Republic."

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. I now ask for the regular order.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the pending House bill has been under consideration before the Senate for some time. I understand there is only one more amendment to be disposed of, and it does seem to me that in fairness to the bill it ought to be acted on.

Mr. LODGE. I will gladly yield to take a vote on the bill.

Mr. McLEAN. There is one more amendment, and I understand that will close the debate.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know about closing the debate.

Mr. McLEAN. If it leads to debate, I will not ask the Senator to yield further.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to delay that bill at all; but I dislike to yield when the treaty comes up at 2 o'clock and is laid before the Senate, and then be reproached the next morning for filibustering. I think I will insist upon my motion.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I do not propose to undertake a discussion of the entire treaty of peace with Germany. It is before us, written in two languages and printed upon 537 pages.

The Committee on Foreign Relations has reported the treaty, recommending some textual amendments and also some reservations. The textual amendments are designed to accomplish the following purposes:

1. To give to the United States an increase of representation in the assembly of the league of nations;

2. To eliminate the United States from participation in the work of certain commissions which are set up to deal with matters connected with the execution of the treaty;

3. To effectuate the transfer of German rights in the Shantung Peninsula to China instead of to Japan; and

4. To exclude the votes of self-governing colonies and dominions when what I may call the parent State is interested in the dispute.

The reservations proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations deal entirely with the league of nations.

In the remarks I am about to make it is my intention to confine myself to a discussion of the league of nations provisions, refraining from attempting to outline or discuss the controversial phases of the general treaty of peace.

Long before the league of nations covenant was drafted Senators were prematurely discussing it. The indications were quite clear that this covenant, whatever might be its provisions, was doomed to meet with denunciation the moment it made its first appearance before the world. It was very apparent that a chorus of jeers was waiting to greet it upon its birth. The subject with which it undertook to deal was nothing less momentous than the future peace of the world. That means that, in purpose at least, it was designed to reduce the possibilities of war. The high ends of this purpose, its noble ideals and lofty aspirations, are best known to the sorrowing survivors of 10,000,000 dead men and to 20,000,000 maimed men, their companions and loved ones on whom this war has cast the burden of its great grief; and more especially to the families of 60,000 American lads whose bones lie in alien soil, and over 50,000 other American lads who will, through the years, drag their legless, armless, or eyeless bodies to the grave, constant and visible evidence to their fellows of the horrors and curse of war. These are the ones who best know something of the thing which this league is intended, in part at least, to prevent, and who feel with animated hope something of the nobility and seriousness of purpose with which this great attempt to secure the peace of the world is laden.

Yet, as serious and noble as was the purpose with which this league was animated, as lofty as was its aim and sacred its cause, its first appearance was greeted with scoffs from the lips of statesmen who had been chosen by their fellow men to share in the leadership of this Nation to higher and better things. If there was any weapon in the armory of skillful dialectics calculated to be of use in injuring or destroying a great idea that was not ardently seized and vigorously used against the league, it has escaped my attention. Against it were directed ridicule, sarcasm, denunciation, and at times gross misrepresentation, abuse, and vilification.

I said that from the moment of its first appearance, namely, when the original draft was published in the forepart of February of this year, the league met with a storm of abuse. The wrath which had been gathering against it before its features were ever seen was poured forth in steady volume upon its head. Had it been handed down from heaven, given to man by the Savior himself, there is at least one Senator who, according to his spoken word on this floor, would summarily reject it.

The first and tentative draft of the league covenant was submitted to the world about February 13 last. It was revised and submitted to the Senate in its final form on July 10. Thus elapsed a period of five months. It lay in the Foreign Relations Committee for two more months and then, namely, on the 10th of September, it came out of that committee along with the rest of the German treaty, and thus for the first time got on the floor of this body for orderly debate.

Entertaining the theory that it would be more appropriate to discuss the league when the same became the regular order of the Senate, I have until now refrained from indulging in its discussion. Other Senators, however, entertained a different view, and so, quite to the exclusion of other matters that were pressing for attention and constituted the regular order of legislative business, have been using the best part of seven months declaiming their views in this body on this subject, when, now that the matter is before the Senate in the regular order, the subject approaches being stale.

But notwithstanding that the debate has thus prematurely proceeded for seven months and the subject, therefore, has been pretty well canvassed, I purpose to submit my views upon some phases of the question. I am aware that in so doing I am in danger of traversing ground that has been traveled by other and more able Senators than I; but I am encouraged to proceed, even at the expense of at times repeating the substance of what others may have said, by the example set by the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], whose most recent speech, which was greeted with so much applause throughout the country, had in essence been delivered a score or more of times before by others who preceded him in this body.

As I have considered the plan for a league of nations as set out in this treaty and reflected upon it with that degree of attention and seriousness which the vast importance of the subject demands, I have ever sought to keep my thoughts free from the contamination of party politics. I have conceived that renegade to his duty is that citizen, whether he be in the Senate of the United States or out of the Senate of the United States, who would allow this great question to be determined in his mind by the exigencies of party politics or colored with the prejudice of political bias. I confess that at times I have regretted to see evidences of what seemed to me to be a disposition on the part of some to make of this issue a football of party politics. Dealing as it does with our foreign relations, with the desire of the world to relieve the masses of men from the blighting curse of war and the peoples of the earth from the ever-increasing financial burdens of arms and armaments, seeking as it does to do something in the direction of quelling the international riots of the worlds and inducing nations to compose their differences by pacific means, the subject is fraught too much with the destiny of men and the welfare of humanity to permit it to be determined in the light of next year's presidential election. And so, making no pretense of a superior aloofness from party feelings, and therefore claiming for myself no transcendent quality of dispassionate judgment, I have, nevertheless, sought to think solely and entirely in terms of our country's welfare and its duty as a great nation in the family of nations.

Notwithstanding that there is an impression amongst the people of the country that this covenant is a very complicated and intricate affair, the fact is that it is drafted in simple language, and in such style that any man with common mentality is able, upon a careful reading of it, to form his own intelligent conclusion as to what it means.

It is to be regretted that the public has not more generally read and studied this covenant. As it has been represented by its enemies, its friends would hardly know it. The quantity of misinformation and misunderstanding that has been spread throughout the land through the public prints regarding the nature and scope of the provisions of the league, to those of us who have desired to see the matter discussed strictly on its merits and in the light of its actual provisions, the extraordinary extent of these misunderstandings I confess is appalling.

In listening to speeches made by Senators against this covenant, I have been struck by an inconsistency common to many of them. With respect to some of these addresses one half of the speech is devoted to proving that the league is a powerful superstate set up on top of the nations with authority to order them about at will, while the other half of the speech is devoted to proving that the league is a spineless thing so inefficacious to accomplish its purposes as to merit the charge that it is but a rope of sand. Thus the first half cracks the skull of the last and the last half cracks the skull of the first, while at the close the whole speech may be said to have exterminated itself. It is an oratorical felon de se.

While I have no intention of burdening the Senate with a detailed analysis of the league covenant, as I understand it, yet I do desire to submit some general views respecting it, and some more specific views regarding the outstanding objections raised against it.

The league of nations, instead of being a league to promote peace, has been referred to by its enemies as a league to create wars. Of course, Mr. President, if this league were thought to be a breeder of wars, no man who so regards it ought to vote for it.

But instead of believing that a brood of wars kennels in its womb, I am of the diametrically opposite opinion, that it will most materially aid in engendering and preserving the world's peace. I think no man is so venturesome in thought as to assert with ex cathedra positiveness that upon the adoption of this league, war is thereafter forever impossible. At least, I make no such claim. Men are not yet angels, nor has the millennium yet arrived. If so, there would be no necessity for considering an international effort to induce mankind to behave. The very fact that there still exists the imperfections of the race and the selfishness of man is the thing which raises the necessity for some organized effort to hold in check those passions of man which express themselves through national groups seeking to accomplish their ends by organized force. So long as human nature remains as it is there is always the chance that, against the most perfect of plans for the promotion of peace, some perverse or impetuous nation may launch itself in defiant conflict. This may be said with respect to the present plan as it may well be said of any other plan, even though such other plan had sprung from no less a source than the unerring brains of the leaders of this opposition.

But, sir, the proposed plan is the only one in sight. It is the only one that commands a large enough body of world opinion to render adoption at all probable. All other plans that the critics mention are so nebulous as to consist only of general statements of sentiments to the effect that the proposer hates war and loves peace, and is in favor of abolishing the one and perpetuating the other—sentiments very fine, but, unaccompanied as they are with detail of suggestion as to how they are to be realized, utterly worthless in this pragmatical world. Of what use is it to announce yourself as opposed to murder unless you are prepared to offer a practical method of discouraging it? And why stop at approving a homicide statute because, forsooth, some blood-letting thug may disregard it?

And so, Mr. President, common sense, hard, practical, common sense, will turn a deaf ear to those who prate of their detestation of war and their enamorment of peace, but who never get beyond that point and insist on fighting against the only possible and practicable plan to achieve their hopes, while they disclose nothing of their own by way of remedy. Such self-confessed impoverishment of suggestion can not be expected to address a very persuasive appeal to men and women everywhere who are looking and longing for a definite and practical step forward toward their cherished goal.

Whatever may be the views as to the efficacy of this covenant to actually promote peace, no one questions that such is its avowed purpose. And I am firmly convinced that this purpose is as fully subserved by the covenant as it could be by any plan which, in this world of clashing national interests, could be devised. We must ever bear in mind that it is no easy task to induce all the important nations of the world to reconcile their varying desires and to so compromise their divers views as to finally come together in agreement upon a common plan for peace. This particular plan by passing the peace conference has traveled a long, long way on the road to actual acceptance. I dare say that if it is now obstructed a disappointed world will wait many, many decades before any other peace plan that may be proposed will advance so far toward general world approval. In the meantime, the nations may, during the period of waiting, again be plunged into another world war whose dimensions and whose destructiveness no man can in his most extravagant imagination forecast.

This circumstance ought to admonish us that we should approach the consideration of this particular plan with all prepossessions in its favor, and not in a spirit of hostility, founded, if you please, on narrow views as to some of its features or on some pique against one or more of its authors. For if this plan fails of acceptance and again the scourge of world war should lash humanity, the future would be pardoned, and justly so, if it failed not to visit its curses on those of us who thus recklessly rejected this great attempt to promote the permanence of the world's peace. It is vastly more important to help the world forward to quiet and order than it is to determine the political complexion of the next national administration or the personality of the presidential nominees in the 1920 elections.

Mr. President, this covenant contains among its provisions one feature that to me seems of transcendent importance. This feature is embodied in articles 12, 13, and 15. By these articles the nations agree not to go to war over disputes likely to lead to a rupture until the matter has either been submitted to voluntary arbitration or, failing that, to investigation by the council; and the award made by the arbitrators, in case there was arbitration, and the report made by the council, in case it is unanimously made by all the members other than the disputants, is binding on the nations involved. In case a report by the council is not unanimously concurred in, then, after three months, recourse to war is as free and unrestrained as ever. In that event, Mars may then shake his gory locks, bare his blood-stained arms, summon death to his side, and proceed in triumph to crush and mangle bodies of men and break the hearts of women and children. Thus even under this covenant there remains some slight consolation to the jingoes.

But if any nation should violate the obligation to refrain from war during the period of the arbitration or investigation, or should fail to abide the award made by the arbitrators, or to accept the unanimous report of the council, such failure constitutes ipso facto an act of war against the members of the league.

I shall not analyze these articles. They aim at two things, both exceedingly meritorious. First, they aim to obligate nations to pause before rushing to war. Hasty action is foreclosed. Investigation, discussion, and a report on the facts and issues by an impartial body are brought into play, and thus is accomplished the result of allowing blood and passion to cool while the conscience of the world addresses itself to an attempt at solution of the difficulty. Is not this a most wise provision? It is founded in the elementary principle of universal human nature that if men can be induced to defer action until the heart is cool and the head dispassionately thinking, a just and wise course of action will ensue. In some twenty-odd treaties with as many nations the United States has already gone on record as approving of the utilization of this principle in our international relations. This league brings all the world within the scope of the peace-promoting spirit of this principle.

Second. These articles aim to settle the dispute in an amicable way, and if any nation would disregard the provisions of these articles then such disobedience constitutes, ipso facto, a hostility against all the other members of the league. What, then, follows? Why, sir, the economic pressure of the world is automatically brought to bear on the recalcitrant nation. The power of this pressure is of sufficient potency to cause any nation to pause before involving its consequences. And so there is strong ground to believe that the fear of this economic force will restrain obstreperous nations.

No nation can, under these articles or under any other article, be forced against its will to take up arms against the offending State. War as the remedial punishment is left to the discretion of each member. This point it is important to mention, in view of the loose talk to the contrary thereof. But while war is not compulsory on the nations, yet the offense being such as to entitle any member nation to regard it as sufficient cause for war, and there being a provision that the council may "recommend" military measures as the proper corrective, there therefore is behind the economic penalties this more ominous thing of possible physical force which a jingoistic state would be afraid, and therefore unwilling, to arouse against itself.

Suppose such an arrangement as this had existed prior to 1914. Does anyone suppose that Germany would have pursued the course she did? Would she not have dreaded the economic penalties her course would have involved; and if this had not been sufficient to restrain her, would not the mere possibility of war with the whole world, ominously hovering over her deliberations, have stayed her murderous hand? I was struck by the assertion of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], made in this Chamber on the 18th of last December, that if the United States should simply and alone announce to the world that we would view with grave concern any power or combination of powers which menaced the freedom and peace of Europe, such bare announcement would in itself prevent any such conflict in the future. Perhaps so. But I doubt it. At all events, I am convinced that if the Senator's remarks were true, a fortiori is it true that such an announcement not by us alone but as well by all the great nations of the world in conjunction with us would undoubtedly have that effect. And yet, in some of its aspects, is not this league an announcement by all member nations that the whole world will view with concern any conflict disturbing any portion of its peace, and not only so, but will restrain such conflict by economic penalties and possibly by armed force?

By article 8 the covenant sets up a plan for reduction of national armaments. This plan contemplates that the council shall devise a program of world-wide armament reduction and recommend the same for consideration by the nations. Acceptance is not compulsory. Those, therefore, who have been quarreling at the covenant because it compels the Congress to surrender its constitutional power over the Army and Navy are grossly in error. Congress can disregard the recommendation if it chooses. Its right to do so is expressly recognized by the article.

An attempt ought to be at least made to eliminate this mad international armament contest between the nations. It is the curse of the age. It did much to bring on the present war. Germany raced England for naval supremacy and France raced Germany for military superiority. All the nations to a greater or less degree were entered in the great contest. In the meantime, while the Governments were arming for fight, the people were paying the bill. The financial burden was bending the back of the world. This article 8 offers an honest attempt to lighten this burden, and at the same time to control the national possession of deadly weapons. By its inspection provisions it also undertakes to prevent a nation from carrying such weapons concealed.

Mr. President, if this league be not adopted, the nations will be thrown back on their old resources. If we are not to have this plan for peaceably composing national differences, then each nation must look after itself in its own way; the old program of building fleets and creating armies will be fallen back on. The present can not forecast the extent of the burdens that such a program will impose on a world already staggering under a crushing load of debt and in large measure verging on bankruptcy. For my part, if things are to go along in the future as in the past, and we are to be deprived of the opportunity to try out this plan for keeping the world's peace, as much as I shall deplore the necessity, yet I shall not hesitate to cast my votes in the Congress in favor of an army and navy of such size as to be commensurate with the greatness and the responsibility of this Republic, surrounded as it will be by militant powers armed to the teeth, so that if world war shall come again, America may be fully prepared to outdo any foe in the deadly conflict.

We are told, Mr. President, that if we enter into this league of nations covenant, we are departing from the traditional policies of our past; they tell us, the critics, that America has grown up on these shores isolated from the Old World with a barrier between the hemispheres which enabled us to live our life according to our own notions, work out our destiny on this side of the sea without interference or disturbance from abroad; and that if we enter into the covenant we can no longer pursue this alleged policy of our past but must consent to the intermingling of our affairs with the affairs of Europe and of Europe's affairs with ours. Our traditional policy of isolation which self-appointed defenders of Americanism are constantly speaking of and so valiantly fighting to preserve, they tell us, is in danger of destruction, and with it the might and power and glory of the Republic.

Mr. President, this country is not isolated from the Old World. It never has been. Even when we were thirteen original Colonies scattered up and down this sparsely settled seaboard we were not free from Europe. Every European war of any consequence during the period of our colonial history reflected itself on this side of the ocean, and the Colonies were frequently found, here on American shores, fighting over the issues that were tearing Europe asunder.

After we gained our independence our affairs continued to be involved with those of Europe, notwithstanding the fact that we were a recognized Nation and the difficulties of transportation and communication still were such as to tend to keep the Old and New Worlds apart. The Napoleonic wars touched us. We were the victims of British orders in council and French decrees. So greatly were we harassed by the European belligerents that sometimes it seemed that we should be at war with England and at other times at war with France. The diplomatic history of that period is largely made up of our attempt to compel Europe to let us alone, and to observe the isolation which we were desiring to enjoy.

At the close of the Napoleonic wars a series of peace treaties and understandings among European nations were negotiated, which eventually culminated in the Holy Alliance. Without undertaking to review the history leading up to the forming of that alliance, I shall content myself simply with saying that, though it was purely European in origin, in thought, and in purpose, yet it reached its influences across the Atlantic to these shores and undertook to establish its purposes in the South American Continent in such a way as led us to believe that for our self-protection measures must be taken against it. At that juncture of our affairs, whatever the theory of statesmen may be, we were certainly not enjoying a state of isolated sovereignty. Out of the machinations of the European autocrats, who were working through the agency of the Holy Alliance, was developed a state of affairs in America that resulted in the announcement of our Monroe doctrine. In a real sense, therefore, Mr. President, it may be said that the Monroe doctrine in 1823 constitutes unmistakable proof of the fact that at that date we were far from isolation.

The war from which we have just emerged ought to convince the most casual thinker that in no sense of the word can this country be regarded as isolated from the affairs of Europe. The murder of an Austrian prince in Austrian territory by an Austrian subject developed into an incident which threw all Europe into the throes of a conflict which, after the lapse of three years, drew America into its horrible vortex. In the light of this, our most recent experience, who is the man so superficial in thought as to insist that America may with safety regard herself as thoroughly detached from the world's disputes and therefore unconcerned with their prevention? Why do Senators persist in ignoring the lesson taught by the most recent facts and continue to prate about our state of isolation? Theorize as much as we will, to those who blindly insist that with Europe's affairs we have, and can have, no concern; that from her and her quarrels we are free, I say the stern facts, the sad but compelling facts which contemporaneous history has thrust upon us, supply irrefutable denial. Every tear that glistens in the eye of an American mother whose son lies in a French field, every sigh that agitates the bosom of an American father who, when he thinks of his dead, must cast his thoughts across the sea, are mute witnesses to the unescapable truth that America is not isolated from world affairs and that Europe's quarrels very vitally concern us. Every American woman whom this war has widowed, every American child whom this war has orphaned, everyone of the 2,000,000 men who went "over there" and returned again, leaving some of their comrades asleep among the white wooden crosses, bringing others home maimed and mangled—these know, ah, yes, how well they know, that America is not living and can not live in lone and solitary splendor on this side of the sea separated and detached from great European conflicts. Statesmen may argue and debate the matter to their complete exhaustion, but they will never convince these thousands and their thousands of loved ones that a quarrel which threatens to plunge the Old World into war is of no concern to America.

I have endeavored in a cursory sort of manner to refer to the history of our past in order to establish the proposition that this much-talked-of state of isolation does not exist to-day and never has existed throughout our whole history. Europe has intermeddled with our affairs, and her troubles have become our troubles.

On the other hand, Mr. President, it has been true that we have at times interfered and intermeddled with the affairs of Europe. I beg to recall to Senators the circumstance of the Algeciras conference of 1905. That conference was convened at Algeciras, Spain, for the purpose of settling the disputes between European powers concerning the status of Morocco. Morocco is in the northern part of Africa on the shores of the Mediterranean. In the strict sense of the word it belongs to the Old World. The dispute primarily was between France and Germany. England, because of her manifest interests, was drawn into it on the side of France. For a while it looked as though these nations were to rush to arms over the Moroccan trouble. Certainly America, having no territorial or political rights in Morocco and being separated from that portion of the earth by the wide expanse of the sea, could not in a very material sense be said to be involved in the quarrel. Yet to the Algeciras conference, which was called to settle the difficulty, President Roosevelt sent representatives of this Nation to participate in the solution of the questions involved. Our immediate justification for entering that conference was that we had certain rights under a commercial treaty of 1880. We, however, claimed no political interest. Nevertheless, our delegates participated in composing many of the political disputes that arose during the conference and very materially aided in thus preserving the European balance of power. Mr. André Tardieu, who during the German war was the French high commissioner in this country, reported the Algeciras conference, and he has stated the fact that the German Kaiser several times cabled President Roosevelt urging him to modify his instructions to the American representatives, thus indicating the part the American President played in settling the European political questions which were then threatening the peace of Europe.

The verdict of history will be that in that action President Roosevelt showed himself to be a statesman of the first order. He realized that which few of his fellow countrymen at that time realized, that the Moroccan question, in so far as it endangered the peace of Europe, was, in a very real sense of the word, an American question, for the now very manifest, though then obscure, reason that if Europe broke out into a continental war America would have great difficulty in remaining uninvolved therein.

I cite the Algeciras conference as a circumstance of recent history demonstrating that this alleged policy of isolation of which we have heard so much, while it has not kept Europe from interfering in American affairs, at the same time, so to speak, has not kept us from interfering in European affairs.

No, Mr. President, this country has never been separated from Europe. Since the Spanish-American War it can not be said that this country is separated even from Asia, for, in a very real sense, Asia has become our neighbor. We are a world power, living not in undisturbed isolation, but touching elbows with nations everywhere over the earth. Whether we will it or not, our lot is cast with the great powers of the world. Our power, our might, and, by the same token, our responsibilities, are great and vast. We can neither abandon the one nor evade the other, unless, indeed, we are prepared to write ourselves down as a nation of people suddenly found possessed with great power and as suddenly become alarmed thereat. Uncle Sam should never by his own act change his name to Young-Man-Afraid-of-His-Horse. Can this young giant of the west, this strong and mighty people, hope to enjoy the possession of all the benefits of world power and at the same time escape the burden that history teaches mankind is inevitably attached to such possession?

What concerns the world certainly must be the concern of this country. The only time that the barrier of complete isolation, so eloquently described and so fondly clung to by Senators of the United States in their assaults upon this covenant, has in fact existed was prior to 1492, when Columbus with his galleons sailed the unknown sea. Before then America, roamed over by savage hordes, was in the true sense of the word isolated from the Old World. Since then there has been a connection with the Old World growing stronger and more intimate as the years advanced and the affairs of men spread.

We are further told, Mr. President, that we should not enter this league of nations because we will be departing from the teachings of the fathers who warned us against forming alliances. In this connection the words of the great Washington are frequently quoted, as also are the words of Jefferson. Washington warned against permanent alliances, and Jefferson uttered words of warning against entangling alliances. In view of the fact that so much is being made of the argument that if we adopt this league we will be thrown into an alliance condemned by the traditions of the fathers, I pause for a moment to examine the attitude of the founders of this Republic toward the question of alliances.

I wish to note, however, that though this league may have some of the features of an alliance, yet I conceive it inaccurate to describe the league as an alliance in the sense that the word is commonly used. I interject this statement in order that I may not be understood to subscribe to the idea that this league is an alliance in the ordinary acceptation of the term.

It is, of course, familiar history that after our independence we adopted a treaty of alliance with France. The question of the extent of the obligation thus made was, after we had changed our form of government from the Articles of Confederation to the Union under the Constitution, a subject that agitated the public mind of this country for some time and occasioned one of the disputes in Washington's Cabinet. A significant fact, however, is that the very men who are now quoted as opposing alliances of all kinds themselves approved of the alliance with France. This, to be sure, may be counted an exceptional case, because of the extreme urgency of our necessities when we were at war with Great Britain fighting to retain our recently declared independence. The fact, however, remains, that the authors of American liberty were not so unalterably opposed to alliances as to lead them to decline this one with France.

Washington in his celebrated Farewell Address never gave expression to views that would condemn all alliances of every kind. On the contrary, he approved of alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

When President Monroe was formulating his ideas which eventually embodied themselves in the Monroe doctrine, he called upon Jefferson and Madison for their advice. These two American patriots, the one said to be the author of the Declaration of Independence and the other commonly called the father of the Constitution, advised Monroe to meet the aggressions of the Holy Alliance on the Western Hemisphere by negotiating a treaty of alliance with Great Britain. It was the Secretary of State, John Quincy Adams, who opposed this advice and advocated the course eventually adopted by the President of announcing our policy through a presidential message.

The significant fact in connection with this circumstance is that Jefferson, who is now brought forth as a witness against the league of nations because of its so-called entangling features, was himself, along with Madison, entirely agreeable to the idea of forming a definite and specific alliance with Great Britain against the European concert known as the Holy Alliance.

In discussing the attitude of Jefferson toward alliances or understandings with European nations, and when it is charged that he was unalterably and uncompromisingly opposed to such, it is very significant to remember that, when Napoleon forced Spain to retrocede Louisiana to France by the secret treaty of San Ildefonso in the year 1800, the occasion arose for action by President Jefferson, which very forcefully illustrates the position of that great statesman toward these so-called entangling engagements. He wrote Livingston, the American representative at Paris, as follows:

> The day that France takes possession of New Orleans fixes the sentence which is to restrain her forever within her low-water marks. It seals the union of two nations who in conjunction can maintain exclusive possession of the ocean. From that moment we must marry ourselves to the British fleet and nation. We must turn all our attentions to a maritime force, for which our resources place us on very high grounds; and having formed and cemented together a power which may render reinforcement of her settlements here impossible to France, make the first cannon which shall be fired in Europe the signal for tearing up any settlement she may have made, and for holding the two continents of America in sequestration for the common purposes of the united British and American nations.

And so, Mr. President, notwithstanding the selected sentences and carefully chosen paragraphs that may be culled from the speeches and writings of the fathers, the plain fact of the matter is that these patron saints of the Republic are known to have entertained the view that upon proper occasion the interests of America were in no danger or jeopardy by reason of international arrangements or understandings that might possess all the ordinary features of even an alliance.

In view of these historical incidents, how can it be said by any reasonable man that the league of nations is to be denounced by the principles of the fathers because of the fact that it erects machinery which brings us, with the rest of the world, into a scheme that is designed to afford pacific means for the adjustment of national disputes and a forum in which international issues may be heard and an opportunity given to the conscience of the world to express itself?

The senior Senator from Massachusetts calls this league an alliance. Waiving the question as to the accuracy of that statement and admitting it for the moment to be true, yet I assert that even though it be conceded that the league of nations is an alliance of the old familiar type, yet there is nothing in the acts or words of the leaders of the past to condemn it for that reason, provided always, of course, that the interests of America are amply and duly safeguarded.

SOVEREIGNTY.

Again, it is said that if we enter into this league we surrender the sovereignty of this Nation. What is the sovereignty of a nation? As I understand it, the term simply means the right of a nation to pursue whatever course it sees fit without holding itself responsible to any other nation or people on earth. Sovereignty is unlimited and unrestricted freedom on the part of a nation to do as it will. It recognizes no superior authority. It accords obedience to no other power. It is self-sufficient, self-contained, and irresponsible.

Before the dawn of civilization, when men were roaming in wildernesses, eating roots and living in caves, every individual was a sovereign unto himself. As these barbarians took on the first rudiments of civilization, each surrendered something of his sovereign liberty. In the course of time, as they developed into nations, the individuals were compelled to surrender greater quantities of their original sovereignty.

Similarly as nations developed and lived in more or less remoteness, in isolation one from the other, each possessed the same full, unrestricted, and unlimited sovereignty that the individual creature had enjoyed in the state of barbarism. It is as true to-day as it ever was, that there is no superior law sanctioned by external force that can in any wise entrench upon the freedom of a nation to do as it pleases. Of course, there are always the well-accepted principles of good morals that by reason of their impelling force upon conscience make it advisable for nations not to attempt to run amuck in the enjoyment of their so-called sovereignty, because so to do would not only constitute a breach of morals but as well would involve them in conflict with others. Theoretically, however, each nation retains its sovereignty with all of its original unrestrained freedom.

The individual in the State, within the field left open to him by the law under which he lives, is as free and sovereign as a nation. He can not be compelled to do anything which the law allows him to exercise his judgment upon, nor can he be restrained from doing anything which the law permits him to do. Within these limits he is his own sovereign. Yet, Mr. President, individuals by contract agree one with another not to do things which otherwise they might with propriety do and to do things which otherwise they would not have to do. This is what we call a contract obligation, and I have never yet heard the idea advanced that when two men make a contract laying down mutual obligations they thereby surrender their liberty or individual sovereignty.

By parallel of reasoning it is perfectly manifest that when sovereign nations enter into an agreement by which mutual obligations are assumed, it is entirely beyond all reason to assert that the contract thus voluntarily entered into and the obligations thus voluntarily assumed constitute on the part of the contracting nations a surrender of national sovereignty. I am surprised to hear it earnestly argued by Senators, whose ability commands my great respect, that if the United States voluntarily assumes to enter into the covenants of this league, we thereby surrender our national sovereignty. If this contention be true, every treaty we make constitutes a surrender of our sovereignty.

It is stated, iterated, and reiterated, time and time again, by opponents of this league that our sovereignty is impaired, because the league sets up a supergovernment or superstate, which is vested with a power to lay down law for the United States, and to compel the United States to obey its commands. The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] very recently, and not for the first time, I may say by way of parenthesis, advanced this view.

If this league did any such thing as that, it ought to be summarily rejected. In saying this I am confident that I voice the unanimous sentiment of every American throughout the land, for, Mr. President, let it be said in all candor that those who are advocating this league are as violently opposed to surrendering the sovereignty of this Republic to some supposed superstate as are those who are fighting against the league. The warmth of utterance, the holy zeal of declamation, the passionate profession of undying devotion to America, her flag, and her sovereignty which are so thrasonically paraded here in this Chamber and throughout the country on the hustings by those who fight this great project must not be taken as conclusive evidence that a monopoly of love for our common country is enjoyed by those who thus, for the moment, exalt themselves to the heights of patriotic sainthood.

Under this league nothing in the way of action by the United States can be forced upon us. We have our representative on the council and in the assembly of the league. When we are not a party no conclusion, either of the council or of the assembly, can be binding on us unless our representative, speaking under the instructions from this Government, agrees that we shall be bound. If any timid souls should fear that our representative would betray his trust and on some future occasion would commit us to a program our people would not approve of, then to meet such an unthinkable contingency Congress could in a proper way limit the power of our representative to act, in certain vital particulars, only in accordance with express instructions evidenced by congressional resolution.

Nowhere in all the articles of this league do I find any language that gives the slightest countenance to the idea that under its terms we become a constituent State of some world-wide international government which has power to lay down law for and issue directions to all its members regardless of the will or wish of the individual nation.

There is a provision, to which I have already referred, that if we are party to a dispute with another nation, we may agree to arbitration of the difference. If we agree to the arbitration there is a provision in this league binding us by promise to abide by the award of the arbitrators. This, Mr. President, is nothing new. This provision is quite in keeping with a long line of American precedents. I believe we now have between 70 and 75 arbitration treaties, conventions, protocols, or agreements existing between the United States and other nations of the world.

It is the proud boast of America that, in company with England, we were the first to initiate the method of settling international disputes by agreeing to peaceable arbitration. Such a provision appears in the Jay treaty of 1794. From that day to this this great Republic has been the constant advocate of the principle that nations should settle their disputes before arbitral courts if in their judgment the disputes were of such nature as to be properly justiciable before such courts.

The league of nations covenant on this point simply follows the uniform precedents of 125 years of our history. We are not bound to submit to the arbitration of any difference we may have with any other nation. The provision of the league is that we agree to submit to arbitration any differences which we may determine for ourselves to be arbitrable. In this there is nothing compulsory. In passing, I may note that ex-United States Senator Elihu Root, in his letter of March 25 to Hon. Will H. Hays, chairman of the Republican national committee, entirely approved of the arbitration features of this league of nations covenant.

The league further provides that in case we do not agree to submit our differences to arbitration we shall then submit the dispute to an investigation by the council of the league. We further agree that, pending the arbitration, if we have agreed to such, and if not, pending the investigation of the council, we will not go to war with our opponent, nor will we do so within three months after the award or the report of the council.

Now, with respect to the award in case of arbitration, I take it that the stanchest proclaimer of American sovereignty would not contend that in case the award went against us we should have the liberty to disobey it and fight, because in such case we had voluntarily entered into the arbitration and had voluntarily made the promise to abide its results.

In case of investigation by the council—which is a matter entirely different from the arbitration arrangement—it is provided that the members of the league will abide the finding of the council and will not go to war against any nation that abides by its finding, provided always, however, that the finding of the council is by the unanimous vote of the nations represented therein, excluding the parties to the dispute. Here, therefore, Mr. President, is a provision that obligates us to abide a judgment of a tribunal if the same is unanimous, even though we had not agreed in advance to submit the dispute to that tribunal and accept its finding.

This has occasioned great alarm in the breasts of the stout defenders of Americanism. Many high-flown sentences have been uttered in declaiming upon this provision. Locks have been shaken loose, throats almost torn asunder in denouncing the infamous betrayal of American liberty that such an eventuality portends. For my part, I am free to confess that I do not get alarmed over this provision, for I am reminded of the fact that before such a finding can be visited upon us it must receive the unanimous indorsement of seven great nations of the earth. If one, only one, of those seven nations can be brought to see the dispute from the point of view of America, then there never can be any finding against us. This being the case, I am free to say that if we are in a dispute with another nation and can not find one of the seven civilized nations of the world willing to agree that we are right, then surely we ought to be prepared to submit to the unanimous judgment of the civilized world that we are wrong—temporarily submit, at least. I should very much deplore seeing our country go to war over a cause that could not command the support of one single other of the great civilized nations of the earth.

If, however, after thus finding the whole civilized world unanimously disapproving of our attitude in any particular controversy, the jingoes of the nation are still persistent in their wish that the dogs of war might be unleashed, they would still be free, if they could command the support of the country in that regard, to indulge their chauvinistic propensities by giving the necessary notice of our intention to withdraw from the league and upon our due withdrawal therefrom they could to their heart's content plunge the Nation into the throes of war unrestricted and unrestrained by any obligations under this league; for, in such a contingency, being no longer members of the league, we could, of course, pursue our own sweet will even though it led to destruction.

Mr. President, while we are speaking of the danger to American sovereignty and seriously declaring our devoted and undying attachment to its preservation, what, may I ask, is to be said of the other nations of the earth? To hear the critics of this league in their most violent moments, we would infer that America was the only nation entering into this agreement. I beg to remind Senators that the sovereignty of Great Britain is as precious to her as is the sovereignty of America to us. No one has ever taxed Great Britain with unduly surrendering her freedom of action. The same may be said with respect to France and Italy and Belgium and Japan. They have a sovereignty to guard as well as do we. If this league means that America is subordinating her sovereignty to the jurisdiction of some superstate it means the same with respect to Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, Japan, and all the rest of the nations of the world.

One of the objections strenuously urged against acceptance of the league covenant is that complete freedom of action is not left to the United States in case we should at some future time desire to withdraw from the league.

On this point the original draft of the league was silent. This silence was construed by the opponents of the league to mean that under the original draft the United States could never withdraw and was permanently tied to the league.

With this point of view I found myself in complete disagreement, for I took it to be a well-established principle of international law that with respect to such treaty obligations as are embodied in this league it is the undoubted right of any nation at any time to withdraw therefrom. I shall not undertake to review the authorities on international law bearing out this proposition. After some diligent examination of the subject I was and am firmly convinced that with respect to treaty obligations similar to those embodied in the terms of the first draft of the league any member had the right, without any express reservation of the same, at any time to notify the other members of its intention to withdraw, and to follow such notice with immediate withdrawal.

The absence of any language in the first draft of the league expressly providing for the right of withdrawal was thus erroneously construed by the opponents of the league to mean that no member could ever withdraw. The President answered this criticism by repudiating the construction, stating that it was his understanding that under well-established international law it was unnecessary for any nation to specifically provide for its right to withdraw, that right being already, under general law, reserved to it.

Yet the opponents of the league so persistently insisted upon an amendment specifically providing for the right of withdrawal that the President, in order to oblige them, did, upon his return to Paris, secure the insertion in the final draft of the following language:

> Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

In this attempt to meet the demands of the opposition the President was pursuing a vain course. His error was in assuming that it was possible to satisfy the critics. Those who were persistently bent upon destroying the whole idea of the league could never be fully satisfied. Meeting their demands in one particular only resulted in their exacting new demands in another. Some of them were not after improvement; they wanted complete destruction of the covenant.

However, the foregoing language was inserted for the purpose of expressly providing for the right of withdrawal. It is now urged by the opponents of the plan that while this language gives us the right to withdraw upon two years' notice, yet the proviso to the effect that at the time of withdrawal the withdrawing member must have performed all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant imposes a restriction upon the withdrawing member which no self-respecting sovereign nation ought ever to consent to. The argument the critics make is that before we can exercise our right to withdraw some authority must pass upon the question of whether we have performed our obligations as specified; that under this language the council of the league would have the authority to determine that question; and that the United States ought never to submit to the council the right to pass upon such question.

With this construction I find myself to be entirely out of accord. I think the President is on absolutely sound ground when he takes the position, as he has, that the question of whether we have performed our obligations, and, therefore, entitled to withdraw, is a question solely to be determined by ourselves and that the proviso is a proviso addressed only to the conscience of the withdrawing nation.

This position, I think, is correct, for the reason, first, that while jurisdiction to determine the question of whether we have performed our obligation is not expressly given to us, it is to be noted also that jurisdiction of such question is not expressly given to the council or to any other body. This being the case, it seems to me we are thrown back on the general principle of international law that, with respect to such treaties as this, the right is always reserved to each party to withdraw when it sees fit in good conscience to do so. Of course, it is always to be assumed that this country never would withdraw from the league so long as it had an obligation remaining unfulfilled. Whether the proviso were in or out, this statement would still be true.

If the correct construction of this language is as I have indicated, and to me there is no doubt about it, it is apparent that the only thing accomplished by the critics of the league in pursuing a course which resulted in the writing of this language into the second draft was to compel us to stay in the league for a period of at least two years, whereas under the first draft we could have withdrawn immediately after our entrance. In this particular the enemies of the document have overreached themselves and, from their point of view, have made the matter worse.

Speaking for myself, if there lingered in my mind the slightest shadow of a doubt as to our right to withdraw from this league upon giving the required notice, without interference from the council or any other power on earth, I should be unalterably opposed to the scheme, for I would be unwilling to see my country forever committed to an arrangement of this character, which necessarily is in the experimental stages, and which, after a trial, may prove itself to be of such a nature as to make it desirable and expedient that we should withdraw therefrom. Having no doubt, however, that the phraseology means exactly what the opponents of the league would by their reservation expressly make it to mean, the issue drawn in this particular is one having to do solely and entirely with language.

Article 10 of the league has perhaps been the storm center of the opposition. This article provides as follows:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In any case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

This is the article that the enemies of the league have most violently assailed. Lurid pictures of what might happen should we ever subscribe to this article have been painted for the terrorization of the American public. Visions have been created of diabolical European and Asiatic statesmen meeting behind closed doors in some distant part of the world and ordering American troops and American ships over the seas to distant lands for the purpose of fighting battles of distant people who are quarreling over things that in no wise concern America. American fathers and mothers are asked if they want to send their sons to fight on the side of Japan against China or to aid England in riveting more firmly the chains upon Ireland, or to maintain His Majesty the King of Hedjaz upon his throne in all his oriental splendor, at the behest of European or Asiatic overlords whom this league of nations sets up over us.

This sort of talk has to me supplied one of the entertaining features of the discussion. It is a sample of what might be called mental combustion of a spontaneous nature with nothing in the way of a real spark to ignite it. I make this statement in the face of the fact that the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee, under the name of the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], employ the following language: "No American soldiers or sailors must be sent to fight in other lands at the bidding of a league of nations," and thereby very clearly indicate that these distinguished Senators of the majority entertain this thoroughly unfounded view.

It ought not to be necessary for any American who fails to see hidden and lurking dangers in article 10 to inform those who are dragging the scarecrow over the country, that none of us desire to constitute Great Britain, or France, or Italy, or Japan, or any other nation or group of nations on earth, the Commander in Chief of the American Army and Navy. If article 10 is adopted as written, in the future it will remain true as it has in the past, that American arms will go into action and American guns will boom only when ordered to do so by the duly constituted authorities of this country, acting as heretofore, solely within the constitutional limitations of the Republic and only for the purpose of fighting for a cause that addresses its appeal to the conscience of our people.

I propose as briefly as I may to give my idea of article 10. In its first sentence it contains an obligation on the part of every member of the league to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every other member of the league. This is couched in the language of an obligation. When this sentence is read some orators, overcome with a patriotic sanctity and zeal, immediately say that in case the Balkan States get into a fuss—one trying to take territory from the other—it is our duty to meet the demand of the aggrieved and to immediately send an American Army on the other side to quell the Balkan riot. If this be true, it is equally true that Great Britain and France and every other member of the league are under a like obligation to rush troops to the scene to subdue the fray. If there is an independent obligation on the part of every nation on its own accord to rush to repel the aggression, we would have the spectacle of all the armies of the world, by their own independent action, gathering in the Balkan States to subdue a sort of back-yard fuss. The absurdity of this possibility ought to carry its own refutation.

What would happen in case there was an aggression committed by one nation upon another would, it seems to me to be very clear, be that no member of the league, under the language of article 10 would be compelled, in response to its obligation, alone to rush into the affray upon its own motion. It seems to me clear that any action to be taken in such event on behalf of the league is necessarily to be such as is suggested by the joint and concerted deliberations of all the nations represented on the council. This is true for two reasons: First, if it were otherwise, then we would have the possible occurrence of the ludicrous spectacle to which I have just adverted of all the nations congregating their armed forces in helter-skelter fashion to subdue what, after all, may turn out to be but some international back-yard fuss. This article contemplates that no nation shall act on its own individual responsibility in avenging the aggression committed by an offending State, but that any action that is taken by any member shall fall in line with a common plan which, after joint consultation in the council, has been advised by that body as wise in the premises.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Unanimously advised.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Unanimously advised, as the senior Senator from Mississippi repeats. If it were otherwise, and each nation were free for itself and alone to determine upon the remedy without the previous indorsement of the council's unanimous advice, then manifestly there might be grave danger of action by some one nation founded solely on its own selfish desire for aggrandizement. In this event suspicion as to its motives and jealous regard for other national interests may be aroused to a pitch which would precipitate general conflict among the members of the league, which, of course, is the very thing the league of nations in its whole plan is designed to prevent.

These considerations therefore prompt me to take the view that, considered in the light of the whole covenant and its purposes, several action on the initiative of the respective nations in keeping article 10 is in no wise contemplated. In other words, whatever is done or suggested to be done in keeping the obligations of article 10 is to be the result of the common judgment of the council, arrived at after joint deliberation.

Aside from these general considerations, I am, in the second place, forcibly led to the conclusion that the obligation of the first sentence of the article does not rest individually on the nations, because of the peculiar language of the second sentence. That sentence provides:

> In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

If there is external aggression by one nation against another, then the case occurs which article 10 contemplates. When a contract provides what shall be done in a certain case, it is a sound rule of construction that nothing other than that provided shall be done. The principle falls within the legal rule of "Expressio unius exclusio alterius." Now, in the case of external aggression, the article provides that the council shall advise upon the means by which the obligation is to be fulfilled. This clearly and unmistakably conveys the idea that where there is external aggression by one nation against another anything that is to be done in that case under the league covenant in repelling the aggression and righting the wrong is to be done only within the scope of the advice given by the council.

By the express language of the article, therefore, as contained in this last sentence, in addition to the general considerations applicable, the conclusion seems to me to be beyond all peradventure of doubt that there is no obligation upon any member of the league to do anything in obedience of article 10 except as it falls within the program laid down by the council in the giving of the advice.

It is said by the opponents of the league that the council, in case of such external aggression, may compel the United States to supply armies and navies to distant parts of the world, which, in the judgment of the council, are the victims of some external aggression. With this view I find myself in unalterable opposition for the very plain reason that article 10 does not confer any authority upon the council beyond that of giving advice. When the article says that the council may advise upon the means by which the obligation is to be fulfilled the word "advise" is to be taken in its common and ordinary acceptation. Advice always implies that the one to whom it is given has the discretion to accept or reject it. I can understand the word in no other sense.

Therefore it seems clear to me that when the external aggression has been committed by one nation in violation of the provisions of article 10, no duty rests on any member of the league to immediately rush to the defense of the aggrieved nation; that the council, in considering the case, can only give advice, in which case still there is no duty upon any particular nation to follow the advice.

In view of the fact that the whole program of the league seems designed to bring about concert of action when occasion is called for, it would, therefore, appear that article 10, providing as it does only for advice to be given to the nations, seems in its analysis to be out of line with the general plan of the league, for if any nation exercises its undoubted right to reject the advice, then the plan for unanimity of action would fall to pieces. In this particular, while the article may contain a weakness, yet such weakness ought not to be unpleasant to those who are declaiming against the alleged erection of a superstate which has authority to order the nations of the world about at its own sweet will.

Amongst the tergiversations of statesmen I have been very much interested to note the performance of ex-Senator Root with respect to this particular article 10. It will be recalled that when the first draft of the league was published Mr. Root wrote a letter, dated March 29, 1919, to Mr. Will H. Hays, chairman of the Republican national committee, conveying to Mr. Hays his views upon the then proposed league of nations. Mr. Root criticized some of the features of the league. In the main, however, he gave it his very cordial indorsement.

I am interested now to note his treatment of this celebrated article 10. In his letter to Mr. Hays, Mr. Root, in speaking of article 10, used the following language, which is familiar to Senators, and which I ask leave to insert in the RECORD without reading:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The fourth point upon which I think there should be an amendment is article 10, which contains the undertaking "to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league."

Looking at this article as a part of a perpetual league for the preservation of peace, my first impression was that the whole article ought to be stricken out. If perpetual, it would be an attempt to preserve for all time unchanged the distribution of power and territory made in accordance with the views and exigencies of the Allies in this present juncture of affairs. It would necessarily be futile. It would be what was attempted by the Peace of Westphalia at the close of the Thirty Years' War, at the Congress of Vienna at the close of the Napoleonic Wars, and by the Congress of Berlin in 1878. It would not only be futile, it would be mischievous. Change and growth are the law of life, and no generation can impose its will in regard to the growth of nations and the distribution of power upon succeeding generations.

I think, however, that this article must be considered not merely with reference to the future but with reference to the present situation in Europe. Indeed, this whole agreement ought to be considered in that double aspect. The belligerent power of Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey has been destroyed, but that will not lead to future peace without a reconstruction of eastern Europe and western Asia. The vast territories of the Hohenzollerns, the Hapsburgs, and the Romanoffs have lost the rulers who formerly kept the population in order, and are filled with turbulent masses without stable government, unaccustomed to self-control and fighting among themselves like children of the dragon's teeth. There can be no settled peace until these masses are reduced to order. Since the Bolsheviki have been allowed to consolidate the control which they established with German aid in Russia, the situation is that Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium, with a population of less than 130,000,000, are confronted with the disorganized but vigorous and warlike population of Germany, German Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, Turkey, and Russia, amounting approximately to 280,000,000, fast returning to barbarism and the lawless violence of barbarous races. Order must be restored. The allied nations in their council must determine the lines of reconstruction. Their determinations must be enforced. They may make mistakes; doubtless they will; but there must be decision, and decision must be enforced. Under these conditions the United States can not quit. It must go on to the performance of its duty, and the immediate aspect of article 10 is an agreement to do that. I think, therefore, that article 10 should be amended so that it shall hold a limited time, and thereafter any member may withdraw from it. I annex an amendment to that effect.

Mr. WOLCOTT. He suggested an amendment to the article as first drawn to cover his idea, which amendment was as follows:

Add to article 10 the following:

"After the expiration of five years from the signing of this convention any party may terminate its obligation under this article by giving one year's notice in writing to the secretary general of the league."

From the foregoing quotations it is apparent that Mr. Root favored the acceptance of the obligations of article 10 for a definite period of five years and a continuance of the obligation thereafter, subject to termination upon one year's notice. In other words, he was ready to accept article 10 for at least a period of six years and to have the United States carry those obligations for at least that length of time.

On June 19, however, ex-Senator Root wrote to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] another letter, in which he criticized the final draft of the league of nations covenant. It is to be noted that article 10 in this final draft, which Mr. Root criticized to the senior Senator from Massachusetts, is identical in the language defining the obligations with the language of the article as it appeared in the covenant, which Mr. Root referred to in his letter to the Republican national chairman, Mr. Hays, and which, as I have said, he thought the United States ought to accept for at least six years.

Yet in the letter of June 19 to the Senator from Massachusetts Mr. Root takes the position that article 10 ought to be completely cut out of the league.

Under the final draft of the covenant the obligations of article 10 can be gotten rid of by the United States by withdrawing from the league on the two years' notice specified. It will, therefore, appear that article 10 in its last and final situation has a minimum life of only two years. Yet article 10, with this minimum life of only two years, ought, according to Mr. Root's letter to the senior Senator from Massachusetts, be completely eliminated from the treaty, whereas article 10 which had a minimum life of six years, according to Mr. Root's letter to Mr. Hays, ought not to have been eliminated from the treaty.

This inconsistency of view on the part of the great Republican statesman, Mr. Root, is something I do not undertake to explain. But those who are interested in the flights of Mr. Will H. Hays from Washington to New York and elsewhere over the country and the reasons therefor may perhaps be able to throw some light upon it. In these days preceding the presidential campaign, when the alleged inconsistencies of the President are dexterously pointed out and cleverly played upon by the spellbinders, it is perhaps not entirely unimportant to point out the wabblings of the statesman who is so universally acclaimed by his party associates as the one constant light that forever beams in steady ray over the troubled waters of the times. The only parallel to this instance of striking inconsistency that for the moment occurs to me is that supplied by the senior Senator from Massachusetts, who in 1915, at Union College, New York, stoutly defended the idea of a league of nations with an impelling force behind it that could compel nations to go into an international court and abide by its mandates, but who now finds himself quite shocked at the prospect that this particular league of nations, according to his construction, will enable him to realize his hopes. For my own part, I can see that the league of nations as now suggested is nothing like so strong in its sanctions as that which commended itself to the senior Senator from Massachusetts in 1915.

In connection with article 10, the opponents of the league have very adroitly worked up a strong opposition to the league and to its sponsors amongst those of our people of Irish extraction. The idea has been put forth that if article 10 is ever adopted, the United States would be compelled to supply the power of its embargoes and the force of its armies in aid of England to suppress any possible Irish uprising in the future. Any man who reads the article will very readily see for himself that it imposes no such obligations on this country. The only thing that article 10 undertakes to deal with is "external aggression" against the territorial integrity and existing political independence of members of the league. If Ireland should rise in revolt against England, no one who had regard for the integrity of his rational processes would for a moment contend that the situation presented one of "external aggression." The case would be one of internal revolt. Before any man of Irish extraction condemns this article 10, or those who see fit to vote for it, I very sincerely wish that he would carefully and studiously read it.

For my own part, I am sure I voice the sentiment of all men when I say that there is no Member of this body who would knowingly foreclose to any people struggling for their liberty the sacred right of revolution. It was this right which our fathers asserted; it underlay our war of liberation against Great Britain. In eloquent terms it was proclaimed by the immortal Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence. The monarchs of Europe, the autocrats of the great continental empires, through their scheme of the Holy Alliance, were of course the avowed enemies of this right. Certainly America, with her traditions and ideals such as they are, can never so far forget her past as to commit herself to obligations that would compel her to assist in suppressing any people of the world struggling for their liberties. I take this opportunity, Mr. President, to give assurance to those who may hear or read what I say, that in whatever votes I cast upon this treaty, containing as it does the league of nations covenant, I shall cast in the full and confident belief that I am doing nothing that will compel this great country to array itself in hostile arms against a people, wherever situated in the world, who are making the struggle for their independence which our fathers made in the last quarter of the eighteenth century.

Those who are thus, as I have indicated, playing upon the fears of the friends of Ireland make still another point against article 10. When these men who, I say it advisedly, are attempting to agitate the fears of Ireland's friends are confronted with the express language of article 10, to refute their charge that it would require the United States to fight against Ireland, they then adopt one of two courses. As I catch their argument, it then branches about as follows:

They say, first, that under article 11 it is provided that any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations; and that, in view of this language, inasmuch as an uprising in Ireland may indirectly affect members of the league and thus become a concern to the whole league, the United States can be ordered across the sea to suppress the uprising. This contention I shall not pause to discuss. To me it is thoroughly untenable, for the plain reason that the only thing that article 11 can in any wise contemplate is the right of discussion in the league. I can not by the wildest stretch of imagination conceive that such language could ever be construed to impose an obligation upon us to fight in aid of suppressing revolution in another country. Yet this absurd contention has been advanced. Had it been advanced by anybody other than United States Senators I should not have paused to mention it.

The only respect in which article 11 can in any wise have any bearing upon the case of Ireland is that it would furnish an opportunity for a discussion of the Irish question before a tribunal composed of all the nations of the world. This, I say, is simply a possible effect; and, while no relief in the way of definite action could, under this article, be afforded to the people of Ireland, yet, in view of the fact that a hearing before the bar of the world's public opinion can in no wise be prejudicial to Irish interests, it seems entirely reasonable to say that if article 11 can have any effect at all upon the status of Ireland, that effect must necessarily be of a beneficial nature.

The other branch of argument that the agitators of Irish sympathizing opinion in this country have adopted is to assert that while it is true that the language of article 10 can not compel America to aid England in suppressing the aspirations of a struggling Ireland, yet the article does prevent the United States from ever going to war against England for the purpose of freeing Ireland.

In reply to this contention I submit to the Senate the following observations: In the first place, as much as we may sympathize with the aspirations of the Irish people to throw off what they conceive to be the yoke of English tyranny, yet I do not wish to be understood as expressing the view that in case such Irish uprising should come the United States would rush to arms against Great Britain. What the United States would do upon such an eventuality can not now be foreseen, but necessarily would have to be determined in the light of the circumstances then existing in the future. How likely it is that the United States would at some future time lend its armies and navies to Ireland in a contest with Great Britain it is not my purpose to discuss. I think that it is apparent to all that at this particular juncture of world affairs such a colossal conflict as war between England and America can hardly be thought of, for the manifest reason that, aside from all considerations of morality, the destructiveness of such a war could hardly be borne by a world already weakened to the point of emaciation by the conflict just closed. What the future will bring forth I do not assume to say. Whether the hope that America will ever fight Great Britain in defense of Irish freedom is a hope that is founded upon reasonable probability is beyond the point of my present discussion, for I am at this point concerned only to consider whether or not article 10 can by legitimate construction be held to restrain the United States from intervening in Ireland's behalf in case we should desire to do so.

It is my opinion that if the United States, after the adoption of this league of nations containing article 10 as written, should desire at some future time to go to war with Great Britain in defense of Ireland, she could find a method of doing so without in any wise violating her obligations under article 10. I am quite aware that in making this statement I venture upon ground that has not been heretofore traveled by any Senator in discussing this treaty. The position I take, however, seems to me to be thoroughly sound, and I accordingly lay it before the Senate and the country. This I do, for the reason that I believe it to be true that sentiment in the United States in favor of conflict with England in behalf of Ireland is so strong in some places as to have reflected itself, to a certain extent at least, in this body; and for the further reason, which is the most important one, that it would be most unfortunate for the covenant if, after adoption, it should continue to receive the ill will of a large body of our citizens because of a supposed injustice done by article 10 to the cause of Ireland.

I take it to be the unquestioned rule under well-accepted principles of international law that every nation has the undoubted right to accord recognition to any other nation which sets itself up as an independent sovereign. The right of one nation to recognize another, and thereby, so far as it is concerned, to accept that other as a member of the family of nations, is recognized by all authorities on international law. Whether or not a new nation is entitled to recognition is a question that is left entirely within the discretion of the recognizing nation. The recognizing nation is bound by no restraint other than that which in its own conscience it chooses to recognize. The act of recognition does not constitute an act of "external aggression," and is not therefore inhibited by article 10. History is replete with instances where established nations have accorded recognition to new nations and such recognition has not been of sufficient gravity to provoke war by the erstwhile parent State against the recognizing one.

I venture to lay down as a further principle, at least for American guidance, that the new State need not have existed as such for any particular length of time. An American precedent upon which this principle may be based is to be found in the historical instance of our recognition of the Republic of Panama. In that case the revolting State of Panama declared its independence of Colombia, and before the new Republic was 72 hours old the United States, speaking through its Executive, President Roosevelt, accorded recognition to the Republic of Panama. Furthermore, our gunboats forcibly restrained the parent State of Colombia from landing her own forces in Panama to subdue her own rebellious subjects so complete was our recognition of the new Republic. Our right to extend this speedy recognition and the rectitude of our course in doing so and in making it effective has been stoutly and valiantly defended on the floor of this Senate by Senators some of whom now find themselves in strong opposition to the league of nations.

With these principles in mind, let us imagine what would take place in case Ireland set herself up as an independent nation, as indeed a considerable portion of her population are now attempting to do. Whenever in the sound discretion of the United States we chose to do so, we would be at liberty to recognize the new nation of Ireland. This action could in no wise be said to be an "external aggression" upon the territorial integrity or political independence of England. The act would involve aggression in no sense of the word. It simply recognizes the new status of Ireland. After we have thus recognized the new nation, we could, if those in charge of our policy at the time saw fit, lend material aid of money or arms or even men to the nation which we had thus recognized as a member of the family of nations in repelling any English attempt to further subjugate that nation. This would constitute not an external aggression upon the territorial integrity or political independence of England, but a contribution of material forces for the purpose of preserving the territorial integrity and political independence of Ireland, to which we had already accorded recognition and which we had duly acknowledged to be a member of the family of nations.

In such case we would not be regarding the new nation of Ireland as a part of the territory of England, and, therefore, in no sense would we be assailing that nation's territorial integrity. I am speaking only, please bear in mind, with respect to article 10. Therefore, even though article 10 were in the covenant unchanged or unaltered, we could in proper way, without violating the obligations of the article, very easily find a way to go so far as to even fight against England for Irish freedom, if our people desired so to do at any time in the future. This we could do, I say, so far as article 10 is concerned.

I am aware that another article of the covenant might restrain us from thus going to war against England. I refer to article 12, which reads as follows:

> That members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council.
> In any case under this article the award of the arbitrators shall be made within a reasonable time, and the report of the council shall be made within six months after the submission of the dispute.

While article 12 might restrain us, yet I repeat that article 10, the much-mooted article, the article that has been played up for Irish consumption, does not restrain us.

But let us see what would happen to Ireland's case under article 12. Assuming that we had recognized the new nation, and that Great Britain persisted in an attempt to destroy the political independence and territorial integrity of this people whom we had by our recognition accepted as one of the family of nations, and that we were protesting against England's course and threatening a rupture, is it not clear that England, as well as ourselves, is bound by article 12 to submit the dispute to either arbitration or investigation and report by the council? What would be the issue in this dispute? Clearly it would be whether Ireland is entitled to be regarded as an independent nation. Now, as soon as we have reached this point Ireland's case is in court, so to speak, for a hearing and finding. And in this court Great Britain is excluded from voting, because she is a party to the dispute. If she refuses to submit the case to arbitration or investigation by the council, her refusal would, under article 16, ipso facto constitute an act of war against all other members of the league, in which case not only the United States but as well all the rest of the world would be free to fight her in defense of the Irish cause. Would she be apt to risk that possibility?

I think not; I rather think she would prefer to submit the Irish cause to the council. Now, when she does that she can not get a report in her favor unless the votes of the seven nations there represented are unanimous. Wherefore, it is plain that all Ireland in such case needs to do is to gain just one vote out of all the nations voting in order to avoid an adverse decision. In that event, under the terms of article 12, after the expiration of three months, the United States may, unrestrained by any promise anywhere in the covenant, go to the aid of Ireland, if she should see fit, with armies and navies in conflict with Great Britain.

Thus, Mr. President, upon reflection it will be seen that Ireland's case is in all essentials uninjured by this league of nations covenant. Article 10 is not the bête noire it was thought to be; and circumstances could be so shaped by this country, or by any other country a member of the league, as to bring the Irish cause before the council of the league in such way as to impose on England the necessity of winning every vote in approval of her course before she could for the moment close the Irish case; whereas only one vote would need to be found for Ireland in order to set her case at large, and thus enable this country to pursue whatever course it chose, even the course of war, against England in Ireland's behalf.

It is apparent that the league of nations covenant in the manner I have just described supplies a method by which it is possible to bring the cause of Ireland before the league for hearing. If this covenant is rejected, Ireland will be without any opportunity to have her cause heard before any sort of impartial tribunal. Her status will in the future be just as it is to-day. All of her pleas now must, as heretofore, be addressed to the British Parliament. In case the league is adopted, the opportunity lies open to have her plea for freedom heard before a council of nations on which the British Empire has no representative, so far as that case is concerned. I therefore submit that the cause of Ireland, instead of being prejudiced by the adoption of this covenant, on the contrary will be placed in a much more highly advantageous situation.

Before I leave the subject of Ireland, Mr. President, I wish to take the opportunity to say that, in my judgment, there has been a very studied attempt on the part of Republican leaders to make political capital out of the Irish vote in connection with article 10 of this league of nations. If I thought there was any genuine and sincere desire on the part of these Republican Party leaders to do something of real substantial benefit for Ireland in this connection I would be exceedingly loath to visit them with my criticism, however much I might think their interpretations of article 10 to be erroneous. But, convinced as I am that the criticism of article 10, which is made in order to address an appeal to people of Irish extraction who have votes in this country, is utterly devoid of any real intention on the part of the critics to amend the articles of the covenant in a way that will be of genuine assistance to the struggling Irish people, I do not propose to let this debate pass by without doing what I can to expose the hollowness and insincerity of the whole attempt.

If article 10, Mr. President, as drawn restrains the United States under all possibilities from rendering assistance to Ireland, what, may I ask, have the anglers for the Irish vote done or proposed which, if accepted, will correct what they claim to be the great wrong toward Ireland done by this article? I know of only one proposal that has been made to in any wise change the article. That proposal is embodied in the second reservation submitted by the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee. That reservation is as follows:

2. The United States declines to assume, under the provisions of article 10, or under any other article, any obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between other nations, members of the league or not, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States in such controversies, or to adopt economic measures for the protection of any other country, whether a member of the league or not, against external aggression or for the purpose of coercing any other country or for the purpose of intervention in the internal conflicts or other controversies which may arise in any other country, and no mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, part 1, of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

Even from the point of view of the man who conceives that the original article 10 would restrain the United States from aiding the cause of Ireland, it must be perfectly apparent that the reservation to the article which I have just quoted in no wise changes the situation. In other words, if the reservation be adopted article 10 as interpreted by the reservation just as effectively restrains the United States from interfering with the Irish question as the article would in case the reservation never were adopted. So that it is perfectly apparent that those who would with this reservation to article 10 appease the hunger for the bread of freedom on the part of Ireland will, upon reflection, be found to be offering but a stone. This, Mr. President, is trifling with serious emotions and sentiments in such a way as merits the description of grim and cynical tragedy. And yet I believe it to be true that many men in this country have arrayed themselves against article 10 and its supporters and in favor of this—I will not say fraudulent but deceptive—reservation because they have been led to believe that the article as originally written is inimical to Ireland and that the reservation thereto constitutes the strong bulwark of Ireland's hopes. I now warn those who are interested in the fate of Ireland that some of the managers of this reservation are playing upon their fears and credulity with such apparent success that, after this controversy is a thing of the past, derisive laughter will many times chortle from the throats of men who are now vocalizing devoted attachment to the Irish cause.

To me, Mr. President, sham and pretense are always hateful, and I shall ever attempt to unmask them. Surely the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee have had no real desire to bring in amendments or reservations that are of genuine benefit to Ireland, for nowhere in the majority report of the committee can I find any suggested amendment or reservation in the interest of or even so much as any mention of the name of Ireland.

Yet, sir, the majority of this committee entertained a very solicitous regard for China and the heathen Chinese. I say this because of the amendment which has been reported transferring the German rights in the Shantung Peninsula to China in lieu of Japan. What is to be argued from this circumstance? Why, sir, it seems to me to be an inevitable conclusion that China received more consideration at the hands of the Foreign Relations Committee than did Ireland. I know that the Chinese are not regarded as fit to be admitted into this country through our ports. I know that in some of the States of this Union whose Senators are violently fighting on this floor for oppressed China the poor Chinese are treated like vermin. I know also that men and women of Irish extraction are gladly welcomed to our shores, and they compose a substantial and respected portion of our population. Yet the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee, by the so-called Shantung amendment, placed itself on record as willing to incur the ill will and animosity of Japan in order to benefit China, whereas they have not indicated by amendment or reservation any willingness to correct what they claim to be, but which I deny, is a wrong to Ireland.

If the so-called Shantung amendment is adopted, it constitutes a material alteration of the treaty. That means a reopening of the whole peace conference. Such an eventuality is so pregnant with disastrous consequences to the world as to be appalling. Yet in the interest of China and the Chinese the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee by their report disclose themselves as willing to let this appalling situation develop. Such seems to be the intense and devoted attachment to the distant orientals of the old Celestial Empire. If the treaty is thus to be torn asunder and peace negotiations reopened in the interest of China, why, may I ask, have not those who conceive Ireland to be likewise prejudiced, and who, by the way, criticized the President of the United States for his alleged indifference to the Irish cause, pursued a course that will furnish a hearing for her cause in the renewed negotiations?

When the first draft of the league was published a great outcry was raised because of the supposed fact that under the terms of that draft we would be abandoning our historic policy known as the Monroe doctrine. In view of the fact that article 10 of the first draft obligates every member of the league to respect and preserve against external aggression the territorial integrity and political independence of every other member, it seemed to me very clear that thereby the essential principles of our Monroe doctrine were recognized and accepted as an obligation by all the rest of the world as applicable not only to the Western Hemisphere but as well to the Eastern. I could not, therefore, find myself in agreement with those who contended that the Monroe doctrine was lost unless the draft was so amended as to specifically exclude it from the terms of the covenant. This I understood also to be the view of the President. In response, however, to the clamorous demands of the opposition, the President upon his return to Paris succeeded in securing from the other nations there represented the adoption of a clause in the final draft designed particularly to save the Monroe doctrine from any impairment by reason of anything that might appear in the covenant or by reasonable inference might inhere therein. Accordingly, the following language now appears in the covenant as it is submitted to the Senate:

ARTICLE 21.

Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

Notwithstanding the plain language of this article 21, the enemies of the treaty still insist that we are throwing away the Monroe doctrine. This is to them so utterly abhorrent that with clapper-clawing vehemence they rend the air with frantic cries of denunciation against the alleged betrayers of America. With the point of view of such men as these, Mr. President, I find so little sympathy, in the light of the express language of article 21, that I shall not pause to make further mention of their contentions.

It is said that we ought never to surrender our control over our own domestic affairs, and especially that we ought not to suffer any outside authority to interfere with such questions as cover our immigration and tariff policies. I quite agree that we should do none of these things. Everyone who advocates this league likewise agrees.

If I had any doubt—even a lingering doubt—that the league could foist itself on such purely domestic questions, I would array myself against it. But I have no doubt on this score, for I consider that article 15 in one of its paragraphs amply safeguards us in this particular. The paragraph is as follows:

If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

I shall not burden the Senate with citation of authorities showing that such questions as relate to immigration and the tariff are under international law regarded as purely and entirely domestic questions. The Senate needs no instruction in matters properly belonging to the kindergarten classes in international law. I therefore refrain from producing the text of the authorities.

If there were anything to the point, I dare say the other nations of the world would be as tender in their regard for their domestic questions as we are for ours, and therefore equally as careful to effectually safeguard them in the covenant from outside interference. Those who seize upon this domestic-question objection, with all due deference, seem to me to be flogging their nags with a straw.

Another objection that is strenuously urged against the covenant, and which the newspaper headlines have succeeded in spreading through the general public, is the scarecrow that is constructed out of the provision in the covenant that in the assembly the dominions and colonies of Great Britain may have votes. The point is made that this provision would give Great Britain not only her own vote but as well the votes of Canada, New Zealand, Australia, India, and South Africa in the assembly, whereas every other nation, including the United States, has only one. The proposition is, therefore, advanced—and the Foreign Relations Committee has offered an amendment embodying the proposition—that the United States also should cast six votes in the assembly.

Should this amendment be adopted and the United States be therefore given five more votes in the assembly, it would be entirely reasonable to expect France, Italy, Belgium, Japan, and all the other nations to claim the same sort of concession. This is manifestly impracticable. If there is any other nation possessing self-governing colonies and dominions, the same would be entitled to representation in the assembly with the British self-governing colonies and dominions.

It is a very gross error to assume that this so-called voting strength of Great Britain in the assembly is such as to give Great Britain a preponderance of voice in the conduct of the league. This error is sedulously spread by the opponents of the league in the hope that if they can but persuade this country that Great Britain has six votes in the assembly to our one she can outvote us upon important questions and dominate the policy of the United States. Nothing is further from the truth. Anyone who even casually reads the league covenant will readily see that the real power in the league is vested in the so-called council and not in the assembly. It is to be borne in mind that British colonies and dominions are not represented in the council. They are in the assembly. Therefore in the body that has the real voice in the league—that is to say, in the council—Great Britain has only one vote. That council is made up of the five nations of the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and four nations yet to be added. The council therefore consists of nine. In the council's deliberations each member has only one vote, and the great significant fact as to voting power rests in this, namely, that in order for the council to take any action that is authoritative the vote must be unanimous. Further, when any disputes are transferred to the assembly, as they may be, the action of the assembly, before it may be regarded as authoritative, must be decided upon by at least a majority of votes of the noncouncil nations in the assembly, together with the vote of every nation represented in the council.

From this brief outline it is apparent that the voting power of any nation represented in the council, possessing as it does the veto power, which is inherent in the unanimity requirements, is the equal of all the other votes of all the other nations combined. In other words, the voting strength in this league is determined not by majorities but by the obstructive power of veto lodged in any one of the nine nations sitting in the council. When this situation is understood it is apparent that the great outcry against giving British interests six votes while we have only one amounts to nothing more than claptrap. It is founded on nothing, and is as unsubstantial as the breath that utters it.

If there is any justice in this complaint against the six votes of Great Britain and her colonies, I think other nations might raise a similar complaint against this country, because it must be borne in mind that in the assembly the United States, in substance, will have more votes than its own, because of its well-recognized influence with certain nations on this side of the water; and, I dare say, even if it were true that majorities control in the assembly—which they do not—even if it were true that majorities could dominate the assembly, when it comes to getting votes the United States would have not only enough votes to match Great Britain's five additional ones but, I dare say, some on top of that.

Now, Mr. President, I have consumed more of the time of the Senate than I had cared to. In view of the fact that I have not thus far taken a moment of the Senate's time in prematurely discussing this league of nations I feel justified in trespassing upon the Senate's time to the extent I have.

Before taking my seat, however, I wish to comment upon the fact that this treaty has been too long before the Senate. I know it is a matter of some delicacy for a Senator to criticize the work of any committee of this body. Criticism of such committee, however, is no more indelicate than the intense abuse, ridicule and sarcasm that have been hurled at the President because, forsooth, of his interminable delays in bringing the peace treaty negotiations to a conclusion in France. When I consider that those negotiations covered only a period of six months, that they involved the reconciliation of national points of view, and brought within their scope the conflicting interests of 27 nations, I marvel at the expeditious transaction of that momentous business. All the world sat around the peace conference table, at which were discussed and adjusted to the satisfaction of the nations the multifold interests involved. Six months for adjusting the differences and writing the treaty it seems to me ought to be regarded as an exceedingly brief space of time.

Of this, however, I am certain: The Senate of the United States, which has none of the difficulties that come from clashing national interests that have to be resolved, but has only to study this treaty in the light of our own special interest, ought to be much farther advanced toward its conclusion than it is. The treaty came in here on July 10. For two months it lay in the Foreign Relations Committee before it got upon this floor, and at the present rate of progress I venture the assertion that two, if not four, more months will be consumed in its consideration. I believe it took the Foreign Relations Committee as much as two weeks just to read the text. That committee frittered away time while listening to delegations before it concerning interests that are in no wise involved in this treaty. I refer, in this connection, to the hearings that were held listening to men discuss the affairs involved between Italy and the Jugo-Slavs and also between the Greeks and Bulgarians. These disputes have no connection with this treaty, but belong solely to the treaties with Austria, Turkey, and Bulgaria, which treaties are not yet, and some of which may never be, before the Foreign Relations Committee, not to say the Senate, for consideration, for it will be remembered that we never declared war against Bulgaria and Turkey.

What was the purpose to be subserved in thus consuming the time of the Foreign Relations Committee with these irrelevant hearings?

I note, further, that the precious and valuable time that ought to have been expended in serious study of the treaty was consumed by hearings accorded to an attorney representing Egypt, to others representing China, Czechoslovakia, Italy, Greece, Hungary, India, Jugoslavia, the mid-European nations of Lithuania, Latvia, Austria, and the Ukraines; the African negroes represented by the American negro, William Monroe Trotter, and his seven associates; and Persia. I would assume that after taking this great amount of testimony the Foreign Relations Committee would, after hearing all of these interests, have taken at least a reasonable amount of time to digest the testimony in order that it might seriously be considered. How lightly the committee regarded the taking of this testimony is to be seen from the fact that promptly upon hearing the representatives who spoke in behalf of Italy in her Fiume controversy an immediate report on the treaty was ordered. Indeed, I find no mention even of the name of Italy in the report. For the benefit of those gentlemen who were thus laboring with the committee in behalf of Italy I would like to remind them of the fact that their contentions found no lodgment in the minds of the committee, for as soon as they were heard they were apparently dismissed. On no other theory can I explain the action of the committee in ordering a report upon the treaty instantaneously with the closing of the hearings. The net result of all the time consumed by these hearings, so far as I can discover, was to make one amendment in behalf of China, that being the amendment which substitutes China in lieu of Japan in connection with the Shantung provision.

I hesitate, Mr. President, to delve into the motives of men. To do so is always attended with the danger of misrepresenting the real purposes that lie behind human action. The facts connected with the history of this treaty since it has been submitted to the Senate and the occurrences transpiring before the Foreign Relations Committee in connection with its deliberations, all constitute a body of circumstantial evidence which, notwithstanding my reluctance to ascribe motives to my fellow men, lead me strongly to the conclusion that the inspiration underlying the whole proceeding before the Foreign Relations Committee was founded purely in politics and was casting its eyes forward to the next presidential election. I know of only one class of vote in the United States that was not flattered and appealed to by the hearings held before the Foreign Relations Committee, and that is the so-called German-American vote. While these proceedings were of such nature as to please the Irish vote, the Italian vote, the Greek vote, the Hungarian vote, the Bulgarian vote, and the negro vote, yet fairness compels me to say that no member of the committee drummed up a delegation whose appearance before the committee would, by reason of its personnel, afford delight to the German-American vote.

Whether this was an oversight or not I do not assume to say. If the same were an oversight, it has been duly taken care of, however, by the speech made on the floor of the Senate by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] on the 29th day of August, when he very lengthily submitted views which can, with telling effect, be broadcasted by the Republican national campaign committee next year among the German-American voters of this country, for that speech undoubtedly will please those in this country whose sympathies lie with the old German Empire, protesting, as it does, against the terms laid down by the victorious nations for Germany's punishment.

I doubt not, Mr. President, that the protracted delay in the consideration of this treaty by the Senate is lending hope and encouragement to the defeated foe. Recently, in one of his addresses, the President stated that confidential sources of information in Germany disclosed to him that the German people were taking great hope and encouragement from the long delay in the ratification of this treaty. In the same connection I note that Cyril Brown, the staff correspondent of the New York World, under date of September 12, forwarded the following dispatch from Berlin:

"All humanity, Germany particularly, is tensely awaiting the decision of the American Senate on the peace treaty," former Minister of State von Scheller Steinwartz said to-day. With many other Germans, he is beginning to entertain real hope of a separate peace with America.

"Apparently Senator Lodge is the soul of the opposition," he said. "The Senator is no German hater. He hates all non-Americans equally, and he is absolutely a just man, of almost Quakerlike moral strength. When he and other important Senators fight the peace treaty, their course means that the treaty displeases them, because in the excessive enslavement of Germany, for which America would be forever coresponsible, they see grave danger of future complications.

"That course is thus to be hailed like the morning red of a new dawn. There is promise of a still better realization of conditions in the prospect that America in all seriousness may express the wish for a separate peace with the Central Powers.

"The Germans can only wish that the action of the Senate may reflect a mighty change in opinion that has been misguided and that the American people may come to favor the conclusion of a separate peace. If that shall not result, all thought of the revision of the peace terms must die."

More recently, namely, on the 26th ultimo, I have noted the following special Berlin cable, under date of the 25th ultimo, to the Washington Post:

Count Reventlow—

a name which, by the way, I recall hearing very prominently during the dark days of the struggle. He was one of the most prominent and most conspicuous spokesmen of the old Prussian régime during the war, as I recall it. This is the dispatch:

Count Reventlow writes in the Tageszeitung—

Another familiar word to me—that nonratification by the United States Senate "would create a multitude of new perspectives for Germany, which a shrewd, active German Government could exploit."

Not only are the Germans in Germany highly delighted by the delayed progress of events in the United States Senate in the settlement of this treaty, but a certain very undesirable element in our own country seems to be likewise delighted with the difficulties that are being thrown in the way of the progress of the treaty here in the American Senate. The disloyal Reds and the I. W. W.'s entirely approve of the course of those who are opposing the ratification of the treaty. Again, from the New York World, under date of September 15, I read the following dispatch, by Louis Seibold, sent from Seattle, in the State of Washington, on September 14. This dispatch describes the wonderfully enthusiastic crowds that greeted the President in the city of Seattle and manifested to him their unmistakable approval of the league of nations. In the course of the dispatch appears the following:

For every sentence uttered by the President the mob outside uttered a hundred. The interruptions, easily made audible in the hall, came from two groups, one friendly and the other made up of radicals who earlier in the day had filled the streets through which the President motored on his way to review the fleet.

Flaunting their badges inscribed "Release political prisoners" in the eyes of the President, these stolid and sullen men and women thrust through the friendly crowds that stormed the arena last night and indulged in an intense and acrimonious verbal duel.

"We want justice!" they yelled.

"We want Wilson!" retorted the overwhelming masses of loyal citizens.

* * * * * * *

"Down with the capitalistic league of nations!" cried the I. W. W.'s, wearing the badges of disloyalty.

"Hurrah for the league of nations!" from the loyalists provoked "Three cheers for Senator LODGE!" from the Reds.

Senator KNOX also came in for approval by the same element.

Now, Mr. President, I know that when the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] find themselves pursuing a course that is a source of delectation to the souls of our late enemies, their sympathizers in this country, the Red agitators and the I. W. W.'s, the association, if not mortifying to them, at least is in no sense flattering. These eminent Senators are not accustomed to hearing their praises sung in such quarters.

A moment ago I said that the protracted delay in the consideration of this treaty by the Senate was lending hope and encouragement to the defeated foe. On the other hand, the people of this country, who felt something of the pangs of this war, and the people of our victorious allies, who felt much more of the crushing weight of its burden, are clamoring for a more speedy adjustment of this peace and an early restoration of the normal processes of the world's life. The great business interests of this country are asking that the Senate move along to its duty. Just recently Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, to whose voice the majority in control of this Senate ought to be willing to lend a friendly ear, pleads for satisfaction of the world's cry for peace, and deplores what he calls the Senate's calamitous fumbling with this great issue. The New York Times, in its issue of September 8, contains his lengthy letter in full. Two hundred and fifty of the most prominent Americans, mostly Republicans, by the way, recently issued an appeal to the Senate to proceed with this business.

And very recently a telegram was sent by certain of his fellow citizens of California to the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who has, whether to the envy of some I know not, been in the forefront of the treaty opposition. Those California citizens are thus described by the Philadelphia Public Ledger in its issue of the 28th instant:

The telegram was signed by a group of the leading men of California, nearly all of them Republicans, many of them Senator JOHNSON'S long-time political friends and supporters, some of them State officials appointed by him when governor.

The telegram and signatures are as follows:

Hon. HIRAM JOHNSON,
Washington:

We heard the President's message on the peace treaty and the league of nations. We have also considered carefully all the objections offered to ratification. The issue is the most important presented to the American people since the Civil War. It is far above all personality or partisanship.

We are convinced that the treaty should be ratified without amendments or reservations. Peace, and peace on a permanent basis of open arbitration, inquiry, and discussion before resort to war, is vital to the welfare of the American people and the welfare of the world. America must not be false to herself and refuse such a peace except for the most weighty reasons. The objections to ratification are not weighty and should not hold us back.

We appeal to you to withdraw your opposition. We are confident that in this we speak for an overwhelming majority of the people of California and that your present position does not represent them truly.

(Signed) Charles C. Moore, director State council of defense, president Panama-Pacific International Exposition; R. B. Hale, vice president Panama-Pacific International Exposition; F. M. Angellotti, chief justice; Warren Olney, jr., Curtis D. Wilbur, Lucien Shaw, associate justices, supreme court; Max C. Sloss, formerly associate justice; Benjamin Ide Wheeler, president State university; Ray Liman Wilbur, president Leland Stanford University; Maurice T. Deoping, William C. Van Fleet, judges of Federal court; James Mills, regent State university; Warren Gregory, member Belgian relief commission; Frank Y. Brittain, judge of appellate court; Will C. Wood, State superintendent public instruction; Charles D. Blaney, formerly president State highway commission; Ralph P. Merritt, Federal Food Administration; George A. Sturtevant, judge of superior court; A. J. Pillsbury, chairman State industrial and accident commission; Edwin O. Edgerton, chairman State railroad commission; Frederick S. Nelson, president Advertising Club; James K. Moffitt, regent State university; Frederick H. Whittom, president Commercial Club; Thomas S. I may say that I have received through the mail a copy of another telegram, which has been sent, or purports to have been sent, to the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], very much in line with the one just read, which I ask leave to insert in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., September 26.

Senator HIRAM JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned have been your loyal supporters, voting for you both as governor and United States Senator. In our opinion the overwhelming sentiment of the people of California is strongly in favor of the peace treaty and the covenant of the league of nations. We have given careful consideration to all the objections that have been offered to ratification, and we are convinced that the treaty should be ratified without amendment or reservation. We believe that the hope of humanity lies in the covenant for a league of nations.

(Signed) A. J. Wallace, president Johnson for Senator Club and former lieutenant governor with Gov. Johnson; Joseph S. Crail, campaign manager Johnson for Senator Club; Russ Avery, chairman Los Angeles County Republican central committee, Johnson for governor campaign; Kemper B. Campbell, campaign manager Los Angeles County, Gov. Johnson campaign, 1910; Mrs. Florence Collins Porter, women's committee, Republican national committee; Mrs. Shelley Tolhurst, executive committee, Women's Johnson for Senator Club; Seth Brown, president Central Labor Council; Charles H. Langmuir, ex-president Municipal League; Mrs. Harriet W. Works, executive committee, Johnson for Senator Club; E. C. Bellows, executive committee, Johnson for Senator Club; Dr. John R. Haynes, executive committee, Johnson for Senator Club; Dr. J. Whitcomb Brougher; Judge John Perry Wood; Judge W. H. Thomas, Orange County; Maj. Walter K. Tuller; Otis Tout, El Centro Progress, Imperial County; H. W. Brundige, executive committee, Johnson for Senator Club; Senator William J. Carr; Prof. Roy Malcolm.

Mr. WOLCOTT. And so, Mr. President, there are evidences that the country is growing impatient of this delay. Vast tasks lie ahead to be performed. The world faces great but not insuperable obstacles obstructing its pathway to happiness and contentment. Devastated areas need to be reconstructed. Cities and villages need to be rebuilt. Debilitated credit needs to be sustained. The violent passions of men, creating unrest and disturbance throughout the world, need to be subdued. The peoples who fought together, bled together, suffered together, and died together for the destruction of the power of brute force and the erection of the power of right and justice among the affairs of men, are now almost piteously pleading that the leaders of the world shall speedily restore an immediate peace, so that men may put behind them the terror of this frightful nightmare from which they have just emerged and be restored to the contemplation of better and nobler things.

If another great World War should be precipitated a few years hence, it is beyond the imagination of man to depict the awful horror which will characterize its progress. Hellish engines of destruction will be devised, scientific and mechanical methods of obliterating human kind will be invented, so that literally whole populations will be exterminated on a scale comparable only to the fall of autumn leaves beneath the first cold breath of winter's frosts.

If this great country, responding to the call of duty, had the courage to plunge into the war, and, in company with the world, to fight for the triumph of justice and righteousness, spending its treasure, its tears, and its blood, now that the vaster and greater problems of peace are ahead, I can not believe that we should hesitate or falter in striking out just as bravely and as boldly, in the same valiant company, in an attempt to make permanent the blessings of that peace which has been so dearly bought.

From the lips of Judge George Gray, a great Delawarean, a statesman of first rank, whose presence formerly adorned this historic body, an American citizen whose attachment to his country and whose devotion to its highest and best traditions have never been excelled, a man who, out of a long life of active and intimate acquaintance with men and affairs, looks with courage into the future and scorns to see his country afraid to carry its responsibilities—from his lips I quote:

> In God's name, let us take this precious sovereignty of ours, about which some people seem to be so careful, and place it upright alongside the Allies with whom we have been fighting and put a new laurel upon its brow by saying, "Yes; the power and might and sovereignty of the United States are here to stand by you in every honest, bold, and courageous endeavor to secure to the world the blessings of peace and the opportunities for happiness and well-being to all peoples, great and small." Were we to do otherwise, it would be a mean and shriveled sovereignty that we kept at home, and we would have placed upon its brow the mark of an indelible shame that never yet has stained the sovereignty of America.

[Applause.]

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the momentous issues involved in the covenant of the league of nations have been frankly and fully and very ably discussed by my colleagues. I have no desire to repeat the many grave objections that have been urged against some of the covenants contained in the league. My only purpose at this time is to put into the RECORD a few general observations in support of my position before final action is taken by the Senate.

In the first place, I want to note the persistent attempts which have been made to ascribe opposition to the league to partisan prejudice. In this matter, as well as others of consequence, Democrats will and should make the most of Republican mistakes and Republicans will and should make the most of Democratic mistakes, because both parties have and will make mistakes. The choice between Democratic and Republican statesmanship must always be a choice of imperfections, and it is the duty of the minority to discover and restrain, as far as possible, the unwise purposes of the majority. At the present time it so happens that the agency intrusted with the sole power to propose treaties for the United States is Democratic, whereas the dominant party in that branch of the Government vested with the power to dispose of treaties is Republican. Under these conditions of bipartisan responsibility it would seem to be the duty of each branch of the treaty-making power to invite and heed the criticisms and advice of the other.

The course taken by the President is familiar to all. While there was opportunity to impress upon the other nations American ideas as well as American ideals, the President either ignored or resented the existence of the Senate, notwithstanding he had ample notice that his course was entirely unsatisfactory to a number of Senators sufficient to reject his treaty. As a result we have before us a document of some 80,000 words prepared by victorious generals and practical politicians; a document imposing revolutionary obligations upon the American people; a document which preaches the Sermon on the Mount and imposes the penalties of Leviticus. And yet, under the leadership of the Executive, Democratic Senators and the Democratic press have insisted and still insist that any man who dares to question the inspired origin of any one of the ill-considered and offensive obligations contained in this new gospel of supersovereignty does so because he is a Republican and for no other reason.

What would have been the view of the Democratic press and the Democratic leaders in the Senate had Mr. Hughes escaped the California accident and defeated Mr. Wilson in 1916 is clearly indicated by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. For instance, in 1912, when the treaty with Great Britain was before the Senate, Democratic Senators voted to a man against the proposition to delegate to a joint high commission sovereign powers far inferior to those they are now eager to confer upon an executive council.

Senator Root, then a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, proposed certain reservations, but they were not sufficient to meet the views of the other side of this Chamber. Many modifying proposals were suggested by Democratic Senators, but the final test came upon the reservations offered by Senator Bacon, of Georgia, which, I understand, were prepared by the present senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. It was urged at the time that we could safely agree to submit any dispute that might arise between this country and Great Britain to arbitration. Only a few years before Lord Alverstone, one of the arbitrators chosen by Great Britain to settle the disputed boundary lines between Alaska and Canada, had cast the deciding vote in our favor, although the question was a close one, and by so doing he deprived Canada of a sorely needed access to the sea. With this example of high judicial integrity set by Great Britain's representative, it was insisted that the treaty could be ratified without danger. Republicans voted with the Democrats for the Bacon reservations, and they were adopted. And now I propose to show by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that less than six months ago the Democratic leaders of the present Senate severely criticized certain Republican Senators for daring to predict that the President would attempt to commit the United States to covenants which involved the use of force under any circumstances.

The former chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. HITCHCOCK] said on the 4th day of February last—I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2656:

> Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not know to what speech of the President the Senator refers—

The Senator from Nebraska had in mind the speech delivered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]— > but I am very clear in my own mind that the supreme force which will stand back of the league of nations, which is now being born, will not be an army, it will not be a navy, it will not be military power, but it will be the great moral power of the world. I want to say to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that when great nations like the United States, Great Britain, France, and other nations that will join in this league enter into a solemn agreement to do a certain thing, it will not require armies and navies to force compliance; in fact, no army or navy could force the United States to do anything; but the power of public opinion in the United States, and the power of public opinion throughout the civilized world, will be the supreme power, the moral power which will naturally bring compliance with any agreement duly made. I do not have any idea that the President could have done that before he left the United States—

That is, to commit the United States to the use of force—> and before he came in contact with statesmen from other countries, but I have not any idea that the President will undertake to commit the United States before he consults the Senate of the United States.

I do not care to comment upon this startling change of sentiment, but the RECORD shows that only six short months ago the leaders on the other side of this Chamber stood precisely where Republican Senators now stand upon this all-important issue. The fact that no one knew where the President stood in February last, and the fact that this senatorial somersault occurred the day after the President disclosed his position, is, I think, a most remarkable coincidence.

Mr. President, the American people, without regard to party, will look with little favor upon any Senator or editor who tries to secure the adoption or rejection of the pending treaty under the party lash. Every patriotic American, regardless of party, will want the Senate to make no mistakes in its disposition of this proposed venture into the bottomless pit of world politics.

I am in favor of a league of nations that will invite and promote peace, but it is my firm conviction that the success of such an organization will be found in agreement and not in compulsion, and in agreements that are genuine and not reluctant.

War will cease when, and only when, the great peoples of the earth recognize the folly and brutality of war and possess sufficient common sense to avoid doing the things that cause war. In my opinion the foundations of this covenant are defective in workmanship and materials, and they will soon crumble under the weight of the colossal and pretentious superstructure. This covenant in its primary conception utterly ignores the basic principle of Anglo-Saxon civilization, namely, the necessity of impartial, disinterested tribunals for the settlement of disputes.

Justice is possible only where laws are administered by a wise and impartial sovereignty, whether that sovereignty be represented by a justice of the peace or a jury of 12 disinterested men or the courts of last resort. Our own domestic peace would soon be lost if juries and courts were composed of friends of the litigants. It is possible that a dispute might arise so trivial that the supersovereign council created by this covenant would render an impartial and just decision, but I challenge the defenders of this covenant to point to a possible controversy of consequence that would or could be submitted to a disinterested, impartial tribunal in the first instance.

It creates an executive council of nine nationals whose tenure of office will depend upon their ability to secure advantages for the countries they represent. The members of this council will be the agents of jealous principals, and as such agents they will be compelled to plot and deceive in the interests of their principals. What opportunities for colossal schemes of profit and power will be presented to these nine men, placed, as they will be, upon the mountain top of world politics with all the cities of the earth spread out before them.

Again, what will be expected of covenants that promise to preserve intact, for all time, the boundary lines of its friends, while it distributes the land of its enemies, however just such distribution may be? How do they know that justice will not demand the changing of other boundary lines in the future?

I have received many letters from good men urging me to support this document. They insist that plain justice demands the dismemberment of Germany, Austria, and Turkey, and I fully agreed with them. The question that bothers me is, How do we know that justice will not demand other dismemberments in the future? The tears of war dry quickly, but the hatreds of war live long. Does anyone imagine that the clauses in this document, which undertake to heal titles to land secured by force, will be honored by those who have lost their land should the time ever come when they can regain it by force? Loss of land is loss of honor—a loss that will not be forgotten or forgiven.

Astounding as it may seem, the pending document does not attempt to add anything to the surface of the earth. It simply says to the Creator, "Hereafter the executive council of the covenant for a league of nations, and not you, will regulate the rise and fall of races and nations. This council will see to it now that no race, however great or worthy it may become, shall have any more land than it has now, and no race, however degenerate and unworthy it may be, shall have any less land than it has now." In other words, this league proposes to take time and eternity by the forelock, and stay the laws of social integration and disintegration, and do it by force of arms. This is sheer folly! I do not believe the American people want to underwrite for all time the titles of England and France to millions of square miles of foreign soil.

If we subscribe to this document without amendments or reservations, if we subscribe to this league as it is, we shall invite at once the disapproval and ridicule of all the nations who are given no share of the spoils. It will not be many years before Germany, Austria, and Russia, and Japan, and perhaps Italy and Spain and Mexico will find common ground upon which to denounce it as an attempt on the part of the English-speaking peoples to dominate the world.

The only man who has authority to speak for Russia already has characterized this league as a "looting trust" established by Great Britain and the United States for the purpose of enslaving the world. "America," says Lenin, "will, if she joins the 'league of loot,' be hated by every other nation, because her sole object in joining will be to loot by force."

This document threatens war for every breach of contract, and provides the ways and means for waging war. Behind its covenants lies force, and force is war!

If I may not kill my neighbor for a breach of contract, how can I vote to pledge my country to kill a nation that breaks its contract?

If the conscience of the world can be trusted to kill a nation that breaks its contract, why should not that conscience be invoked to use force to protect persecuted and robbed minorities within nations? I suppose that one of the reasons why the nations of the earth have not yet assumed the right to take sides and settle by force the internal affairs of each other, is because the authority of the collective conscience is still a matter of dispute among the best of men. Certainly the conscience of a goodly portion of the world to-day is in a state of active decomposition. It is trying to lead some of the peoples of the world into slavery, to what is called socialism, but what is, in fact, class tyranny.

We are told by the President that if we decide to retain our freedom of conscience, such as it is, and continue to cherish our national ideals, such as they are, if we continue to defend the right, as God gave us the right, preferring His aid to that of an executive council of aliens and pagans, preferring to continue to act the part of the world's Good Samaritan, rather than that of the world's policeman, it will break the heart of the world. I disagree with him. If the world has a conscience that can distinguish between right and wrong, and if, as he insists, the world loves us and trusts us because we have kept it safe from the hands of the despoiler, is it unreasonable for us to put the world on its good behavior for a short time, giving it clearly to understand that we expect it to cherish and maintain peace and justice, and that we hold ourselves ready to discourage misbehavior whenever and wherever it breaks out, and, if need be, punish with force of arms nations whose crimes cry to heaven for justice? Is there any reason why the world, including Japan, should not follow our example if their protestations of admiration and confidence in us are made in good faith? If it is assumed, as it must be, that this league can not interfere with domestic convulsions and revolutions, except, perforce, of reason; if we can not hope to secure industrial peace and respect for just and equal laws within nations, except as this may be accomplished voluntarily and by the peaceful cooperation of the conflicting interests, how can it be assumed that coercion will invite and promote international peace? Nations will find peace where individuals find it, in service and sacrifice and mutual concessions.

Now is the time, above all others, to form a society of nations that will be free from conditions and penalties. I would call it a league of nations under a preamble that would make its purpose clear and unequivocal. Distinctive among those purposes should be the establishment of a high court of arbitration to which the nations can go in confidence for the settlement of their disputes. Disarmament will be possible only when the great and jealous and ambitious nations can meet and discuss the subject voluntarily and dispassionately as an economy to be sought in the interests of all, for the equal benefit of all.

A league of nations free from coercion and threats of war, seeking in good faith to arrive at just and wise international conceptions, will accomplish much. A league of nations which denounces the acquisition of title by conquest, and which welcomes the good offices of neutrals at all times, and promises a cooling-off period before beginning hostilities will invite and promote peace.

Let us lay the foundation safe and sure. Let us do to-day what all agree can be done safely and wisely, and then let us, or those who come after us, plan and erect the superstructure in the light of experience. In the meantime, let us try to establish a league of peace between capital and labor at home. Labor, which at one time was the servant of capital, is now its master. Labor can and will make America a glory or a disgrace. If labor is wisely selfish the golden age is before us. If labor, led by ignorance and passion, denies to capital the living wage it rightfully asks for itself it will bring upon its head the worst calamity the world has ever known. If we can solve the problems which confront us at home, if with malice toward none and charity for all we can finish the work we have in hand for America, we may with confidence expect the world to follow our example. If we can not do this the fate of other nations will not interest us and our fate will not interest them to any great extent.

For many years America has thrown her light across the world, revealing to all nations the way to peace and justice. In no instance has she suggested that peace and justice can be had where liberty is lost. In the last great struggle she gave her blood and treasure, asking nothing in return except the confidence and respect of the world. Now we are told we must look for peace in the kennels of war; that we must surrender our leadership; that the time has come for the West to follow the East—the new to follow the old. I do not believe that peace lies in that direction.

Covenants such as those contained in the document before us sound well to victorious generals and commanders in chief, as have other schemes devised for the purpose of reforming men and nations by force. The idea that we can regenerate the heart of man with the lash is not new.

If we must take the world as it is—and, of course, we must—that is no reason for signing a bond that will compel us to fight to keep it as it is.

I have called the attention of the Senate to a few of the considerations which have led me to the fixed conclusion that it is my duty to vote for reservations that will give this league a chance to live and America a chance to fulfill its mission. If these reservations are rejected by the Senate, I shall vote to return the whole of this medieval volume to its authors in the hope that its revisers will look for peace where peace may be found.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on Friday, October 3, 1919, at the close of the routine morning business, I shall submit to the Senate some observations upon the amendment proposed by the committee to article 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the first of the amendments known as the Fall amendments, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am going to ask for unanimous consent that it be agreed that we take up the Fall amendments at 2 o'clock to-morrow, that each amendment be considered under the five-minute rule, and that they shall all be disposed of before the close of the calendar day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the agreement proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I understand that such an agreement, if entered into unanimously, does not require the calling of a quorum. That applies only to cases where bills or joint resolutions are put upon their final passage.

Mr. LODGE. So I understand.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Since the matter was suggested I have been discussing it with Senators, and I can see no objection to granting the request, which, I understand, contemplates voting upon all of the Fall amendments in some form to-morrow during the calendar day.

Mr. LODGE. It does, and disposing of them before the close of the calendar day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, may I ask a question of the Senator from New Mexico? Has he any idea whether there will be a roll call on all of the so-called Fall amendments, of which there are some thirty-odd? The object of the inquiry is simply to ascertain whether, with debate under the five-minute rule allowed upon each amendment, there would be time in the calendar day to have roll calls upon 30 amendments.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, it is impossible for me to give a definite answer to the query of the Senator from Connecticut. I have again gone over very thoroughly each article to which the amendments are proposed with the purpose in view of ascertaining whether it is possible to consolidate them and have one vote upon similar amendments. I find, in my judgment, that it is impossible to vote intelligently upon the amendments consolidated.

So far as I am concerned, I shall not request a yea-and-nay vote of the Senate on each of these amendments. I have no pride of authorship about the matter; but, of course, I can not say that some other Senator will not request such a vote or that the chairman of the committee, or whoever is handling the matter, will not think it necessary, after each five minutes of discussion, that a yea-and-nay vote should be had upon some particular amendment.

I think, with that statement, we might simply let the matter take its course and decide definitely on the course to be pursued as the amendments come up. I have no purpose of calling for a yea-and-nay vote on each of the amendments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me ask the Senator further—he being so much better informed as to his amendments than I am—inasmuch as most of them relate to striking out the same words, "and associated," in different articles of the treaty, whether he thinks it would be possible to bunch some of them together or whether a separate vote would be required upon each amendment?

Mr. FALL. It is possible that there might be two or three cases where the same amendments, applying to one article, might be voted upon together, and in that way one vote would settle the entire matter so far as that article is concerned.

It might be best now that I should call attention to the first two amendments to illustrate the difficulty in attempting to vote upon them in a consolidated form.

The first of the amendments—that is, amendment No. 3 in the print of the bill—is to strike out the words "and associated"—that is, to strike out the United States—that is the effect of it—from the commission of seven, five of whom are to be appointed by the principal allied and associated powers, to settle the frontier between Belgium and Germany.

The next amendment, which is numbered 4, is to strike out the United States from the provision for an international arrangement hereafter to be entered into by the five principal allied and associated powers, to which Germany agrees beforehand, for certain purposes with reference to the Duchy of Luxemburg. The next amendment is with reference to the Duchy of Luxemburg, and as to a future arrangement of a different character which is to be entered into by the five principal allied and associated powers.

Now, of course, those two amendments, while they relate to different subjects, might be voted upon together and one vote be had upon the two amendments that relate to Luxemburg; but the policy could not well be followed of undertaking to lump the first amendment to which I have called attention—that is, to strike out the United States from this boundary commission—with the amendments with reference to the Luxemburg arrangement to be hereafter entered into. I shall very shortly, if the Senate desires and requests as we reach these amendments, in as few words as I have now explain their purpose and effect.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I wish to address a question to the Senator. I understand the Senator's position to be that the reasons which might be urged for certain of the amendments would not apply to the other amendments.

Mr. FALL. Oh, they would be entirely different.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that on the calendar day of Thursday, October 2, 1919, at 2 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the so-called Fall amendments to the treaty of peace with Germany; that during such consideration no Senator shall speak more than once or for a longer period than five minutes on any one of the said amendments; and that before adjournment on the said calendar day, Thursday, October 2, 1919, the Senate will vote upon the said amendments and dispose of them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposed agreement? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business with closed doors.

The motion was agreed to, and the doors were closed. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, October 2, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, October 1, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, from whom cometh all good, to whom the devout of every age turned for strength and guidance; so with faith and confidence we turn to Thee, that we may be inspired with strength, courage, zeal, and be guided to a happy solution of all the problems which confront us, and thus hasten the coming of Thy kingdom and Thy will upon the earth. In Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

A QUORUM.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire to make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that a quorum is not present. The Chair is of opinion that no quorum is present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and eighty-six Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HAWLEY rose.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I call up the bill (H. R. 7015) governing the tolls to be paid at the Panama Canal.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, under Rule XVI, paragraph 3, I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think that this bill belongs on the Union Calendar.

Mr. ESCH. I think it belongs on the Union Calendar, because it affects the revenue.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will transfer it from the House Calendar to the Union Calendar, and then automatically the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] can raise the question of consideration in committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. To that I want to object on the ground that opportunity was not given for the transfer of this bill to the Union Calendar in committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman's point. Does the gentleman mean before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that that is binding.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I think there should have been given opportunity to object to the transfer of the bill from one calendar to another.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Chair hold that after the question of consideration has been raised on a bill that is on the House Calendar the Chair can transfer the bill to the Union Calendar and require the party raising the question of consideration to raise it anew in Committee of the Whole? The question was raised on the bill when it was on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That did not occur to the Chair. The Chair does not think he recognized the gentleman from Oregon to raise the question of consideration. The intent of the Chair was to transfer the bill to the Union Calendar as soon as this bill was called up. The gentleman did raise the question of consideration, but the Chair does not think the Chair recognized him for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH. But the Chair recognized the gentleman, and the Chair can not decline to recognize the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say at first blush that the gentleman's right to recognition was not of such privilege as to prevent the Chair from correcting an error of reference. The Chair is disposed to think that the first duty of the Chair before recognizing anybody, if there was a reference to the wrong calendar, was to change the reference, and of course that does not destroy anybody's rights. The question of consideration can be raised in committee as it has been raised here by the gentleman from Washington. Of course the committee had its right to give hearings or not as it pleased, and the fact that the committee did or did not give hearings does not seem to the Chair to affect the validity of the committee's report.

Mr. HAWLEY. The manual says a Member may demand the question of consideration, although the Member in charge of the bill may claim the floor for debate. That is, if I understand it, it is a right that the Member has to raise the question of consideration irrespective of recognition by the Chair for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. And I raised the question of consideration as soon as the bill was called up.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the Chair thinks the first thing in order and the first duty of the Chair was to see that the bill was upon the proper calendar. The Chair thinks that it was by mistake put upon the wrong calendar, and that as soon as it was called up the first duty of the Chair was to transfer it to the proper calendar. As the Chair suggested, nobody will lose any rights at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But, if the Speaker will permit, the House is not yet in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] was recognized.

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair thinks he was not recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But he did make the request for the raising of the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. Certainly, he did; but the Chair did not recognize him for that purpose. The first duty of the Chair was to transfer the bill to the right calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I make a further suggestion?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. That under the rule it is not necessary for the Chair to recognize a Member to raise the question of consideration. The Member has an absolute right to make the demand.

The SPEAKER. He has the right to recognition, but the Chair thinks that the first right is the right of the Chair to see that the bill is on the proper calendar. It seems to the Chair that that was the most important question of procedure to be settled first.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the question of consideration can be raised only after we go into Committee of the Whole, will that bring a roll call on the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. Yes; as the Chair recollects, there would be a roll call.

Mr. WALSH. Not in Committee of the Whole, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. No; there could not be a roll call in the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. I insist, then, with all due deference, on my right to raise the question of consideration now, so that we may have a roll call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has not that right. The Chair thinks that the bill is now upon the Union Calendar and that the gentleman can not raise the question of consideration in the House on a bill that is on the Union Calendar, on Calendar Wednesday, because as soon as the bill is called up the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the opinion of the Chair as to this question: I know that it has been ruled in the House that on Calendar Wednesday, when a bill is on the Union Calendar and is called up, the House automatically goes into Committee of the Whole to consider it, and that the question of consideration should be raised in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I know that has been ruled several times, but I want to ask the opinion of the Chair if the Chair does not think it would be better practice for the question of consideration to be raised in the House before we go into the Committee of the Whole, for this reason: The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is an agent or creature of the House, and if the House goes into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, directing the committee to consider a bill, may the question of consideration then be raised in the committee, as to whether the committee will consider it, when the House has gone into Committee of the Whole directing that committee to consider it? I just want to present that proposition to the Speaker. I will say to the Speaker very frankly that the rulings have been that the question of consideration is not raised until we get into the Committee of the Whole, when we go automatically into the Committee of the Whole; but it seems to me that the logic of it is that the better practice would be to determine in those cases whether we would consider it before taking up the time of the House to go into the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not disposed to express his opinion offhand without careful study of the question as to which would be the better practice; but, as the gentleman from Georgia suggests, the ruling has been—and it was a very carefully considered ruling by the last Speaker of the House when this question came up—that the question of consideration should be raised in the committee and not in the House; and although to raise the question of consideration in the committee is an anomaly, the Chair would not feel disposed to overrule that without a very thorough study and consideration of the question.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will permit, I think that ruling was made upon the ground that when the motion was made to go into the Committee of the Whole the House had the right to refuse to go into Committee of the Whole if it so preferred, and therefore could decide not to consider the question by declining to go into the Committee of the Whole. Now, under the Calendar Wednesday rule the House goes automatically into Committee of the Whole, and, of course, the House has no opportunity, as the House itself, to say whether it will consider the bill or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is mistaken in stating that that was the reason. The Chair thinks that the ruling was made on the Calendar Wednesday rule.

The Chair rules that the House now automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7015, governing the tolls to be paid at the Panama Canal, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I raise the question of consideration under Rule XVI, paragraph 3, and under Rule XXIV, paragraph 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon raises the question of consideration on this bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAWLEY) there were—ayes 129, noes 15.

Accordingly the House determined to consider the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in measuring vessels and determining the tolls to be paid thereon at the Panama Canal the measurement shall be made and tonnage determined in all cases by the Panama Canal rules as they now exist or as they may be changed from time to time, and the tonnage arrived at by those rules shall be the tonnage to which shall be applied the rate fixed by the President for the purpose of determining the tolls to be collected, and shall be the tonnage to which shall be applied the maximum and minimum rates now fixed by law or hereafter to be fixed for the purpose of determining the maximum and minimum tolls which may be charged.

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws, rules, and regulations in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for one hour.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman say how the time is to be controlled?

Mr. ESCH. Under the rules there is one hour on a side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Can it be arranged so that the opposition will be recognized to control one hour? I want one hour's time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will gentlemen please speak louder?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am trying to get time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is just what I was trying to find out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am very glad that the former Speaker is interested in the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. ESCH. It has been customary, Mr. Chairman, on Calendar Wednesday to allot one hour on a side. The allotment of time has been divided between the chairman and the ranking minority member of the committee, and I assume that that practice will obtain. I have no doubt that time will be yielded to those opposed to the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that if the ranking minority member is in favor of the bill, that he is entitled to control the hour?

Mr. ESCH. I did not say that. I have no objection, provided the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has no objection, to permit the gentleman from Washington to control the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will permit, I expect to yield time to those opposed to the bill on this side. I do not know how many there will be.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman from Tennessee opposed to the bill?

Mr. SIMS. No; I am strongly in favor of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Under the Calendar Wednesday rule, whereby two hours of debate are allowed, I desire to ask if it is not proper for the chairman of the committee reporting the bill to be entitled to one hour and some gentleman on the committee opposed to the bill be given recognition for one hour? If no member of the committee is opposed to the bill, then some Member who is opposed to it is entitled to the hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the rule on Calendar Wednesday, as the present occupant of the chair understands it, is that one hour shall be given to those in favor of the bill and one hour to those in opposition; that the chairman of the committee shall have the hour on the affirmative side, and if a member of the committee is opposed to the bill, that member will have the hour in opposition. But if no member of the committee opposes the bill, then the Chair will recognize some one who is opposed to the bill for one hour.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Under the ruling the Chair has just made, the chairman of the committee will control one hour in favor of the bill. I would like to have him yield one-half to me, to be used on this side in behalf of the bill, and that will be cutting down one-half of the usual time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The minority member on the Democratic side, under the ruling of the Chair, has no time to yield.

Mr. SIMS. I do not ask for it in my own right.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, it was intimated by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] that there were no hearings had on this bill. There were no hearings had at this session of Congress on the bill. There were hearings had in a prior Congress, during the months of January and February, 1916. There were hearings had prior to that. There were hearings had before the Committee on Appropriations last year on the sundry civil bill. This bill is not a new matter, it takes no Member by surprise, and for that reason the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported the bill out without further hearings.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee if the printed reports of the 1916 hearings are available either for the new Members of Congress or the public?

Mr. ESCH. Every member of the committee has a bound edition of the hearings before our committee in the Sixty-fifth Congress. There are bound hearings on this bill in the committee room, and I have taken pleasure in permitting their use by the membership of the House.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, has been urged for the last four years. The reason for its being urged was because of the unsatisfactory condition in which the matter of tolls on the Isthmus has been placed since the ruling of the Attorney General in March, 1915.

The Panama Canal act, as amended in 1914, contained this provision:

SEC. 5. That the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and from time to time change the tolls that shall be levied by the Government of the United States for the use of the Panama Canal. * * * Tolls may be based upon gross or net registered tonnage, displacement tonnage, or otherwise, and may be based on one form of tonnage for warships and another for ships of commerce. The rate of tolls may be lower upon vessels in ballast than upon vessels carrying passengers or cargo. When based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce the tolls shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton. * * *

Prior to the approval of the original act in August, 1912, there was appointed a commissioner to investigate the entire matter of the measurement of vessels at Panama and, based upon such measurement, the preparation of rules for determining the tolls to be charged. The commissioner was Dr. E. R. Johnson, of Philadelphia, a very eminent expert in this line. His recommendations were submitted in two separate reports to the President. As a result of these reports President Taft, by proclamation of November 13, 1912, issued the rules for the fixing of rates of toll on the Isthmus.

On November 21, 1913, President Wilson issued a proclamation prescribing the rules governing the measurement of vessels. Under these proclamations vessels were measured and tolls collected for a certain period of time. The rules of measurement of vessels fixed the rate of toll on merchant vessels—loaded—at "$1.20 per net vessel ton—each 100 cubic feet—of actual earning capacity," while the rules for measurement of vessels prescribed the method of calculating tonnage in terms of net vessel tons of actual earning capacity. It was at once observed that the rate of tolls established at $1.20 per net vessel ton of actual earning capacity, as determined by Panama Canal rules of measurement was higher than a rate of $1.25 per ton of net capacity as determined by United States national rules of measurement.

The lumber interests of the Pacific coast at once protested against article 7 of the Panama Canal rules of measurement, which provides as follows:

If any ship carries stores, timber, cattle, or other cargo in any space upon an open deck not permanently covered or in spaces exempted, * * * all tolls and other charges payable on the vessel's net tonnage shall be payable on the vessel's net tonnage * * * increased by the tonnage of the space occupied (at the time at which tolls or other charges become payable) by the goods carried upon deck and not permanently covered or closed in.

Thereupon the President submitted the matter in dispute to the Attorney General, February 15, 1915, who decided that the term "net registered tonnage," as used in the Panama Canal act, "must be interpreted to mean the net tonnage of a vessel as measured under the rules prescribed by the statutes of the United States" and not registered tonnage as measured under the special rules provided for the Panama Canal. He further held—that if the toll rate established at $1.20 per net registered ton, when multiplied by the tonnage, as ascertained by the Panama Canal rules, exceeds the amount produced by multiplying the net registered tonnage as measured by the rules prescribed in the United States statutes, by $1.25 (the amount named in the statute), the excess thus produced is uncollectible. It therefore follows that in so far as the present proclamations and rules, either as to deck loads or otherwise, would result in collecting at the rate of $1.20 per net registered ton more than would be produced by multiplying by $1.25 the net registered tonnage as measured by the United States rules, they lay down a course of conduct unwarranted by the Panama Canal act.

The President thereupon issued supplementary instructions in accordance with the decision of the Attorney General above quoted.

The effect of this decision was practically to destroy the Panama Canal rules of measurement and substituting therefor the rules of measurement prescribed by the United States statutes. There also resulted a discrimination between vessels of different nationalities and a reduction in the revenues. I wish to state as one of those who helped to frame the Panama Canal act that we thought we were framing legislation which would enable the Panama Commission to fix tolls under the rules prescribed by the proclamations of the Presidents. It was not our purpose that the tollage should be determined by the United States rules of measurement based upon net tonnage, but the decision of the Attorney General stands to this day, and it is to relieve the operations on the Isthmus of the decision of the Attorney General that this bill has been introduced.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the chairman of the committee be kind enough to state to the Committee of the Whole just how that decision effected to work a discrimination in favor of the shipping of England as compared with the shipping of the United States at the Panama Canal, particularly of England, because that is a very concrete instance? Explain the difference in measurement, and then the discrimination as shown in the tonnage.

Mr. ESCH. I have quite a number of illustrations furnished by Gen. Goethals showing such discriminations, and I might as well call attention to them at this time. Take the case of the Minnesotan, an American vessel, with a length of 408 feet, beam 54 feet, draft 28 feet, with a corrected register under United States rules of measurement of 4,109 tons. Now, the maximum amount of tolls that can be collected under the present regulation—that is, under the regulation necessitated by the Attorney General's decision—amounts to $5,136.25. If the Panama Canal measurements were applied to that vessel, her tonnage would have been 4,610 tons, a difference of over 500 tons, and she would have paid canal tolls under the Panama Canal rules of measurement of $5,532.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the name of the vessel?

Mr. ESCH. The Minnesotan, an American vessel. Take the case of the Berwick Law, a British vessel of 404 feet in length, only 4 feet shorter than the American vessel, 53 feet beam, 26 feet draft, which had a corrected tonnage under United States rules of only 2,939 tons, and her tollage under this ruling of the Attorney General amounted to only $3,673.75, whereas if the Panama Canal rules of tollage and measurement had been prescribed that British vessel would have been reckoned at 4,630 tons and she would have had to pay $5,556 in tonnage dues. In other words, there is a discrimination against the American vessel, of practically the same capacity as the British vessel, of $1,462.50. I have a whole list of vessels showing the same discrimination, not merely as in favor of British vessels, but Norwegian, Japanese, Greek, and other vessels.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman put in the list?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; I will insert the list as part of my remarks.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the chairman be kind enough to explain to the Committee of the Whole as to the difference in the deck loads as prescribed by one rule and the other and show how that discrimination works in favor of foreign vessels?

Mr. ESCH. Tonnage, as determined by United States rules of measurement for the purpose of paying tonnage, lighterage, and light dues, is made in such way as to favor American ships when they go into foreign ports, the foreign port accepting the registered tonnage of the American ship. It is done to favor American shipping; but a few days after the Attorney General filed his ruling the Commissioner of Navigation, on March 15, 1915, removed the open space or deck-load space of American vessels from being included in this registered tonnage, thus further decreasing the tonnage and lessening the cost of the American vessel when it was in a foreign port; but the officers on the Panama Canal Zone, after the decision of the Attorney General, had to abide by the rules of the Commissioner of Navigation of the United States; so that when a vessel went through the Panama Canal the authorities there could not add to the tonnage the open-deck or deck-load spaces, even though they might be filled with cargo. This further diminished the revenue. Moreover, other vessels of other nations so devised their ships that they avoided a certain amount of tonnage. It was because of freak construction of their vessels. They make what are known as freak ships, ships designed to carry the heavy deck loads, a load in the open spaces on the decks which are not included in the net tonnage upon which the tonnage taxes are payable. From this you can readily understand how, as the result of the ruling of the Attorney General and this more recent modification by the Commissioner of Navigation of the United States removing the open spaces and the deck load from being considered as a part of net tonnage, a large reduction in the revenues resulted.

Foreign vessels are more guilty in this respect than American vessels. We have not learned the tricks of the foreign shipbuilders; we have not had a large enough merchant marine to study devices by which other nations can lessen the tolls thus passing through our canal. At Suez they had the same devices to escape Suez Canal rates until the authorities there made a rule that every vessel going through it should pay the tonnage dues on the open-deck spaces of the ships. And we should apply a like rule on the Isthmus, and we will apply it if this bill becomes a law. For if this bill becomes a law the Panama Canal authorities, under the Panama Canal rules of fixing tolls and measuring vessels, will charge a vessel upon its earning capacity, the only fair and just standard.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ESCH. I yield.

Mr. HULINGS. Could not all these complications be avoided if they would just adopt a plan of charging according to the displacement?

Mr. ESCH. No. Displacement tonnage is applied, by all nations on the earth, only to vessels of war. It has not been found applicable to merchant ships. The unit of measuring tolls for a merchant ship is the net registered ton, which consists of 100 cubic feet of space.

Mr. HULINGS. Why do you not measure just the depth it sinks into the water, and then you will know whether it is a whole load or a half load or open-deck load?

Mr. ESCH. That ignores this principle which is carried in the Panama Canal rules of measurements. You should charge a vessel upon its earning capacity. Displacement tonnage would not do that.

Mr. HULINGS. Would it not be a pretty good scheme just to make American commerce free in the canal, as it ought to be, and go back to what the original idea was in having built this canal as to coastwise vessels? [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. That was a question which was determined years ago.

Mr. HULINGS. It was determined at that time because there were some very delicate circumstances that had arisen. After every party in the United States had declared for free tolls and the Congress had passed it, then it was repealed because of some very delicate circumstances that arose, and nobody yet knows what they were.

Mr. ESCH. That has been passed upon by Congress and is not an issue in this bill.

Mr. CLEARY. Will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. CLEARY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania just mentioned that it might be well to figure on displacements. Being in the transportation business myself, it comes to my mind that if you have a heavy boat she carries weight of structure instead of weight of cargo, and yet you would have the displacement just the same. If you had a heavy ship, built much heavier than some other ships, she might draw 20 feet of water and yet would not carry anything like the tonnage that a light-built ship would carry, because one would be carrying a cargo and the other the weight of structure.

Mr. ESCH. I can not yield further.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask the gentleman, in addition to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY] has said, if this is not also true, that a very valuable cargo might make a slight displacement as compared with a less valuable cargo of great displacement?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Is it not a fact that in the Suez Canal the rate is on the tonnage of the ship, irrespective of the fact of whether she carries a deck-load cargo or not?

Mr. ESCH. At Suez, I think, they have incorporated the Danube rule of measurement.

Mr. KAHN. They do not charge specially for cargo space; they charge for tonnage.

Mr. ESCH. Yes; they charge on tonnage.

Mr. KAHN. And that is all.

Mr. ESCH. They follow the Danube rule of measurement with reference to the exclusion of space used by engines, coal bunkers, and so on.

Mr. KAHN. I have a letter from one of the leading shippers in the West, who states the rule just as I have stated it to the chairman.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I have printed as a part of my report the financial operations of the canal for the year ending June 30, 1918, which I think is very pertinent to this inquiry. In the report of L. R. Sargent, the marine superintendent of the Panama Canal, and chairman of the board of measurements, dated May 27, 1919, he makes the following statement:

For the year ending June 30, 1918, the auditor for the Panama Canal gives the following figures:

Tolls collected July 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918---------- $6,454,198.35
Tolls collectible under Panama Canal rules---------- 7,522,195.68

In other words, the amount uncollected through operation maximum limitation based on United States rules was $1,083,111.69. Because we did not have the rules of measurement as originally proclaimed by the President, this Government has lost $1,083,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. For one year?

Mr. ESCH. For one single year. And the total loss up to the present time, resulting from this decision of the Attorney General, amounts to the great sum of $2,797,000.

Oh, I know it may be said that the canal was not built as a financial or profit-making scheme. I am not urging this bill to make it a profit-making scheme. I am asking simply that there may be enough revenue derived from the operation of the canal under the old rules of measurement to meet the increased cost of operating the canal owing to the increased cost of wages and materials. That certainly is a legitimate object.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And I understand the gentleman also urges it for the very great reason that our ships may be put upon terms of equality with foreign ships?

Mr. ESCH. Yes. And that raises the question of discrimination.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As I understand it, foreign ships paid 20 per cent less than we paid.

Mr. ESCH. I have here a statement showing that 50 foreign ships, taken at random, as compared with 50 vessels carrying tonnage of the United States, going through the canal, would pay 20 per cent less tonnage dues than American vessels, because of this opinion of the Attorney General, and the necessity for adjusting the tolls there under the United States rules of measurement.

Examples of discrimination against American vessels because of the decision of the Attorney General.

[1] In accordance with United States rules for measurement.

The Suez Canal authorities found it necessary to increase the toll rates on that great waterway since the war began. When the Panama Canal tolls were fixed at $1.20 per net registered ton, they were almost exactly the tolls charged at the Suez Canal. What are they to-day? To-day the Suez Canal charges are $1.60 per ton, and we keep the $1.20 rate. If this bill becomes a law, there will be sufficient increase of revenue to meet the increased cost of operation and the cost of supplies down there at the Isthmus.

The chief opponents of this bill are really the lumber interests of the Northwest. They naturally desire to have open-deck spaces upon which to put their dimension timbers. They want to have, in a way, a special privilege.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. And thus not to be subjected to charge for full tollage.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman think that is the contention of the Northwest lumber shippers?

Mr. ESCH. I think, in effect, that is what they want.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is not the gentleman willing to concede that if the net tonnage of a vessel can not be used to full capacity it should not pay for an empty hold and lumber on the deck also?

Mr. ESCH. If that contention can be made by the lumber interests, it can be made by other interests.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And it puts a penalty upon lumber interests.

Mr. ESCH. And if you except lumber, it makes a discrimination.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They speak of British ships coming in there with sheltered decks and inclosures. Does the gentleman contend that they shall not have the best of it?

Mr. ESCH. No. Under the Panama Canal rules of measurement the earning capacity of any vessel is charged, no matter where the cargo is put, whether in the hold or put on open deck with sheltered spaces. Every bit of freight-earning capacity is charged for under the original Panama Canal rules. We want to get back to them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The lumber-carrying business going through the canal has not only to pay the net earning-capacity space, but also what it carries on the deck, and that is to the detriment of what little American coastwise traffic we have.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 25 minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee this question: Take two vessels, sister ships, built on exactly the same mold, one of them having a load of paving brick in her hold and the other having a load of lumber, a partial load, on the upper deck. How would the toll of those two ships compare? Would not the lumber pay for going through the canal?

Mr. ESCH. Under the Panama Canal rules of measurements she would pay more because she is using greater cargo space.

Mr. MILLER. Now, may I ask another question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. In other words, you are putting up to this Congress this proposition of two vessels of the same tonnage, carrying the same tonnage, one of them loaded with paving brick and one with lumber on the deck, paying different rates.

Mr. ESCH. That exists in all transportation. You can not avoid it in railroad transportation by any rule that I know of.

Another thing that I wish to call attention to is the difficulty of administering two sets of rules on the Isthmus, as must be done since the decision of the Attorney General. They admeasure the vessels according to the Panama Canal rules. They measure according to the registered tonnage under United States rules, and if the admeasurement by Panama Canal rules exceeds the maximum of $1.25 per ton, the Panama Canal rules can not be applied. We also use the United States rules of measurement, so that we have two systems that we have got to administer on the Panama Canal Zone, and this has caused confusion and caused dissatisfaction among all shippers that use the canal.

Another thing: Under the present method of administration the officials of the Panama Canal Zone can not make any changes. All changes are submitted to the Commissioner of Navigation, here in Washington, and his word governs on the Isthmus. If we had the Panama Canal rules in operation, decisions would be made on the Isthmus, on the spot, and without delay.

Why, on the 1st day of July, 1917, the Commissioner of Navigation changed certain rules of admeasurement of vessels. Notice of the change did not get down to the Isthmus until early in August. For a whole month officials on the Isthmus charged rates as they existed prior to July 1. What was the result? We had to pay claims for overcharge because of this conflict of jurisdiction, not to say anything about the delay in administering the law.

It does seem to me, gentlemen, that from the point of view of administration alone we are justified in asking you to vote for this measure. But that is not all. I have talked about the amount of expense and the amount by which we would increase our revenues if these original Panama Canal rules were put into operation. I wish to read a conclusion in one of the official reports on this matter:

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST AMERICAN VESSELS AND VIOLATION OF TREATIES.

Under present conditions particular classes of vessels may optionally take advantage of certain privileges in the classification and exemption of space, which gives them a decided advantage over others less favored. This is particularly true in the case of foreign vessels. Such discrimination is a clear violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which stipulates that there should be no discrimination in favor of the vessels of any nation, and operates to the disadvantage of American ships of commerce. It is also in violation of the cardinal principle, which was adopted by the Panama Canal authorities in the preparation of their rules, to the effect that all vessels should be required to pay tolls on their actual earning capacity. The unrestricted application of the Panama Canal rules will avoid any question of discrimination and violation of treaties.

What more just principle can be adopted than to charge an actual earning capacity of a vessel?

Mr. Chairman, this bill comes before this Congress with the indorsement of the Secretary of War. It comes here with the indorsement of Col. Harding, Governor of the Panama Canal Zone. It comes here with the indorsement of Gen. Goethals, who knows more about the canal and its administration than any other living man. It comes here with the indorsement of the Commissioner of Navigation, who stated that the Panama Canal rules of tollage and measurement were the most scientific rules in any nation in the world. For these reasons we ask that this bill be passed. [Applause.]

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask the gentleman if the bill does not also come with the indorsement of a former unanimous report of his committee?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And also of a Senate committee upon the same subject?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; it has been favorably reported to Congress three times.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 32 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in opposition to this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. Before recognizing the gentleman from Washington the Chair will ask if there is any member of the committee opposed to the bill?

Mr. ESCH. I know of no member of the committee who is opposed to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] for one hour.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the members of the committee that at the right time in the consideration of this bill I shall move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof—

That all vessels enrolled, registered, or documented under the laws of the United States shall not be liable to the payment of any tolls in passing through the Panama Canal.

[Applause.]

And that, in my opinion, is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am not offering it now. I shall offer the amendment at the proper time in the exact language of the law that gave to our coastwise ships some rights in the Panama Canal.

I desire now to yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] such time as he desires. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the legislation that has been proposed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is not a new matter. It has been pending before Congress quite a good many years.

It is true that the owners of vessels on the Pacific coast, and particularly those vessels that carry lumber, protest against this legislation. Many of those vessels carry deck loads of lumber. Some of them carry lumber in the hold as well as on the deck. In some of the vessels, I understand, it is very difficult to load lumber in the hold, and so practically the whole lumber cargo has to go on the deck.

Now, the Suez Canal rates are predicated on the net tonnage of the vessel, without regard to whether she carries her cargo on the deck or in the hold, and that is all that is asked by the people who are opposed to this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And also without regard to whether the vessel is a quarter full, half full, or carrying a full load?

Mr. KAHN. Precisely. After the net tonnage has been once ascertained by the officers at the Suez Canal charged with the duty of ascertaining what the net-tonnage capacity of the vessel is, the vessel must pay that price regardless of whether she has any cargo aboard or not.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman say that at the Suez Canal an empty vessel having no cargo goes through free?

Mr. KAHN. No; I say just the opposite of that. She pays on her net-tonnage capacity.

Mr. SIMS. But without a cargo she would have no tonnage.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. She pays on the full net tonnage, whether it is water ballast or what.

Mr. ESCH. The rule is that she pays on her net registered tonnage, which means the space, whether used or not.

Mr. KAHN. I understand; but the conditions at the Suez Canal enable every vessel to be treated alike, whether she carries cargo on the deck or not. I will read from the report of the committee:

Suez rates have increased to $1.60 per ton on all vessels, whether loaded or in ballast, an increase of 33⅓ per cent. Meanwhile Panama Canal rates have been in effect reduced 13 per cent.

It seems to me there ought to be some way of reaching a condition of that kind at Panama without penalizing a ship that happens to be carrying lumber, because lumber is essentially a deck cargo.

Now, the Panama Canal, as has been truly said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS], when originally built by the Government of the United States, was intended to afford some advantage to American shipping in the coastwise trade. The Congress passed a law originally giving vessels of that character this special privilege. The Democratic platform advocated it. The then Democratic candidate for President, Woodrow Wilson, advocated it. Subsequently, when a change of administration took place, the President of the United States came to Congress and asked that that provision be repealed. We were led to believe that grave and serious international complications existed that required, for the sake of our national honor, that that law be repealed. Nobody has ever found out to this day what the great international question or complication was, but the law was repealed. As a consequence of the repeal, thousands of tons of shipping that would have been built for the coastwise trade between the west coast and the east coast of this country were not constructed. Then we found ourselves in a Great War without a fraction of the tonnage that we would have had if the Panama coastwise-trade provision had been allowed to stand as the law.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from California to the fact that I think he has inadvertently made a statement with regard to the Suez Canal which is not correct. Gen. Goethals testified before the committee that under the rule in force at Suez they charge for all earning capacity, deck space as well as under-deck space.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. When was that?

Mr. DENISON. Gen. Goethals's testimony is in the hearings.

Mr. KAHN. What was the date of those hearings?

Mr. DENISON. 1916.

Mr. KAHN. I have here a letter from Capt. Robert Dollar, one of the best-known shipping men in the United States, a man who sails ships on the seven seas. I do not think there is a better-posted shipping man in this country than Robert Dollar. On July 31, 1919, this year, he states:

The tolls should be levied on the tonnage of the ship, irrespective of whether she carries a deck load or not. This is the Suez Canal regulation.

Mr. DENISON. That is exactly what Gen. Goethals testifies—with the actual capacity put on the deck.

Mr. KAHN. I will read Capt. Dollar's letter. It is as follows:

Answering the questions of the War Department, under date of July 23:

Question No. 1: I do not think that it is right to penalize lumber by making it pay a higher rate through the canal than any other commodity.

Question No. 2: The tolls should be levied on the tonnage of the ship, irrespective of whether she carries a deck load or not. This is the Suez Canal regulation.

I call attention to the fact that Capt. Dollar says it is irrespective of whether she carries a deck load or not. So there is no additional pay if she carries tonnage on deck. As I understand it, she pays on her tonnage capacity, whether she carries cargo or not.

Question No. 3: In this connection, would say that there should be no tolls charged on any deck load of any kind or description. It is sufficient that a ship pay the full tariff, the same as charged for passage through the Suez Canal, as stated above.

Question No. 4. By no process of reasoning is it fair to penalize lumber more than coal, iron, or any commodity that is carried on deck, and no commodity carried on deck should pay tolls. Charity begins at home, and why should lumber be so penalized as to pay a tax that no other foreign commodity is asked to pay?

This letter is signed "Robert Dollar." I take it that Capt. Dollar knows what he is talking about; he knows the shipping conditions in the Suez Canal, and knows the shipping conditions in the Panama Canal.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman state, if he knows, how a vessel sailing under the British flag is measured, and how her tonnage is calculated, and how the rate of her tolls is fixed when she passes through the Panama Canal?

Mr. KAHN. I will say frankly to the gentleman that I am not a shipping man. I wish I knew more about it than I do, but I have to depend on other gentlemen to supply me with information.

Mr. DEWALT. That is the very meat of what the gentleman is arguing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They are measured by the Panama rules, as modified by the Bureau of Navigation regulations as to deck space.

Mr. DEWALT. I am asking the gentleman from California the question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, I state that, and when I put the complete Panama rules in, the gentleman will have the Panama rules and the American rules.

Mr. DEWALT. The gentleman from California gives it up.

Mr. KAHN. No; there are two kinds of measurements.

Mr. DEWALT. Does the gentleman give up the conundrum?

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. DEWALT. Does the gentleman from Washington give it up?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not give it up, because I have here Prof. Johnson's book, but it would take from now until night to read it.

Mr. DEWALT. Here is the categorical question: A vessel sails through the Panama Canal under the British flag. How is she measured as to tonnage, and how is the rate of toll calculated?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. She is measured on the net tonnage basis.

Mr. DEWALT. If that is so, where is she measured, in Panama or in the port from which she loads?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not know; I think at Panama. Where is she measured?

Mr. DEWALT. According to the English rule; she is built according to English construction, and by that very fact when she passes through the Panama Canal she gets a discriminatory rate under that tonnage; that is what this bill is attempting to prevent. When you gentlemen confess that you do not know how she is measured, and do not know how she is built, and do not know how tolls are calculated, you are arguing about something you do not understand.

Mr. KAHN. That statement is not correct and it is not entirely fair. I have read from the letter of Capt. Dollar, who does know and is a gentleman of the highest authority. I have absolute confidence in any statement he may make on the subject.

Mr. DEWALT. But that does not touch this subject.

Mr. KAHN. It touches enough of the subject to show that you penalize lumber when you attempt to do what this bill is trying to do, and that is what we object to.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. KAHN. No; I can not now. The statement has been made that to meet these conditions peculiarly shaped vessels, or "freak" vessels, will be built for the purpose of carrying lumber cargoes. That is absurd, absolutely absurd. You could not profitably build a vessel that will carry cargoes only one way. You have got to carry a return cargo. If you carry lumber to the eastern seaboard, you must have a cargo of some kind to take back to the western seaboard, and you could not use a "freak" ship to carry a general cargo.

The situation in the West is very serious. Our market is limited. The railroad rates are high. It is a distinct advantage to the eastern seaboard to allow lumber to come through the Panama Canal, because it comes to the eastern seaboard at a lower rate, and the consumer gets the benefit of that.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. In the beginning the gentleman referred to the original purpose of the Government when it constructed the Panama Canal with reference to tolls—free tolls.

Mr. KAHN. In the coastwise trade.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Does my colleague understand that any foreign government reimburses its citizens for tolls paid in passing through the Panama Canal?

Mr. KAHN. I have heard it stated that rebates were made to the owners of shipping by some Government other than our own.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Placing our ship at a disadvantage?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly; our ship is always put at a disadvantage. It is an unfortunate thing that the American flag on the masthead of vessels is seldom protected by the Congress of the United States or anybody else. I, for one, feel that the time has arrived when the American flag should be nailed to the mastheads of American ships. [Applause.] And the only way you can do that is to refuse to pass laws that will put our American ships at a distinct disadvantage. I yield back the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, how much time did the gentleman from California use?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman used 19 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a query concerning ship measurements was asked a few minutes ago and some surprise expressed because a couple of Pacific coast Members could not answer in detail. Here is a book, with large-sized pages, 600 of them, and numerous maps, endeavoring to explain the measurements of vessels for the Panama Canal, a book by Dr. Emory R. Johnson, a valuable book by a learned man, and here are the hearings of the committee in the Sixty-fourth Congress on this subject, now out of print and available only in these bulky volumes for such Members of Congress as desire to acquire some knowledge of this effort to put American coastwise shipping, carrying certain commodities that are the product of this country, clear out of a fair chance through this canal. I have looked into these hearings. I made a statement here a few minutes ago in an effort to have the question of consideration on this measure voted upon; that the hearings upon this particular bill are not sufficient to inform the Members. I was referred then to the hearings held in 1916 by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and I find that committee was made up as follows: William C. Adamson, of Georgia, chairman; Mr. Sims, Mr. Cullop, Mr. Doremus, Mr. O'Shaunessy, Mr. Stephens, Mr. Barkley, Mr. Rayburn, Mr. Montague, Mr. Decker, Mr. Coady, Mr. Carew, Mr. Dewalt on the then majority side; and on the then minority side, Mr. Esch, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Parker, Mr. Sterling, Mr. Winslow, Mr. J. S. Parker, Mr. Sutherland, and Mr. Dillon, so that the membership present here to-day can see that that committee is almost entirely changed, a great number of the then majority having gone hence. There are 33 or 34 pages of that hearing in this bound volume devoted to this scheme developed in the War Department and has been kept alive by the everlasting hammering of the War Department officials who did not like it when the Attorney General rendered his decision contrary to their views. They have kept it up, and I defy any Member of this House, not a member of this Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, to read these hearings in 1916 and find out what they were all about. So much for the hearings. This year they have railroaded out this bill on short notice because the War Department wants it put over now at a time when, in the words of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] himself, such bills as these were chicken feed. That is the way we get them, on short notice and with little information. Now I wonder——

Mr. SIMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It was the distinguished gentelman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] who referred to certain bills as chicken feed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The suggestion was made by the distinguished ex-Speaker of the House [Mr. CLARK] to the distinguished former chairman of this committee that when he, the gentleman from Tennessee, referred to them as chicken feed he should put it in parentheses as being ironical, and I think he should. Now, in reference to the contention, let me say, to make it clear, I am not a shipping man, nor do I have much knowledge of the lumber-shipping business—that the gross tonnage of a vessel includes its entire closed-in capacity; the net tonnage is, approximately, a vessel's capacity available for cargo and passengers. The gross tonnage is obtained by measuring the contents of the closed-in spaces above and below the upper deck and by dividing the contents thus obtained by 100, if in cubic feet, or by 2.83 if in cubic meters. The net tonnage is ascertained by deducting from the spaces included within the gross tonnage the spaces required for the crew, for the navigation of the ship, and for propelling power. A vessel ton, net or gross, is 100 cubic feet, or 2.83 cubic meters. A vessel's net tonnage is its earning capacity in units of 100 cubic feet or 2,83 cubic meters.

There you have it. Now, then, lumber is a bulky commodity. It is not possible for us in the Pacific Northwest to ship lumber through the Panama Canal in the hold to the capacity of that vessel, upon which we will pay the full capacity charges. Remember, the vessel with any cargo at all, even two sticks of cargo, pays the toll on its full tonnage capacity. When we load the vessel the best we can, say an 8,000-ton vessel, we can put, for instance, only 5,000 tons of railroad ties in the hold, bulky, cumbersome material. We are then forced to pay full rates on the full carrying capacity of that vessel. So we put some heavy lumber on the deck. Now comes this bill, and the committee and the War Department go out of their way to assault one particular industry in the far-away part of these United States; they come along and propose the law that because we have not been able to load our commodity to the capacity of the ship that we shall pay for what is on deck. But we have already paid. In other words, we will pay the full capacity charge plus what we had to put on the deck, and that will include ship timbers, bridge timbers, sometimes 4 feet through, 80 or 90 feet long, which are not conveniently put in the holds of small vessels.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. Suppose there is no freight whatever put in the hold of the ship and it is all put out on the deck. What would the ship pay for going through the canal?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They do not load ships in such a way.

Mr. BARKLEY. But suppose they did?

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose they build barges and do not have any hold?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, well, suppose it was a heavy raft of logs.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the gentleman know that they are now building ships that have practically no holds, but most of the cargo is put out on the open deck?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Here is the Government, that got into the shipbuilding business, building wooden ships. They said they needed them, and said they were going to make them spot the oceans as thickly as blackbirds in the sky. So they ordered the Ferris type of ship. And as a result we have got right now the finest lot of neat little packet boats you ever saw, 400 of them, 70 years behind the times—pretty little 5,000-ton boats, with nice little hatchways in them, 7 or 8 feet square, for the purpose of going on the sea and doing a big business. It would be impossible to load a cargo of big timbers in one of them in two months.

Our western shipbuilders persuaded the Government that we could do a lot better, and finally the Government let us build a few of the Ballin type of ship, where there could be a little more deck space provided. We managed to build for the Government 17 or 18 of those ships. Then we persuaded the Government to let us build a few of the Grays Harbor type, which is more like the ship we have out in the coast carrying business to-day, and which they send through the canal. Our lumber carriers are ships low cut, with crew's quarters at each end and space on the deck for carrying heavy cargo.

Now, you take this space-measurement plan, and when we get a bulky cargo we are absolutely discriminated against, just as the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] said. You take one of those ships going east, and if it were loaded, say, with railroad iron on the deck, there would be a very trifling deck charge, because those 100 cubic feet spaces are not filled up very fast with that sort of commodity. They talk as if we might build some freak ships. Do you suppose that ships that come from the Pacific coast and pass through the canal to the ports of Norfolk and Boston and New York are going back without any cargo? On the contrary, they carry acceptable cargoes back and pay canal tolls both ways. I am just as satisfied as can be that this thing has been built up and worked up by continual charges, such as some printed here, which I think are undignified and improper to be in a report of a committee of the House of Representatives. The Secretary of War sends up here a letter——

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. OSBORNE. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Kentucky, whom I notice has just stepped out, as to the charging of tolls on the inside capacity of the ship, is it not a fact that under this arrangement they do pay tolls on capacity inside whether they have got anything or not, and then pay the extra tolls for deck load?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Provided they started with a cargo toll.

Mr. OSBORNE. And then you pay extra for the space you actually use for cargo?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly. The Secretary of War sends up here on July 3 a letter advising the passage of this bill and inclosing a suggested copy of the bill. On July 12, one week later, the bill is reported out, and in the Secretary of War's letter is inclosed a copy of a letter from Gen. Harding, governor of the canal, in which he says:

> The matter has been covered heretofore in hearings before the congressional committees and by written communications that have formed parts of the records of the hearings. In the last Congress the bill reached the stage of having been favorably reported by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and of having been placed on the House Calendar—

That was in the Sixty-fifth Congress—

> In the Senate the Committee on Interoceanic Canals favorably reported the bill, but on account of the opposition of the lumber interests of the Pacific coast the bill was rereferred to the committee for further hearings and was never again reported.

I presume that under the rules of this House I am barred from discussing procedure in the other body, but I can reply to this letter of Gen. Harding, and say that that is not a fair statement of the case. This toll bill, which only got as far as the calendar in the last House, got out on the floor of the Senate and had to go back, because the letter and reports and statements as to measurements, such as have been referred to in the opening statements made here this afternoon, did not bear examination.

Now, you want to remember when you come to discuss the ships of the world, that these other great nations have been in the shipping business a long, long time, and they have driven the United States out until these little coastwisers are about all the ships we have. And they have in their measurements about every kind of device for beating the game that there is—shell decks, awning decks, and every other kind. I have not any doubt that the statement made to the effect that they get the best of it in going through the canal is correct. And I would be glad to see plans perfected by which they can be controlled, but at the same time I think, in doing that, this Congress, without further hearings and more complete knowledge or study, is going a long, long way against the American ship and American flag, and the lumber business of the Pacific Northwest, in putting on us a double price to go through that canal.

Gentleman, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, by direction of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the people of the Northwest States—Oregon and Washington—have more lumber in the tree than any other 2 States in the United States, perhaps than any 10 States. They have a great lumber industry, and before the Panama Canal was built they either had to pay railroad rates to the East, if they sold lumber here, or they had to go around South America. They had to do it then, and they can do so now.

Now, if they pay for lumber loaded on the deck through the Panama Canal, will they not still have a great benefit in the canal? But, in effect, they do not want to pay any charge upon lumber going through the canal. They want to load it all on the deck, and therefore have it go absolutely free of toll. It will pay nothing with which to reimburse the taxpayers of the United States, who spent $400,000,000 that they might not have to go around Cape Horn. Does that look like a broad, patriotic, generous spirit? It is of great benefit to them to use the canal rather than to go around the Cape. They have the privilege now of going around if they want to do so, but it is to their commercial interest to use the canal. However, they want to use it free, because they can load on the deck practically all of their lumber.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know anything about the facts in the matter, not being a seaman. As I understood somebody to state here, the capacity to carry in that hold is charged for; that is, the capacity under the deck and the deck capacity also, for any ship that went through was charged for.

Mr. SIMS. That will have to be paid for.

Mr. CANNON. Whether it was loaded or not?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. That is absolutely true, Mr. Chairman. If they load lumber on top of the vessel and do not load any in the hold, or load anything else in the hold, they have to pay for that lumber what the space measured under the rules of the United States would amount to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But no lumber-carrying vessel was ever loaded entirely on the deck, with nothing inside. No vessel could be loaded that way.

Mr. SIMS. But the gentleman will know that, so far as space in the hold of the vessel is concerned, that is measured either by the Panama Canal rules or the United States rules. It can be loaded with traffic other than lumber, and lumber can be loaded on top, and if enough such vessels are used the whole Oregon and Washington output of lumber can be transported absolutely free, because the traffic put in the hold would pay the toll, and it would not come out of the lumber at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What cargo, for instance, from the Pacific coast could be shipped that way? Does the gentleman think that sugar from Hawaii could be shipped in combination with rough lumber?

Mr. SIMS. Something that could be loaded and carried in the hold while the lumber is placed on deck, and the tolls cost of transportation could be charged on the goods in the hold, while the lumber would go free. But the fact is that under the present rules lumber loaded on top of a vessel, or anything else loaded on top, would go absolutely free.

Now, is it fair to the taxpayers of the United States to have a profitable traffic go through the canal free—a traffic that is not limited to the canal, but which can go around the Horn by sailing or steam vessels—all the way around—and not pay anything?

Now, we are not even paying operating expenses on the canal; not paying them even if the Panama Canal rules are adopted. I ask gentlemen to look at this thing in a broad and generous way. The port charges and other charges made against vessels under United States rules are for a general service that applies to every port of the United States, and by courtesy we accept the measurements of other vessels in their country for like purposes. Now, the Panama Canal is a special tax-paid-for facility. The Isthmus was cut in two by the taxpayers and that special facility furnished. Therefore the rules for the Panama Canal may justly differ from the rules of port measurement for collection of port dues and all that sort of thing.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the revenue from the Panama Canal pay the operating expenses?

Mr. SIMS. It does not, so far.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Do the Ohio River locks and dams charge tolls?

Mr. SIMS. No. Those are free.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Is not the Panama Canal one of our great rivers in a sense?

Mr. SIMS. Our rivers do not charge foreign vessels if they use them.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I will say that I asked Gov. Harding about that matter when I was down there, and he said the traffic would have to increase to three times what it is now in order that the canal might pay operating expenses.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In that event the operating expenses would also include interest on the bonds?

Mr. SIMS. If he referred to interest, yes. But I am speaking of actual operating expenses.

Let me say reference was made several times to the act repealing the free-toll provision on American coastwise vessels. The point is this, that if we had that free-toll provision unrepealed, if the repealing provision had not been enacted, every American coastwise vessel would go through free. The bill ought to be changed as to foreign vessels if nothing else, because foreign vessels can do the very same sort of business that the Pacific coast gentlemen are doing now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let us make the change this afternoon. Here are the exact words in which that bill was written. Think about it. We can fix this Panama Canal system of tolls, and all except coastwise can pay on the Panama measurement plan. Then we can put in the following provision, which must be the gentleman's own words used some years ago:

Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no tolls shall be levied upon vessels in the coastwise trade of the United States going through the Panama Canal, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Why not make that an American canal? Give the American cargo a chance. Let our coastwise vessels under our flag go through free.

Mr. SIMS. That is a very generous proposition, exceedingly so. But the world went to war because one nation regarded a treaty as a mere "scrap of paper." The gentleman knows that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provided for equal and fair charges to all nations using the canal on the same basis.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We can fix this whole thing up this afternoon.

Mr. SIMS. Here is what has been done: Under the ruling of the Attorney General applying the United States rules to the Panama Canal instead of the Panama Canal rules, which Congress made and against which no Republican or Democrat in this House voted, we have lost $2,797,260.26 since the operation of the canal began. A large portion of this sum was lost as to foreign vessels.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, can I have three minutes more?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. We had better to-day appropriate out of the Treasury of the United States a bonus, a subsidy, on Oregon and Washington lumber for the extra amount they have to pay rather than not pass this bill, and let the foreigners use the canal the same way these gentlemen are using it, because on the Pacific coast ships are being built with practically no space except deck-load space for carrying full loads on deck, and foreigners can do the same thing. Pay what you have to pay on deck loads rather than fail to pass this bill, if that is what it takes to get the bill passed. I hope the bill will be passed. It is nothing but justice and right.

Mr. Chairman, I believe my time has about expired. I hope the bill will be passed. It is nothing but just and right. It is not a Republican measure or a Democratic measure. It is a measure of absolute justice, and nothing else, as against the foreigner and not alone against the people of the Northwest.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Would not the granting of a subsidy be practically the same as free tolls?

Mr. SIMS. Of course it would to that extent. I say it is better to do that than not to pass this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time now stands that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] has 16 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] has 27 minutes remaining.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, everyone, whether he be a Member of Congress or not, or has ever been in Congress, knows that the Panama Canal was not built as a commercial enterprise; that its commercial use is incidental; that it was built for the strategic purpose of bringing the two coasts together. But as long as it is built for its strategic value, throwing the two coasts together under the naval program, it is susceptible of use along commercial lines. The income, from a commercial point of view, was not even considered as a factor in its construction, and such income now should not be considered of primary importance.

Now, I submit this proposition to the House, that if two sister ships, built on exactly the same molds, costing the same number of dollars, and carrying the same number of tons, are loaded, one of them with paving brick or railroad iron going from Seattle to New York, and the other loaded with lumber going from Seattle to New York, the lumber ship would have to pay $1,000 more to go through the Panama Canal than the ship loaded with brick would have to pay. Gentlemen, is that fair or honest? Is it a form of commercial honesty that should receive the approval of Congress?

Of course, a system of tolls is proper, but the question of tolls is not the entire or governing question. The canal was built, as I have said, to throw the two coasts together in our plan of naval and military operations, but whatever system of commercial tolls we make for its use by commercial vessels let us not in these tolls discriminate as between vessels carrying various American commodities or between cargoes part of which is in the hold of the vessel and part on deck or all in the hold. The tonnage is the same in either event.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLER. I have but three minutes.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. How are you going to frame the law so as to make that right?

Mr. MILLER. The same analogy would make it cost you more to take 2 tons of hay across a toll bridge than 2 tons of iron or brick, simply because of its bulk. Everybody who knows anything about shipping lumber knows that you can not load a ship to its capacity with lumber in its hold. Out in our country we have large-dimension lumber that can not be put into the hold of a ship at all. You can take a 3,000-ton ship, and you can not load it to its capacity in its hold if you load it with lumber, but you can if you load it with brick, or iron ore, or railroad iron. In order to load that ship to its capacity, according to the Lloyd measurements, we fill the hold of the vessel and then put part of that load upon the deck. When we put it upon the deck we are penalized for it in going through the Panama Canal. If anybody can show me why it should cost more to take a ton of hay across a bridge than it costs to take a ton of brick across that bridge, he will show me something that I have never heard before. That is what you are doing in the Panama Canal if you pass this bill.

We of the Pacific Northwest are lumber producers. Do you want to help us, gentlemen? If you do you will decrease the charges on lumber going through the Panama Canal and put us on the same basis as you put everything else. We make a great many paving bricks out there in my country and ship them all over the country. We ship them east to the Atlantic seaboard; and we have the anomalous condition that, taking two of our products, it will cost us far less to deliver 5,000 tons of brick through the Panama Canal than to deliver 5,000 tons of lumber through the Panama Canal. All we ask is a system of measurement by which, if a vessel is carrying 5,000 tons of American merchandise, whether it be brick or iron ore, whether it be lumber or hay, it shall go through the Panama Canal at the same rate and the same price. It costs no more to put a lumber ship through the Panama Canal than it costs to put a ship of equal tonnage laden with iron ore, so far as the mechanism of the canal is concerned. But because we put some of that lumber on the deck, because it is a bulky commodity and we can not get it in the hold of the vessel, they charge us a greater rate of tollage than if it was a heavy commodity that could be put in the hold of the ship.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. Would you not be subject to exactly the same penalty in the increase of rates on your lumber, if you shipped it east by rail, as against a commodity that was more compact and heavier in its nature?

Mr. MILLER. We never ship any lumber by rail to the East. We only ship it as far as Missouri River points. Nobody ever ships any lumber from the Pacific coast to the eastern market by rail. The farthest it goes is to Missouri River points.

Mr. WELLING. The point I want to bring out is this, that the situation would be exactly the same if you did ship by rail as it now is if you shipped by water. The rate would be increased according to the bulk of the material you ship.

Mr. MILLER. When we do ship lumber by rail, we do not ship it in closed or box cars. We ship it on open cars, and pile it up in order to get as nearly as we can the capacity of the car. If we should ship it in closed or box cars, it would correspond with a vessel, and we could not ship lumber in box cars even as far as Kalispel, Mont. We ship it in open cars, corresponding to the deck load of the vessel. There is just simply that point, gentlemen, and it seems to me it is a good one. I know you gentlemen do not want to injure the lumber interests of the Pacific coast. We want to help you and we want your help; all we ask is that 5,000 tons of lumber shall go through the Panama Canal and not cost more than 5,000 tons of brick. You give us that kind of a law and we will be all right. I will ask you if that is not fair between man and man and one coast and another.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman think that 5,000 tons of hay ought to be the same as 5,000 tons of lumber?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; if only one vessel is used.

Mr. DENISON. Five thousand tons of hay might take several vessels.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, no.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understood the gentleman's question to be if he did not think that 5,000 tons of any commodity should pay the same?

Mr. MILLER. A vessel loaded with 5,000 tons; yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Five thousand tons of different commodities would bear the same rate?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman think that one commodity should bear a less rate than another commodity? Your contention is that lumber is paying a less rate. The bill bases the tonnage on the earning capacity of the ship irrespective of the commodity that constitutes the cargo.

Mr. MILLER. I would say that two ships of identical tonnage, sister ships, one loaded with iron ore or brick will go through the canal at $1,380 less than a ship with the same capacity loaded with lumber.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The shipload of lumber desires to go through at a less rate, as determined by existing law.

Mr. MILLER. Not a bit per ton. I can not follow that sort of argument.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, in the arguments made by Members from the Pacific coast they assert that this bill is aimed at the lumber interests of their States. They are taking a very narrow view of the situation. This bill is intended to provide for the canal tolls to apply to all vessels and all commodities alike, in order to correct a mistake that was made or grew out of the Panama Canal act. There is no one else who comes here and objects to the bill except the lumber interests of the Pacific coast, and so these gentlemen assume that the bill is aimed alone at them.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Is it not the contention of these gentlemen opposed to the bill that the bill provides a higher rate on lumber than any other commodity?

Mr. DENISON. No; I do not so understand it. What the Panama Canal rules would do is to treat all the vessels alike, to charge every vessel that goes through the canal on its net earning capacity, and make no difference as to what it is loaded with.

Here is what gentlemen from the Pacific coast are seeking: They want a preference on account of a particular commodity. They want a commodity preference. If they want to do that they can get it in other ways. In order to get a commodity preference for lumber they are willing for the canal to be run at a great financial loss and are willing for the same preference to go to a lot of other commodities than their own. All they want is a preference for the lumber business, and let me show you where the lumber interests are very shortsighted and quite selfish, as I view the question.

The records show that the first year or the first few months that the canal was open for traffic before the slides occurred the canal government collected tolls according to the Panama Canal rules of measurement before the decision of the Attorney General was made known. As a result of that decision the Government had to pay back or refund over $300,000 in tolls already collected. Since that time the total loss by reason of applying the United States measurement rules instead of the Panama Canal measurement rules amounts to $2,797,260. That is the total loss in tolls during the last two and a half years.

Now, what part of that loss in tolls has gone to the American port-to-port ships that these gentlemen from Washington are talking so much about? The pitiable sum of $145,288. That is their total part of that $2,797,000 that the Government has lost, or about 5 per cent. So that those interests who have saved 5 per cent of the total tolls lost by the Government are willing for the Government to lose a great amount of money in order that the owners of ships that carry lumber can save 5 per cent of the amount and let the rest of it go to the foreign shipowners. That is a selfish view, in my judgment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is a very nice point the gentleman makes. But here are the exact facts: We undertook to have hearings, so that we could make a showing for the exemption of the coastwise trade, so that we might have a chance to do business with the canal and not cost the Government 95 per cent. We wanted to be fair about the matter.

Mr. DENISON. If we should adopt the gentleman's amendment and exempt coastwise vessels entirely from the payment of tolls we would still lose the tolls that are being given now to foreign ships by reason of having to use the United States rules of measurement. It would not remedy the unfortunate situation at all, except that it would exempt the American coastwise shipping from all tolls. That question is not involved in this bill. We can not go back and thrash that out now. If we should adopt the gentleman's amendment we know the President would veto the bill, because we know the President's attitude. We can not go into that question now. What we are trying to do now is to provide uniform rules of measurement for the collection of such tolls as are collected at the canal.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If he would not favor an amendment I have offered he would not favor an amendment exempting coastwise vessels, and we thought that they should be measured by the American measurement, the same as they are going through the Suez Canal.

Mr. DENISON. No; we ought to follow the Panama Canal rules of measurements for all vessels, American or foreign, so that there will be no discrimination against the vessels of any nation, and especially none against those of our own country, in the collection of tolls. Moreover, if we provide for applying the Panama Canal rules of measurement it will simplify the administration of the regulations and add materially to the Government's revenues. The present rules of measurement of vessels at Panama are now under the supervision of the Commissioner of Navigation, here in Washington, instead of being under the Panama Canal government. It ought not to be under his jurisdiction. It ought to be under the jurisdiction of the Panama Canal government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It says here that it must be determined by the Panama Canal rules.

Mr. DENISON. At Panama.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. "As they now exist or as they may be changed from time to time." Is that the way the gentleman——

Mr. DENISON. That is the Panama Canal act.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This is in the proposed act: "As they now exist or as they may be changed from time to time." Who knows what kind of rules or rates they are going to give there?

Mr. DENISON. I will say that the Panama Canal act was passed by Congress long ago and has gone into history, giving the President the power——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But in order to make the rule fit, in other words, when they found they could not square the $1.20 with $1.25 they have been three solid years trying to sneak this thing through.

Mr. DENISON. The Panama Canal act uses the words "net registered tonnage" in estimating tonnage for the purpose of determining tolls, whereas the Panama Canal rules do not use the words "net registered tonnage," but "net vessel tonnage," estimated from the actual earning capacity of the vessel. So the legal question arose as to what the words "net registered tonnage" as used in the Panama Canal act meant; and the Attorney General, in delivering his opinion, said that those terms meant "net registered tonnage" under the rules of measurement of the United States Government, and not "net vessel tonnage" under the Panama Canal rules of measurement. Well, that being true, it upset the whole system of collecting tolls at the Panama Canal, and this bill is intended to remove that error in the Panama Canal act, so as to make the Panama Canal rules of measurement apply instead of United States rules.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. This bill simply carries out what the original intention was before the Attorney General's opinion was rendered.

Mr. DENISON. That is the whole thing in a nutshell. It simply carries out the intention of Congress in passing the original Panama Canal act. Now, every nation has its own rules of measurement. When a vessel is completed it is measured by the authorities of the Government under their own rules of measurement and given a certificate of gross and net tonnage capacity. The tonnage is duly registered and the certificate of registered tonnage is usually carried with the ship's papers.

Some governments follow one rule of measurement and others follow other rules. Some exempt more cargo space from the net tonnage than do others. So that ships of exactly the same size and capacity belonging to different governments may have quite different net registered tonnage. And, in fact, American ships, measured under the United States rules, are allowed less exemptions of space than are those of England and other countries.

But by treaties or common agreements each nation accepts in its own ports the certificates of registered tonnage of the ships of other nations. So that so long as the United States rules of measurement are used at the Panama Canal the canal authorities have to accept the net registered tonnage of the vessels of all nations as found under their varying rules of measurement, and thereby the Panama Canal loses tolls on all goods that are shipped on open decks or other parts of the ships that, under the rules of the respective governments, are not included in the measurements of their ships' registered tonnage. As I have said, other governments are more liberal than the United States in exempting space from ship measurements. Therefore as long as the United States rules of measurement apply to the canal, American vessels will have to pay higher tolls than English or other foreign ships of exactly the same size and carrying the same cargo. This is a discrimination against our own ships and in favor of foreign ships that is unfair, besides depriving the Government of a large amount of tolls. If we pass this bill and apply the Panama Canal rules of measurement to all vessels transiting the canal, all vessels will receive the same treatment and pay tolls on their total actual earning capacity, and the Government will save over a million dollars a year in tolls.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has 8 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Washington has 17 minutes remaining.

Mr. ESCH. We have only one more speech.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I shall use but a few minutes. I am sorry it is not possible to bring before this House in one hour all the letters, papers, and appeals that have come from Army officials in the last three years in an effort to get this thing passed. I do not believe that this is a discrimination at all in favor of the Pacific coast northwest lumber shippers, the so-called discrimination that he gets now, if he gets any, by putting on the top of the deck that which he can not put in the space for which he pays the full rate, so that he will pay not only for the entire space, or net tonnage, in the hold of the ship, whether it was 2 sticks or 10,000 sticks, but for the other lumber on top of the deck. You will make it extremely hard for him to do business through the canal. The lumber business through the canal has been nothing like what people thought it would be. I think some lumber ships are still using the Tehuantepec Railroad instead of using the canal. They are building lumber-carrying vessels, and, as I said before, they are about the only kind of American coastwise ships which we have, which is a low, wooden ship practically without superstructure that stands the storms at sea. They load these ships, carry them down the Pacific coast, and put the cargo on the railroad and haul it across, and then the cargo is reloaded on another ship. The Panama Canal has not made the money that it was thought it was going to make. It was thought it was going to do a great thing for the coastwise trade. But what is it doing? Not much. Judge Adamson was down there a few years ago, and afterwards stated in the hearings that he saw 20 or 30 ships, all foreigners, equipped with every kind of deck-load-defeating device—tricks they learned in the Suez. At some point, or at the conclusion of this debate, I shall offer an amendment, which I am satisfied ought to go in this bill, to govern the tolls to be paid at the canal. I understand that is the object of the bill, and that being the case I can not see why we should not now, in the Committee of the Whole, in consideration of this bill from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, place on it an amendment to the effect that there shall be no tolls on coastwise vessels. That will not interfere with the commerce of the world. It will not be a discrimination against the British ship or anything else, because the ship in the world's commerce will pay tolls through that canal. If that amendment does not prevail, we shall offer another in an effort to keep American ships flying the American flag going through that canal from a Pacific port to an Altantic port under American measurements, so that no matter what they carry from one port in the United States to another they shall not be discriminated against. Railroad iron and railroad ties can not be fairly treated in the same 100-cubic-feet measurement for each. I think that is as simple and as plain as can be. Speaking for the people of the north Pacific coast in the lumber industry—a great industry in the district I represent—I desire to resent these charges in some of these reports against that industry. It has been one of the big and important industries in the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as remains to me to the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 12 minutes.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, considerable has been said here on the floor about the cost of running the Panama Canal and the inadequate revenues; that is, to pay expenses. I want to call the attention of the members of the committee to this fact: The canal was finished only a few years before the Great War, and with the commencement of the war the ships running through the canal and paying toll were very largely taken off. At my own port of Los Angeles there were several lines running, some around to New York, others to Europe, that were all taken off at about the same time. The American-Hawaiian Line was one of these; the German Hamburg-American Line had run some ships from there, and a large quantity of commerce was taken off the canal. That is one reason why the books show up as poorly as I know they do.

However, the canal was not built primarily, as has been stated here, as a money-making proposition. It was built to facilitate the trade of the world, and particularly that of America. In the first instance, it was proposed that the canal should be, so far as American coastwise trade is concerned, free of tolls, and, indeed, I think that was good policy. And I have as authority for that belief the opinion of one of the great men of this country, delivered at Washington Park, N. J., August 16, 1912. The great man to whom I refer was then governor of the State of New Jersey. He is to-day President of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] With the permission of the House I will ask the Clerk to read a portion of the speech that he made on that occasion, showing his idea of the province of the Panama Canal, which fully agrees with my own.

The Clerk read as follows:

Gov. Wilson said, in part:

"Now, there is another matter you know—we are digging a tremendous ditch across the Isthmus of Panama. It is predicted by the engineers in charge of that colossal enterprise that we shall be able to open it to the ships of the world by the year 1915. What interest have you in opening it to the ships of the world? We do not own the ships of the world. By a very ingenious process, which I would not keep you standing in the hot sun long enough to outline, the legislation of the United States has destroyed the merchant marine of the United States. The chief road by which your crops travel to the Orient is through the Suez Canal. They do not go around by the Pacific. Most of your maps do not show you the short road to the Orient, because they are spread out flat.

"If you will get a globe and draw a circle around the globe you will see your short road is through the Suez Canal, not across the Pacific, and that the western farmer, therefore, has to ship his crops across the continent in order to reach the ships that are to take that road. And when his crops reach the port, do they find American ships waiting for them? Not at all. In most years not a single ship carrying the American flag goes through that canal carrying freight.

"Some ships carry the American flag through that canal, but they are mostly private yachts. A friend of mine who has just traveled around the world told me that he did not see the American flag once between New York and Hongkong, going by the way of the canal, until he reached the Island of Ceylon, and then saw the flag of Mr. James Gordon Bennett's yacht. If the shipowners of the nations carry your grain and cargoes they are going to carry them by routes and to markets which suit them, not the routes and the markets which are chosen by you.

"One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports, to allow all the farmers on what I may, standing here, call this part of the continent, to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or the ports of the Atlantic seaboard, and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast or down the coast of South America.

"Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free toll for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

"The farmers of this country are, in my judgment, just as much concerned in the policy of the United States with regard to that canal as any other class of citizens of the United States. Probably they are more concerned than any other one class, and what I am most desirous to see is the farmers of the country coming forward as partners in the great national undertakings and take a wide national, nay, international, view of these great matters, feeling all the pulses of the world that beat in the great arteries of their own life and prosperity. Everything that is done in the interest of cheap transportation is done directly for the farmer as well as for other men. So that you ought not to grudge the millions poured out for the deepening and opening of old and new waterways. * * *

"Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

"They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to very quiet and private fetreat."

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, this statement in regard to the object of the Panama Canal is in the clear, concise, lucid language which the President is so capable of using. I agree with it entirely; and, for my own part, I hope to see this House, I hope to see the Congress, pass a bill in accordance with the sentiments expressed by the President with such characteristic clearness in this address. I shall vote for such a measure when it comes before the House, and I shall certainly vote against any proposition that continues these tolls on American products that are carried through an American waterway. I consider the Panama Canal precisely as an American river, on which there ought not to be any tolls charged to American shipping. I take it that that was the view of the President when he made that speech in 1912. Instead of relieving the coastwise trade that we are trying to build up we are, by this bill, putting new taxes on it, and especially on one of the principal products of the Pacific coast, namely, that of lumber. By this bill you are making a discriminating tax and toll. It is unworthy of this House; it is wrong; and, for my own part, I hope that the amendment about to be proposed by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] to relieve American shipping from tolls through the Panama Canal will be adopted by this committee and by the House. [Applause.]

I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Gentlemen, I have given but a little study to this bill, but during the administration of President Taft Congress passed a bill relieving all vessels in the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls through the Panama Canal. In the Democratic platform that our President was elected upon for his first term it declared for free tolls for American ships through the Panama Canal engaged in the coastwise trade. Later on the President came before the Congress and recommended the repeal of that act, but gave no reasons why he asked for its repeal. In fact, he used this language, in substance: "I can not tell you why I am asking for the repeal of this law; but if you do not grant to me this request, I will not know what to do."

What information should the President of the United States have on a subject of as much importance as that that the Congress of the United States should not have? It seems—or at least the information so went abroad—that there was some objection on the part of the Government of Great Britain, and that our President yielded to the request of that Government, claiming that it was a discrimination, according to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, against English ships. No English ships engaged in the coastwise trade in this country, and neither did any other vessel under any other flag of the world, except the United States, up to the time we entered the European war. That trade was preserved by a law, enacted, I think, about 1814, reserving for vessels flying the flag of the United States all coastwise business, both freight and passenger.

The Government of the United States built the Panama Canal and paid for it with our money. The coastwise trade of this country is not in competition with any other ships of any other country in the world, and ought to be free to American vessels, and when this war is over we hope to go back to conditions that existed before the war and reinstate the coastwise laws that were then upon our statute books. Our ships engaged to-day in the coastwise trade ought to be free from tolls in going through the canal.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana yields back two minutes. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] desire to use those two minutes?

Mr. ESCH. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to use it, I will yield it to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this bill proposes merely to cure what was an inadvertence when the Panama Canal act was passed. When that act was passed there was a provision to the effect that the tolls charged by the Panama Canal should not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton. The President of the United States was given authority to prescribe rule and regulations. He did so, and for a long period of time after the Panama Canal rules were put into effect the tolls were paid in accordance with those Panama Canal rules, and no complaint was made. Those rules were uniform and required the same sort of tolls to be paid by every ship that passed through the canal.

A question arose about carrying a cargo of lumber, and the matter was submitted to the Attorney General of the United States, and he decided that because of the peculiar language of the act the Panama Canal rules did not govern so far as this restriction was concerned with reference to $1.25 per net registered ton, but that the United States rules govern. From that time on we have used the United States rules, which are different from the Panama Canal rules. A peculiar thing about the United States rules is this, that certain foreign vessels are measured in accordance with the foreign standards under those rules, as stated by Gov. Harding:

It also discriminates against our own ships for the reason that according to the rules of the Commissioner of Navigation ships of certain nations are admitted to the United States registry on the same rules of measurement of net tonnage as obtain in their own country, and while these discriminations are insignificant for the usual purposes for which tonnage is measured, harbor fees and things of that character, when the differences are to be multiplied by $1.25 a ton, there is a considerable discrimination in dollars and cents in favor of such foreign vessels whenever they transit the canal. (Hearings, Sixty-fourth Congress, p. 1.)

The foreign countries take advantage of this situation and make rules governing such foreign shipments which are liberally in their favor. This is disclosed in the following colloquy:

The CHAIRMAN. Does each nation apply the same rules to a ship at home as abroad?

Col. HARDING. I understand they do not. The marine superintendent on the Isthmus; the former marine superintendent, Capt. Rodman, and his successor, Capt. Cone, both told me that certain rules of Great Britain, for example, which are applicable to foreign ports are not applicable to home ports.

The CHAIRMAN. Do they make a larger result in measurement at home than abroad?

Col. HARDING. They do; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And a larger charge?

Col. HARDING. And a larger charge.

Hence when the English ships pass through the Panama Canal, although they are measured under what are known as United States rules, as a part of these rules those English ships pass through in accordance with the English rule, and this is the result: American ships, of course, go under the standard American rule, but a British ship pays $1,462 less tolls than an American ship of the same size, when under the Panama Canal rule she would have paid $24 more, thus making a discrimination in favor of the foreign ship of $1,486 on a single passage. In another instance, taking an American and a like British ship of the same size, we find a discrimination in favor of the British ship of $2,878. Again, in the case of an American ship and a like Norwegian ship, there is a discrimination in favor of the foreign ship of $1,063. Thus the effect of these rules is to give a discrimination in favor of foreign ships.

It was never intended by this Congress that it should be done, and this question whether it will incidentally affect the shipment of lumber from the Pacific coast is a mere trifling incident compared with the great proposition as to whether we are going to have a uniform standard rule for the measurement of the tonnage of these ships. This is the question that is presented to you. If we pass this law to-day there is nothing in the world to prevent—if there is some special reason on account of the peculiar construction of the ships and the length of lumber, why, there should be some distinction made—there is nothing to prevent these gentlemen who ship lumber from appearing and getting the rules changed, because this law does not prevent it. This merely establishes a standard rule for all shipping, so that when they undertake to make the measurements they will have one standard and the foreign ships will not have an advantage over the American ships.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I only desire, in the few minutes I have, to try to show the unreasonableness of the position taken by the gentlemen from Oregon and Washington in regard to the lumber industry. I am willing to grant for purposes of the argument, although I do not grant it as a fact, that they have reason for complaint, and that they are in their view discriminated against by reason of this deck-load charge. But I ask this committee, and I ask the gentlemen from Oregon and Washington who make this complaint, even if it be true, which is the larger problem for this committee to consider? Is the discrimination against them, which in dollars and cents, according to the figures in the last year, amounted to only $145,000, greater than the discrimination against all the shipping of the United States which must pass through the Panama Canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean? In other words, which is the larger problem we have to deal with, the preservation of the rights of the shipping of the United States under the American flag which passes through the Panama Canal, or the right of this one particular industry, which, admittedly, according to their statement, is discriminated against in the pitiable sum of $145,000 in regard to tolls during the year, whereas the loss to the Government amounts to $2,797,260 in the last few years?

Therefore you have this great problem presented to you: Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that there be something in the argument of the gentlemen from the Western States in regard to the lumber industry, are you to consider their complaint and legislate for that industry alone, or will you legislate for the entire commerce of the United States and the vessels that sail through the Panama Canal? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in measuring vessels and determining the tolls to be paid thereon at the Panama Canal the measurement shall be made and tonnage determined in all cases by the Panama Canal rules as they now exist or as they may be changed from time to time, and the tonnage arrived at by those rules shall be the tonnage to which shall be applied the rate fixed by the President for the purpose of determining the tolls to be collected, and shall be the tonnage to which shall be applied the maximum and minimum rates now fixed by law or hereafter to be fixed for the purpose of determining the maximum and minimum tolls which may be charged.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 1, line 13, insert the following:

"Provided, That from and after the date of approval of this act no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States for the use of the Panama Canal, and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make it or reserve it?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I make it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on that. What is the gentleman's point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana please give the Chair the benefit of his views on the point of order?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this bill is very short, and reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in measuring vessels and determining the tolls to be paid thereon at the Panama Canal the measurement shall be made and tonnage determined in all cases by the Panama Canal rules as they now exist or as they may be changed from time to time, and the tonnage arrived at by those rules shall be the tonnage to which shall be applied the rate fixed by the President for the purpose of determining the tolls to be collected, and shall be the tonnage to which shall be applied the maximum and minimum rates now fixed by law or hereafter to be fixed for the purpose of determining the maximum and minimum tolls which may be charged.

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws, rules, and regulations in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

It will thus be seen, Mr. Chairman, that this act deals with one single, solitary thing, and that is the restoration of the Panama Canal rules in the measurement of the tonnage of vessels. It deals with that subject, and that alone. There is nothing in it that provides for tolls. There is nothing in it on the subject of tolls. The only subject matter dealt with is the subject of the measurement of the tonnage of vessels.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What does the gentleman say as to this title, "A bill governing the tolls to be paid at the Panama Canal"? And every few lines "tolls" are mentioned, and the concluding line, "of determining the maximum and minimum tolls." What can it amount to? It is all about tolls.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Of course, the title does not, under the rules, enter into the question, and the use of the word "tolls" in the bill at all is incidental. This bill relates to the standard measurement of ships, and nothing else. Of course, if the gentleman were correct in his suggestion that it does relate to the payment of tolls and fixes the payment of tolls—which it does not—even then an amendment would not be proper in Committee of the Whole which proposes to relieve it entirely from tolls. That would be clear under the decision which was recently had when we had the Bureau of War Risk Insurance case before us.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. What is the purpose of this bill?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The purpose of this bill is to provide that in measuring ships at the Panama Canal——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And what else? "And in determining the tolls." How can you get away from that?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That in measuring ships at the Panama Canal the Panama Canal rules shall be used.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Unfortunately the language of the bill does not sustain the proposition of the gentleman. To my mind, it declares the purpose of the bill. It says that all of this machinery is for the purpose of determining the tolls to be collected.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is for the purpose of determining the tolls to be collected.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The bill is not enacted for determining the tolls, but it is for the measurement of the ships.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; but what does line 3 say?—

That in measuring vessels and determining the tolls to be paid thereon.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is for the purpose of determining the tolls to be collected.

Mr. BARKLEY. But not the rate of tolls.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was just spontaneously replying to the gentleman's suggestion that this bill does not attempt to regulate the rate of tolls at all; but in determining the aggregate amount of tolls to be paid the question of measurement is all that is considered in this bill, and the rate is not authorized or fixed at any rate of toll, but only in arriving at the aggregate of tolls the measurement is fixed.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I suggest that the language alluded to is the language of the existing law, and changes no law at all.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But is it not a fact that this bill is amendatory of existing law?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Of course it changes existing law to some extent, but it is not the amendment of any specific section of the law. It is a separate and independent act, specifically providing that the Panama Canal rules shall be the standard for measuring the tonnage of ships.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is amendatory of the act which does fix the tolls.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Of course, indirectly.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Being amendatory of the act which does fix the tolls, any provision which does fix the tolls would be germane.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman is in error. The gentleman must be familiar with the rule that even if it were an amendment of a specific section or an amendment of a specific part of a section you could not bring in other sections. It comes clearly within the rule that when there is one definite subject matter you can not bring in another entirely foreign subject matter.

But I want to make my point clear that I was undertaking to make when the gentleman from Indiana asked the question. Assuming that this law dealt with the question of collecting tolls, it is clear under all the precedents of the House and all the rulings of the chairmen of Committees of the Whole that an amendment proposing that there should be no charge would not be germane. That was held recently when the question came up in the consideration of a bill from this committee, and the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] rendered the decision.

Mr. CLEARY. It is to determine the tonnage and not the tolls.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; that is more correct. It is to determine the tonnage and not the tolls.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] still has the floor.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If gentlemen will pardon me just a moment, then I will yield. In the case to which I refer the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], who was in the chair, made this statement:

What is the subject of the proposed amendment?

It was an amendment proposing to give free insurance for two years—

"The term insurance in force shall be continued in force for two years without the payment of premiums." The object of this amendment, when stripped of all verbiage and reduced to its last analysis, is to give to the insured two years' free insurance.

In other words, the present law, as well as the bill under consideration, provides for insurance upon the payment of premiums, while the McCullough-Dowell amendment provides for insurance without the payment of premiums. Surely such a radical change of the policy of the Government presents a different subject within the inhibition of the rule.

In Hinds' Precedents (sec. 5877) is cited a case in point——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman give that reference again?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Hinds' Precedents, Volume V, section 5877:

"To a bill relating to the sale of the public lands an amendment proposing to give them to settlers was held not to be germane."

Clearly the two propositions are related, but "two subjects are not necessarily germane because they are related."

The following have been held not to be germane (Hinds' Precedents, sec. 5882):

"To a proposition relating to the terms of Senators, an amendment changing the manner of their election; to a general tariff bill, an amendment providing for the creation of a tariff board."

And then numerous other instances were cited by the chairman, Mr. TILSON, who held that the amendment proposing to give two years' insurance free was not germane to certain sections of the bill then under consideration, which fixed the amount of premium to be paid. Here it is the same thing, assuming, as the gentleman suggests, that this deals with the payment of tolls. It is proposed to offer an amendment which would absolutely let the ships pass through without paying any tolls, which is precisely in line with the precedents cited.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Indiana concluded his argument?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No; Mr. Chairman, there is just one thing more. A very similar question arose on June 19 of this year in the House, and the present Speaker, in discussing the same rule, said:

The rule on germaneness is very simple. No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

Later on in the discussion he said:

But the question here is broader than that. The question here is, When an amendment orders the Secretary to build a hospital, is it germane to that to repeal the whole law under which the Secretary previously had the power to build that hospital and others?

And the Chair held that it was not germane.

In other words, merely because this proposed bill in dealing with the question of the standard incidentally refers to tolls, does not permit any amendment that might be thought of relative to the question of tolls. I think it is clearly not germane.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to know if this is not all predicated upon the collection of tolls, if that is not the underlying object of this bill, if it is not meant to change the amount of tolls to be collected?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If it is not, then what is the object of this bill? What does anybody care about the measurement of any vessel passing through the Panama Canal, if it does not concern tolls?

Mr. FOCHT. Absolutely.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This bill merely establishes a uniform standard of measurement for determining tonnage.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Upon which to collect tolls, and that is the thing we are concerned with. We are not concerned with the tonnage of vessels except as it pertains to tolls; we would not be debating this bill to-day on account of the measurements if upon that was not based the collection of tolls and the amount of tolls. And so it seems to me that whether we collect high tolls or low tolls or no tolls at all, it is wholly germane.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There is nothing in this bill relative to the amount of tolls, and the only thing that the bill deals with is the single question of a standard for the measurement of tonnage.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I am very strongly in favor of free tolls for American coastwise shipping. I would gladly vote for this amendment if it were germane. But I think this case illustrates the great wisdom of the rule we have established in the House that no question that is not germane to the bill, or the item, or the paragraph under consideration, shall be considered by the House. The House has not met here to-day to discuss the question of free tolls for American shipping. Neither is the question involved in this bill.

This bill is exclusively a bill to determine the standard of tonnage for American vessels. Because it says upon that shall be based the rate of tolls has not anything to do with the fixing of tolls, because we are not establishing the tolls but the basis upon which they may be established. It is not germane to establish tolls upon a proposition to establish a basis for tolls. The two questions are entirely distinct from each other. It could not possibly be made germane to the proposition. Because upon the tonnage the tolls are fixed is no reason why we have a right to fix the rates of tolls in this bill.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. What will the gentleman say in regard to the title, which says that this is a bill to govern tolls to be paid through the Panama Canal. It does not say anything about tonnage or measurements.

Mr. TOWNER. The title is entirely misleading. It is not a correct statement of the contents of the bill, and the title ought to be amended. If the gentleman will follow the language, he will see how that is true:

That in measuring vessels and determining the tolls to be paid thereon at the Panama Canal the measurement shall be made and tonnage determined in all cases by the Panama Canal rules as they now exist or as they may be changed from time to time.

There is nothing here with regard to fixing the rate of tolls. Gentlemen should be able to make the discrimination, and I have no doubt they will make it, between the basis for tolls and the fixing of tolls, especially in a case of this kind.

I do not like to take the time to go over the matter, but we all understand there are different methods of fixing tonnage—one by the weight method and another by measurement and another by a different measurement—all these are methods of determining the tonnage of vessels and upon some of these methods of fixing tonnage tolls may be fixed. This bill says that there shall be only one standard for the measurement of the tonnage of vessels upon which rates are to be fixed. Gentlemen should distinguish between the fixing of tonnage and fixing the rate of tolls, and that is the reason that there is no germaneness in the amendment offered.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wish to ask the gentleman to consider this analogy: Suppose that this committee had brought in a bill providing that there should be no tolls at all. What relevancy would there be in an amendment on the subject of measurements?

Mr. TOWNER. That is what the amendment proposes—that on such vessels there should be no rate of tolls.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think perhaps the gentleman did not understand my suggestion. I was trying to reinforce the gentleman's argument. If the committee had dealt with the subject matter of charging tolls and a bill had been brought in to abolish tolls, then an amendment prescribing the rate by which tolls should be fixed would be totally irrelevant? The converse likewise demonstrates the gentleman's contention.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman is very well justified in making that analogy.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to a possible amendment that would not be subject to the objection that is made in this case.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not want to discuss any possible amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak against the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HULINGS. On line 5, after the word "cases," where it says "measurement shall be made of the tonnage and the tonnage determined in all cases"—suppose you amend by saying "except in the case of vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic." It seems to me that that would relieve it from the objection that is made, and it certainly would be germane.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The result would be that on all vessels except coastwise vessels the Panama Canal rules would apply, and on coastwise vessels the rules now in force would apply.

Mr. HULINGS. No; in such case there would be no measurement whatever.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; there would.

Mr. HULINGS. Not at all, by my amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. There would be measurements according to the rules now in existence.

Mr. HULINGS. In all cases except the coastwise trade.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this may be very interesting, but we are discussing a particular amendment now offered and not an amendment which might be offered.

Mr. HULINGS. The point I make is that my amendment would be germane and would have the effect of reducing the tolls on vessels in the coastwise trade, and therefore by analogy the amendment of the gentleman from Washington is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair, in deciding points of order, is called upon to express neither his opinion upon the merits of the legislation proposed nor his sympathy with or his feeling against the measure advocated.

There have been several arguments advanced in relation to the point of order under consideration, and while the Chair, after consulting precedents, feels that there are several counts on which the point of order can be sustained will consider only one, that of germaneness. The matter of germaneness, of course, is one that is filled at times with some uncertainty. There are frequently twilight zones, but in this case the matter seems clearly defined. There is one point the Chair wants to speak about, however, before considering the main question. It was advanced by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] with reference to the title to this bill. In the opinion of the Chair the title has comparatively little to do with the body of the bill in this case. In Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, page 411, that point is very thoroughly brought out. The Chair will read that part of the decision which pertains to the title of a bill. It states that the title itself does not affect the essence of the bill. Regarding the interpretation of the title, Speaker Henderson said:

> The question as to whether these sections are germane can not be determined by the title alone, as has been suggested, because an act amending an act will always describe the title amended, although it may only touch one feature or part of the law; but the whole resolution has to be considered and the amendments to the resolution. If this was not clear, possibly the title would be brought into consideration.

Now, as to germaneness: It seems to the Chair that this is a matter of whether or not this particular amendment is properly related to the bill itself. The bill provides certain rules for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, but it does not provide for the payment of tolls. It merely establishes a standard of measurement for ships going through and does not prescribe the amount of money which shall be paid by the ships themselves. From rule 16, paragraph 7, it is very clear, "That no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment." Therefore it seems to the Chair that the two subjects, the subject matter of the bill and the subject matter of the amendment, are not related and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. HADLEY: Page 1, line 13, after the word "charged," insert "Provided, That in determining the measurement of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States and the tolls to be paid by them the present United States rules of measurement shall apply and govern."

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment meets every objection which has been made, so far as the point of order is concerned, although I need not discuss that, no point having been made against it. It also meets a number of objections which have been made in argument against the prevailing system of measurement. It takes care of the contention that we are discriminating against ourselves in the case of foreign vessels, since under the operation of this amendment foreign vessels would pay in accordance with the new system provided in this bill. Under the operation of the amendment vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States would pay on the basis of the measurement in accordance with the United States rules, being the rules which now govern in the case of deck loads. It would prevent the discrimination against deck loads. It would not contravene any system of tonnage measurement now in force against those commodities or cargoes carried under deck, and it would coordinate all of the objections and remove all discriminations which have been complained of on both sides of the question here to-day. This is no time to increase the burdens now borne by American commerce and American shippers. It may be very well to speak of referring this matter to departmental sources to determine the question of an appropriate rule to govern in the case. That suggestion was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT]. But it is my view that the Congress should determine the policy which should control in a matter of this magnitude and importance, and that that should not be delegated as a departmental function to departmental sources to determine the appropriate rules to be applied to a case of this magnitude. The question which is presented by this agreement, tersely stated, is this: Whether the Congress will favor our own American shipping and our own American shippers engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States to the extent of relieving at least the deckload from an additional imposition which is not charged in the case of any other cargo. You may say that this is a matter of earning capacity, and you should charge according to the earning capacity. But in the last analysis there is no question but the fact remains that in the case of lumber the charge is an additional burden upon the commodity, and it is just as great a charge upon southern pine going westward through the Panama Canal to carry a cargo to western South America as it is upon a cargo coming from the Northwest eastward, carrying a cargo to the Atlantic coast. No vessel carrying a cargo of lumber through the canal to the South American coast can escape the imposition of a greater burden than the same vessel, both vessels loaded to capacity, returning with ore from South America. I submit to you, gentlemen, who are interested in the carrying trade, the South American trade of the western coast, that you are alike interested with those of us in the Northwest and on the Pacific coast in shipping to the eastern coast through the canal, and under the operation of this amendment, if we have any faith in our position we have always stood for in favor of American shipping engaged in the coastwise trade, this amendment ought to prevail. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, as I gather from a hasty reading of the amendment, it seeks to give to the coastwise traffic of the United States the benefit of the United States rules of measurement and eliminates the Panama Canal rules of measurement as to such coastwise traffic. To my mind that would create a discrimination in the application of tolls which would be just as violative of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as was the provision which we took out of the original Panama Canal act, allowing free tollage for our coastwise ships. It does not seem to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington will relieve the situation. It would still create a discrimination which the bill we are standing for now would obviate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in opposition to the amendment. It strikes me that the amendment certainly ought not to be adopted. The object of this bill is to create a uniform standard of measurement for all ships that come through the canal.

The fight is being made by the gentleman from Washington to secure an exemption from the operation of these standard rules in so far as they apply to the shipment of lumber, but in order to secure that discrimination in his behalf he offers an amendment applicable to all coastwise trade without regard to its character or the kind of boats that go through the canal. If his amendment is adopted, his discrimination becomes more extensive than that which we are seeking to correct by the bill under consideration now. We might take two ships of the same type and tonnage, leaving New York Harbor at a given time, both loaded with the same cargo, but one of them destined for San Francisco and the other destined for the western coast of South America, and one of them—the one going to San Francisco—would be entitled to measurements according to the United States rules of measurement, but the other cargo, going from the same port, by an American ship, would be compelled to undergo the measurements in operation under the Panama Canal rules. And there is the discrimination in behalf of one American shipment as against another, the same cargo, the same ship, and the same service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield? Is there anything wrong with that?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly there is something wrong with it. We corrected that discrimination when we, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] has suggested, repealed that part of the original act giving free tolls to the coastwise trade. The object in this amendment is not to give free tolls to coastwise trade, but to give coastwise vessels the benefit of a measurement which permits them to pay smaller tolls than other American ships destined to other ports.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is designed to prevent overcharging of tolls on deck-load business in coastwise ships.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not designed to prevent the overcharge for deck loads. It is designed to prevent the payment of tolls on deck loads, notwithstanding the hold of the ship as measured by capacity is entirely loaded and pays its own proportion of the freight. The object of the amendment is to prevent paying any tolls for shipment of lumber or other commodities out on deck and not covered by permanent shelter. It seems to me that if this amendment is adopted it not only does not remove the discrimination we are seeking to eliminate, but doubles it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, in the illustration the gentleman has just given of two ships going from New York Harbor through the Panama Canal, one destined to San Francisco or Pacific ports in the United States and the other to South America, there is no discrimination so far as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is concerned in such an arrangement, for the reason that no ship under a foreign flag can carry goods from New York to San Francisco, while all the ships in the world can engage in trade from New York to South America.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARKLEY. My illustration was based upon the assumption that both these ships were American ships flying the American flag, one of them destined for San Francisco and the other destined for South America, both of the same character and with the same kind of cargo.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is exactly what I am talking about. One is engaged in the foreign trade and the other is not.

Mr. BARKLEY. And both carry American products.

Mr. FORDNEY. The ship engaged in foreign trade does come in competition with foreign ships, but the ship engaged in domestic trade does not come in competition with foreign ships.

Mr. BARKLEY. It has a monopoly.

Mr. FORDNEY. Monopoly? What are you talking about? Does this amendment violate our treaty? Unless our ships are engaged in competition with foreign ships, there is no discrimination, is there?

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me answer that.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; answer it. I do not think you can.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will make a very desperate effort.

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, try it.

Mr. BARKLEY. The fact that one is in domestic trade and the other in foreign trade does not change the character or ownership. Both of them belong to Americans.

Mr. FORDNEY. You are talking about the treaty between this country and foreign countries and violations of the same.

Mr. BARKLEY. My opposition to this amendment is not based upon the treaty but upon the fact that the coastwise trade already has a monopoly. I never mentioned the treaty at all.

Mr. FORDNEY. It was your argument that it was a discrimination, because both are American ships, one engaged in the foreign trade and the other in domestic trade. I say, my good friend, there is no discrimination. If we do give free tolls to an American ship engaged in the coastwise trade, we are not discriminating so long as we charge the same rate of tolls in the American Panama Canal on an American ship engaged in foreign shipping that is charged to a ship under any other flag when engaged in foreign trade.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the first place, I want to say that I did not mention the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and did not base my argument upon it.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman is talking about discrimination.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the gentleman think the fact that the coastwise-trade vessel has a monopoly and can not have the competition that foreign vessels have——

Mr. FORDNEY. A monopoly? It was intended to give a monopoly to our own ships when Congress passed the law reserving coastwise trade to American ships. What other construction can you put upon that act than that it was intended for a monopoly for American ships? Foreign ships have and will again drive American ships from the seas, because they can operate their ships cheaper than we can operate ours. I want our coastwise trade reserved for American ships. You are sent here to Congress, and so am I, to legislate for our own people first of all, sir, before we legislate for foreigners. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the gentleman think——

Mr. FORDNEY. The Republican Party is not at all alarmed but that in the next general election we can elect one President of the United States, but we do doubt that we can elect two, one for the United States and the other for Europe and the rest of the world.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would the gentleman permit——

Mr. FORDNEY. That is what you are trying to follow right now, the suggestion of our President that we dictate to the whole world.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman is not alarmed at the present Republican prospects, he is hard to alarm. Does not the gentleman think that the fact that these ships do have a monopoly is a sufficient discrimination without permitting them to have their vessels measured according to a standard that gives them less tonnage?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. I am a protectionist and you are a free trader.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no. That has nothing to do with the measure, anyway.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is as much difference between your opinion and mine as between night and day.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am very proud of that difference.

Mr. FORDNEY. So am I.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] referred to that which ought to settle this matter beyond any question whatever. The provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty both cover this question, and there is no difference in the treaty provisions between giving them entire free tolls in the coastwise trade and giving any other discriminating favor, because these treaties both refer to full equality in charges and everything else. They provide that they shall be equal and alike, and just to all nations using the canal.

Now, you say that we are to have a measurement which gives in part free tolls to the American vessels in coastwise trade, a provision which would not apply to vessels of other countries, and that is, as a matter of course, a violation of the letter and spirit of the treaties.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. No; not now. I will yield in a minute. Canada and the British possessions have territory on both the Pacific and the Atlantic Oceans, and they have a coastwise trade on both coasts, provided they can pass through the canal from one of their possessions to another.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They have a coastwise trade on our coast.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, well, we do not cling to our own coast at all. If we did we could not get to the canal. We go through the waters of several foreign countries before we reach the canal.

Now, that is absolutely a discrimination against the people of Canada and the other British Provinces, because they would have to have one form of measurement on lumber, and Oregon and Washington another form, which discriminates in favor of the American shipper and is in violation of the treaty.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And the gentleman knows that the British Columbian shippers use it now for all it is worth. For example, take two ships and start them from Galveston, one going to San Francisco and the other going to New York, and then put on the new measurements, and tell where your ships get off. One is discriminated against as surely as can be.

Mr. SIMS. It is a discrimination, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] has said. If you want to beat the bill, vote against it. Do not bring in something that may seem to be popular, but which will prevent the passage of the bill. That is what this amendment is intended to do.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman has spoken of several treaties. Under the league of nations will the United States be allowed to use the Panama Canal at all? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Kansas is a very able man, and I envy him his mental powers, but his question would justify an inquiry as to his mental condition. But we fat men have an unwritten treaty between us which permits us to have all the fun with each other that we can. [Laughter.]

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that this amendment is not offered in any desire to kill the bill, but for the purpose of improving the bill in such a way that everybody can vote for it.

Mr. SIMS. Everybody can not and will not.

Mr. HADLEY. It will gain friends who will support it, who otherwise can not support it in its present condition.

Mr. SIMS. The fight over free tolls was not a party fight. Some of the ablest Republicans were in favor of the repeal, and some of the ablest Democrats were opposed to it.

Mr. HADLEY. This amendment does not raise the question of the free-tolls fight, but it does raise the question of taking care of a specific discrimination in our coastwise trade and to prevent advantage being taken by foreign shippers of the provisions of our laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I sympathize with my friend Mr. HADLEY and my friend Mr. JOHNSON from Washington in their views. But I know what their purpose is, and that of the other gentlemen who represent the lumber districts, and who are trying to prevent the enactment of this legislation in the interest of the lumber shippers. But I appeal especially to the Republican Members of the House not to allow the resurrection of this free-tolls question to becloud the issue that is presented here. Do not let that mislead you, gentlemen, to vote against this bill or to vote an amendment to it which will kill it. We are trying to enact very important legislation.

The Panama Canal is at present not paying operating expenses, and we are trying to equalize and correct the situation down there.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENISON. I am very sorry I can not. I would yield to my friend from Washington as soon as I would to any other Member of the House, but I have only five minutes.

Now, then, this discrimination in the amount of the tolls in favor of the American coastwise vessels, as proposed by the amendment, is exactly the same question in principle as that of allowing coastwise vessels to use the canal entirely free of tolls. It is the same in principle. We all know what the attitude of the President is without regard to the merits of the question or the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. We know what his attitude is; and if the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY] is adopted and this bill passes in that form, we know just what will become of it. The President will veto it, and we will get no legislation at all on this subject, which is something that we ought to have now.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I am sorry I can not.

Mr. WASON. I was going to ask the gentleman where he got his information about the President's views?

Mr. DENISON. Let us not go into that question of free tolls. Let us pass this necessary legislation now; and when the proper time comes—when we get a President who entertains the same view we do on the subject of free tolls for American coastwise vessels—we can then bring in legislation here and repeal the present law if we think it ought to be repealed. But let us not mutilate this meritorious bill here by tacking onto it an amendment which will have the effect of doing what these gentlemen from the Pacific coast want to do—defeat the bill. That is the question. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY].

The question was taken; and on a division (suggested by the Chair) there were—ayes 30, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REED of West Virginia: Page 1, lines 3 and 4, after the word "the," in line 3, strike out the words "tolls to be paid" and insert in lieu thereof the word "tonnage."

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is merely to make the language of the bill conform to the purpose of the law, as explained by members of the committee in the debate on the recent point of order. It is insisted that the purpose of the law is to set up a method to measure vessels, to determine tonnage, and not tolls. I do not contend that my amendment will in any way change the meaning of the section, but it will make plain the fact that this is a law for measuring vessels and not for fixing or assessing tolls. In line 12 a proper reference is made to tolls, and in my opinion that is the only place in the section where reference need be made to tolls.

Mr. SWEET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. If I understand the gentleman's amendment correctly, it will read "in measuring vessels to determine the tonnage to be paid." It is the tolls that are to be paid.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. No; the language as amended will be "in measuring vessels to determine the tonnage thereon at the Panama Canal." The words "to be paid" are stricken out. The first part of the bill relates to measuring of vessels and determining tonnage. Near the end of the bill the purpose of the measuring and determining of tonnage is explained to be necessary for determining the tolls.

Mr. SWEET. Yes; but in line 5 the tonnage is in there.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Yes; that is correct; and the word in line 3 should also be "tonnage" instead of "tolls." As I have already stated, the first part of the bill relates to measuring to determine tonnage, but not measuring to determine tolls.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the question is, Shall we have a rule of measurement for the computation of the tolls of the Panama Canal which fairly measures the carrying capacity of the vessel, or shall we have a rule which tempts men to build ships in such a way as to enable them to carry cargo and dodge the payment of tolls—a rule under which certain classes of cargo go through the canal without the payment of the tolls other classes of cargo pay? In other words, shall we have an honest rule based on the carrying capacity of the ship, or shall we have a dishonest rule under which certain ships and certain classes of cargo will enjoy a certain exemption from tolls, while all other ships and all other cargoes pay full tolls?

It is true that under the modification of the Panama Canal rules which we are endeavoring to remedy some of our fellow citizens on the north Pacific coast were able to get their cargoes through the canal more cheaply than they otherwise would be able to do. But the question is——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. Let me state the case. But the question is, Is it fair that they shall ask that a part, at least, of certain classes of cargo shall go through without the payment of tolls? Is it fair that we shall thus discriminate in favor of certain ships and certain classes of cargoes? If these gentlemen pass on to the American consumer on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts the benefit which they obtain by the present arrangement of tolls, then there is no advantage to them in the arrangement. On the other hand, if they do not pass on to the American consumer on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts the benefits they secure under the present arrangement, then there is no justification for the remission or lowering or the exemption from tolls on their behalf. Now I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman does not want to have the committee believe that any ship from the north Pacific coast has gone through the canal paying less than its proper toll charges on its net tonnage as indicated? In other words, any ship loaded with lumber to its base capacity is charged its full tonnage capacity if it have only half a cargo.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Washington juggles with terms. The gentleman is correct in his statement, but he is making a statement that, while it is correct, relates to a condition that ought to be remedied and which we are proposing to remedy. It is true that certain interested parties were enabled to secure a modification of the Panama rules whereby certain cargo placed on the open deck does not pay full tolls for passage through the canal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this modification was made whereby classes of cargo carried on open decks are not required to pay full toll. If they are to continue to have that exemption, there must be some good reason for it bottomed on sound public policy. We can not afford to give certain shippers in any part of the country an advantage over other shippers unless it be in the public interest to do it. As I said a moment ago, if those who buy lumber on the Gulf coast or on the Atlantic coast brought through the canal are to receive the benefit of these lower rates in the aggregate, then there is no advantage to the shipper who receives the exemption.

On the other hand, if he obtains it and keeps it, we are giving him an individual and special benefit which we are not justified in doing. I am one of those who do not believe that the good folks on the north Pacific coast want any special advantage. It is true that at one time we exempted American coastwise shippers altogether from the payment of tolls through the canal and many believed that wise. Most people did until the President changed his mind, and at least the Democratic side of Congress changed its mind with the President overnight. But that is all behind us.

We have now provided for the payment of tolls by everybody alike. That is, we assumed we had, but the fact is that regarding lumber shipped in open spaces on the deck the rule has been modified so that considerable lumber goes through without any payment whatever.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I protest that that is not correct.

Mr. MONDELL. It is true that a part of it goes through without the payment of tolls; or, to put it another way, the cargo as a whole passes through the canal at a lower rate than the average paid per ton of cargo. If that is not so, what are gentlemen protesting for?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. For this reason: It is impossible to load a bulky cargo in the hold of a ship which is charged full tonnage tolls.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, that is begging the question. If gentlemen will prove that lumber is a commodity that should be made cheaper when brought through the Panama Canal by the remission of tolls, or have a special rate of tolls, then we might consider the matter with a view of charging the loss of tolls to the Public Treasury and let the people pay it. I submit we should at least understand what the proposition is. I am of the opinion that when the matter is fully understood the good people of the Pacific Northwest will be content to pay a fair rate of tolls under the Panama rules on the basis of its net earning and carrying capacity. It is the fair, reasonable, sensible, honest rule, and it can injure no man. [Applause.] I voted against the repeal of the provision in the Panama act exempting American coastwise trade from the payment of tolls, but the repeal was accomplished. Now let us carry out the rule of measurement fairly and equitably. We would be inclined to continue the slight benefits that some north Pacific shipping receives if it were not for the fact that in doing so we confer vastly greater benefit on foreign shipping. We can not afford to lose a million dollars annually in tolls in order that a benefit amounting to a few thousands may be enjoyed by a few north Pacific shippers.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think it very important that this bill should become a law. It is important for the purpose of saving millions of dollars to the United States each year because of the action of the British maritime nation. Gov. Harding informed the committee visiting in Panama last spring—and he has repeatedly urged the same matter in his report with reference to this subject matter—that while the rule for measurement is practically the same between the United States and Great Britain, by reason of Great Britain's interpretation of the rule and their manipulation and subterfuges to which they resort, it results in a loss to the United States climbing into the millions each year. It may be possible that the law now proposed will work incidental hardship to the northwestern shippers. Whether it does or not I am not prepared to say, but this I do know that if it does work a hardship, it is so infinitesimally small compared with the great loss that the United States is sustaining constantly by the application of the law and through the manipulation and subterfuges and interpretation of Great Britain that they can well afford to suffer the same.

I wish to call attention to the fact that the example set in the interpretation of the cargo-measurement rule by Great Britain to the loss and detriment of the United States is just a sample of the interpretation that will be made in reference to the league of nations when we submit ourselves to that magnificent instrument. [Laughter and applause.]

The English language to Great Britain means one thing; it means to us quite a different thing. She has already announced what her interpretations of certain parts of this league of nations will be in the event it is put to the test, and from this announcement we know it would be inimical to the United States Government. It might be interesting to know what the people of Panama think with reference to the change concerning the passage of coastwise vessels through the Panama Canal. It has been a matter of mystery ever since the President overnight changed front with reference to the passage of American coastwise vessels toll free as to the reason that prompted that change. Various conjectures and suppositions have been made. There is a very concrete one now existing in Panama to the effect that Japan had made a little bit of demonstration against the United States at a time when the President had not assumed the martial spirit that he now professes. He was fearful that we might become embroiled with Japan. England at that time had entered into partnership with Japan. She had one of the many secret treaties that she has now in her pocket. She knew the attitude of Japan toward the United States and the feeling entertained by the President of the United States regarding Japan, and, taking advantage of that feeling, she proposed that if the United States would change her law with reference to the passage of American coastwise vessels toll free through the canal that she would keep Japan off of our backs. The President of the United States, according to this idea advanced in Panama, yielded to the siren voice of Great Britain, as he yielded upon many another occasion to that same voice. The law was changed so that an American vessel was prohibited from going through the Panama Canal without the payment of toll. In the light of recent events this explanation has many of the earmarks of plausibility. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Vote!"] The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws, rules, and regulations in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 7015, had directed him to report the same back without amendment with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment to the title of the bill at the proper time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RAKER. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 97.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and obviously there is no quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 265, nays 14, answered "present" 4, not voting 146, as follows:

INVESTIGATION OF SUGAR SUPPLY AND PRICES.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I call up House resolution 150, a resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], directing the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation as to sugar shortage. This resolution was on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and was objected to, but through some misapprehension. I think the matter can be disposed of in a very few minutes, for I do not know of any objection to the resolution. If there is no objection, I ask that the resolution be laid before the House and read for action.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 150.

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to make an immediate investigation and report to the House of Representatives its findings on the subject of sugar used for domestic and manufacturing purposes, both as to its market price, wholesale and retail, and whether these prices are reasonable; and the amount of sugar now in the United States, both raw and refined, in the possession of sugar refiners, wholesale dealers, or in storage; said investigation to involve a report of supplies in the possessions of the United States, raw and refined, and the causes of the present sugar scarcity.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw the conference report on the bill S. 641. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I would like unanimous consent, if possible, to refile it before midnight to-night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that, if possible, he may file for printing before midnight to-night the same conference report, so that it may appear in the RECORD to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, October 2, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in our great interest for the welfare of the people of this country, we are not so much disturbed by honest differences of opinion as we are anxious that every leader of men and every force that goes to make public opinion is right with Thee. For Thou art the judge of mankind. Our welfare and our destiny are in Thy hands. Keep us safely from every evil way. Guide us in the way of truth. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore (Mr. CUMMINS) took the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

LANDING OF MARINES IN DALMATIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, which will lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, October 1, 1919.

MY DEAR SIR: Responding to a resolution of the Senate, "requesting information as to whether American marines were landed from a torpedo-boat destroyer or any other naval vessel to compel Italians to evacuate Trau, Dalmatia, as reported in a dispatch by the Associated Press published in the Washington Post of September 26, 1919," I have the honor to transmit the following cable from Rear Admiral Harry S. Knapp, commanding United States naval forces operating in European waters, giving the information desired:

"LONDON, September 30.

"To the SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
"Washington, D. C.:

"The armistice line extends from Cape Planka inland, north and west of this line Italian troops in occupation, south and east of the line garrisoned by Serbian troops. This latter section Dalmatian coast headquarters American naval forces, in which by agreement after armistice American naval forces took charge of all one-time Austrian-Hungarian vessels found there, and which has since been generally called American zone. Americans have no troops on shore, but have extended a strong moral influence for the preservation of order and avoidance of clash between Italian and Jugo-Slavs. There has been considerable friction along armistice line between Serbians and Italians, but by the tactful firmness of American admiral there it has been kept from causing serious results. On September 23 three truck loads of Italian soldiers in command of an Italian Army captain crossed armistice line from Italian zone and surprised and captured the small Serbian garrison at Trau. The Italian authorities informed the senior American officer present, Capt. Boyd, that the move was unwarranted and asked that the raiders be turned back. Boyd sent a destroyer and two chasers to Trau at once, then saw the Serbian commander and got him to agree not to order an advance until he had an opportunity to get Italians to withdraw. He sent Lieut. Commander R. S. Fields and Commander Marony, of the Italian ship Puglia, by automobile to Trau, and himself went in U. S. S. Olympia to Trau. On arrival he found that Italians had been induced to return, leaving, however, Italian Army captain and three soldiers owing to breakdown of a truck. He landed a small guard from U. S. S. Cowell and U. S. S. Olympia to see no harm done Italians and preserve order pending arrival of Serbian troops. He put the Italian Army captain and three soldiers on an Italian motor boat and turned them over in charge an Italian naval officer. Upon arrival of the Serbian troops he withdrew blue jackets after first receiving assurance that no violence would be offered to civilians.

"Italian Admiral Milo in command of ships and troops in Italian zone of occupation sent senior Italian officer present at Spalato to U. S. S. Olympia with thanks for sending Trau raiders back. He has brought the officer commander of the raiding force to trial by court-martial. The whole affair was most creditably handled, and the prompt action of Capt. Boyd, in my opinion, undoubtedly prevented a very serious incident which might have resulted in open warfare between Italians and Serbians. The landing was the protection of the offending Italians left in Trau until adequate Serbian forces could arrive to preserve order.

"The fact that Italian authority requested action of Capt. Boyd and that he was thanked by Admiral Milo for his action, and that Admiral Milo has brought offending Italian officer to trial by court-martial all go to show that the raid was an isolated act of hotheads done in defiance of Italian authority, and that America acted in co-operation with Italians to restore situation. That no serious result happened is due to the prompt and efficient action of American forces. Had they not so acted there would almost inevitably have been bloodshed, which would perhaps have resulted in a state of actual war between Italy and Jugo-Slavia owing to the intensity of feeling existing over the Dalmatian question."

I have the honor to be,
Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that it is my intention to address the Senate to-morrow, Friday, on the pending peace treaty after the conclusion of the address of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT FOR TO-DAY.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I notice by the RECORD that yesterday afternoon, immediately before adjournment, a unanimous-consent agreement was entered into to vote on the Fall amendments to-day, and limiting debate after 2 o'clock to five minutes on each amendment. I merely want to say that if I had been present I would have objected to the agreement. I was in my office, within call of the Senate, and I would have responded had there been a call for a quorum, and thus been given an opportunity to make my objection.

I understand that under the rule a quorum is not required to reach an agreement except upon bills and joint resolutions; but be that as it may, Mr. President, it seems to me that if there is one reason why we can not reach a unanimous-consent agreement to build a bridge across a river or a creek without a call for a quorum, there are a thousand reasons why the consideration of this treaty, involving us as it does in all sorts of complications with the world, should be within the spirit of such a rule. I think it was a lack of consideration for Senators who were absent and who are interested in reaching a wise conclusion in respect to the treaty not to call for a quorum. It should have been called out of courtesy.

I regard these amendments as raising most important questions. I doubt whether there are many Senators who even know what the commissions are or what powers and duties are imposed upon the members of the commissions.

In my opinion, Mr. President, full discussion, a discussion which, in respect to some amendments, arguments could be advanced that have no relation to others, but a full discussion would present the best means of giving the Senate and the public full information on what we are getting into. If we get into these commissions with all their involvement, the country is pulling at the whiskers of death.

SPEECHES OF PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the speeches of the President delivered on September 15, 17, 18, and 19 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the addresses of the President were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PRESIDENT AT ARENA, SEATTLE, WASH., SEPTEMBER 13, 1919.

"Mr. Chairman, my fellow countrymen, I esteem it a privilege to have the occasion to stand before this great audience and expound some part of the great question that is now holding the attention of America and the attention of the world. I was led to an unpleasant consciousness to-day of the way in which the debate that is going on in America has attracted the attention of the world. I read in to-day's papers the comments of one of the men who were recently connected with the Imperial Government of Germany. He said that some aspects of this debate seemed to him like the red that precedes a great dawn. He saw in it the rise of a certain renewed sympathy with Germany. He saw in it an opportunity to separate America from the Governments and peoples with whom she had been associated in the war against German aggression. And all over this country, my fellow citizens, it is becoming more and more evident that those who were the partisans of Germany are the ones who are principally pleased by some of the aspects of the debate that is now going on. The world outside of America is asking itself the question, 'Is America going to stand by us now, or is it at this moment of final crisis going to draw apart and desert us?' I can answer that question here and now. It is not going to draw apart and it is not going to desert the nations of the world. America responds to nothing so quickly or unanimously as a great moral challenge. It is much more ready to carry through what now lies before it than it was even to carry through what was before it when we took up arms in behalf of the freedom of the world. America is unaccustomed to military tasks, but America is accustomed to fulfilling its pledges and following its visions. The only thing that causes me uneasiness, my fellow countrymen, is not the ultimate outcome, but the impressions that may be created in the meantime by the perplexed delay. The rest of the world believed absolutely in America and was ready to follow it anywhere, and it is now a little chilled. It now asks, 'Is America hesitating to lead? We are ready to give ourselves to her leadership. Why will she not accept the gift?'

"My fellow citizens, I think that it is my duty as I go about the country, not to make speeches in the ordinary acceptance of that word, not to appeal either to the imagination or to the emotion of my fellow citizens, but to undertake everywhere what I want to undertake to-night, and I must ask you to be patient while I undertake it. I want to analyze for you what it is that it is proposed we should do. Generalities will not penetrate to the heart of this great question. It is not enough to speak of the general purposes of the peace. I want you to realize just what the covenant of the league of nations means. I find that everywhere I go it is desirable that I should dwell upon this great theme, because in so many parts of the country men are drawing attention to little details in a way that destroys the whole perspective of the great plan in a way that concentrates attention upon certain particulars which are incidental and not central. I am going to take the liberty of reading you a list of the things which the nations adhering to the covenant of the league of nations undertake. I want to say by way of preface that it seems to me, and I am sure it will seem to you, not only an extraordinarily impressive list, but a list which was never proposed for the counsels of the world before.

"In the first place, every nation that joins the league, and that in prospect means every great fighting nation in the world, agrees to submit all controversies which are likely to lead to war either to arbitration or to thorough discussion by an authoritative body, the council of the league of nations. These great nations, all the most ambitious nations in the world except Germany, all the most powerful nations in the world, as well as the weak ones—all the nations that we have supposed had imperialistic designs—say that they will do either one or the other of two things in case a controversy arises which can not be settled by ordinary diplomatic correspondence: They will either frankly submit it to arbitration and absolutely abide by the arbitral verdict or they will submit all the facts, all the documents, to the council of the league of nations, will give the council six months in which to discuss the whole matter and leave to publish the whole matter, and at the end of the six months will still refrain for three months more from going to war, whether they like the opinion of the council or not. In other words, they agree to do a thing which would have made the recent war with Germany absolutely impossible. If there had been a league of nations in 1914, whether Germany belonged to it or not, Germany never would have dared to attempt the aggression which she did attempt, because she would have been called to the bar of the opinion of mankind and would have known that if she did not satisfy that opinion mankind would unite against her. You had only to expose the German case to public discussion and make it certain that the German case would fall. Germany would not dare attempt to act upon it. It was the universal opinion on the other side of the water when I was over there that if Germany had thought that England would be added to France and Russia she never would have gone in, and if she had dreamed that America would throw her mighty weight into the scale it would have been inconceivable. The only thing that reassured the deluded German people after we entered the war was the lying statement of her public men that we could not get our troops across the sea, because Germany knew if America got within striking distance the story was done. Here all the nations of the world, except Germany, for the time being at any rate, give notice that they will unite against any nation that has a bad case, and they agree that in their own case they will submit to prolonged discussion.

"There is nothing so chilling as discussion to a hot temper. If you are fighting mad and yet I can induce you to talk it over for half an hour, you will not be fighting mad at the end of the half hour. I knew a very wise schoolmaster in North Carolina who said that if any boy in that school fought another except according to the rules he would be expelled. There would not be any great investigation; the fact that he had fought would be enough; he would go home; but if he was so mad that he had to fight, all he had to do was to come to the head master and tell him that he wanted to fight. The head master would arrange the ring, would see that the fight was conducted according to the Marquis of Queensberry rules, that an umpire and a referee were appointed, and that the thing was fought to a finish. The consequence was that there were no fights in that school. The whole arrangement was too cold-blooded. By the time all the arrangements had been made all the fighting audacity had gone out of the contestants. That little thing illustrates a great thing. Discussion is destructive when wrong is intended; and all the nations of the world agree to put their case before the judgment of mankind. Why, my fellow citizens, that has been the dream of thoughtful reformers for generation after generation. Somebody seems to have conceived the notion that I originated the idea of a league of nations. I wish I had. I would be a very proud man if I had; but I did not. I was expressing the avowed aspirations of the American people, avowed by nobody so loudly, so intelligently, or so constantly as the greater leaders of the Republican Party. When Republicans take that road, I take off my hat and follow; I do not care whether I lead or not. I want the great result which I know is at the heart of the people that I am trying to serve.

"In the second place, all these great nations agree to boycott any nation that does not submit a perilous question either to arbitration or to discussion, and to support each other in the boycott. There is no 'if' or 'but' about that in the covenant. It is agreed that just so soon as that member State, or any outside State, for that matter, refuses to submit its case to the public opinion of the world its doors will be closed and locked; that nobody shall trade with it, no telegraphic message shall leave it or enter it, no letter shall cross its borders either way; there shall be no transactions of any kind between the citizens of the members of the league and the covenant-breaking State. That is the remedy that thoughtful men have advocated for several generations. They have thought, and thought truly, that war was barbarous and that a nation that resorted to war when its cause was unjust was unworthy of being consorted with by free people anywhere. The boycott is an infinitely more terrible instrument of war. Excepting our own singularly fortunate country, I can not think of any other country that can live upon its own resources. The minute you lock the door, then the pinch of the thing becomes intolerable; not only the physical pinch, not only the fact that you can not get raw materials and must stop your factories, not only the fact that you can not get food and your people must begin to starve, not only the fact that your credit is stopped, that your assets are useless, but the still greater pinch that comes when a nation knows that it is sent to coventry and despised. To be put in jail is not the most terrible punishment that happens to a condemned man; if he knows that he was justly condemned, what penetrates his heart is the look in other men's eyes. It is the soul that is wounded much more poignantly than the body, and one of the things that the German nation has not been able to comprehend is that it has lost for the time being the respect of mankind; and as Germans, when the doors of truth were opened to them after the war, have begun to realize that they have begun to look aghast at the probable fortunes of Germany, for if the world does not trust them, if the world does not respect them, if the world does not want Germans to come as immigrants any more, what is Germany to do? Germany's worst punishment, my fellow citizens, is not in the treaty; it is in her relations with the rest of mankind for the next generation. The boycott is what is substituted for war.

"In the third place, all the members of this great association pledge themselves to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the other member States. That is the famous article 10 that you hear so much about; and article 10, my fellow citizens, whether you want to assume the responsibility of it or not, is the heart of the pledge that we have made to the other nations of the world. Only by that article can we be said to have underwritten civilization. The wars that threaten mankind begin by that kind of aggression. For every other nation than Germany, in 1914, treaties stood as solemn and respected covenants. For Germany they were scraps of paper, and when her first soldier's foot fell upon the soil of Belgium her honor was forfeited. That act of aggression, that failure to respect the territorial integrity of a nation whose territory she was specially bound to respect, pointed the hand along that road that is strewn with graves since the beginning of history, that road made red and ugly with the strife of men, the strife behind which lies savage cupidity, the strife behind which lies a disregard for the rights of others and a thought concentrated upon what you want and mean to get. That is the heart of war, and unless you accept article 10 you do not cut the heart of war out of civilization.

"Belgium did not hesitate to underwrite civilization. Belgium could have had safety on her own terms if only she had not resisted the German arms—little Belgium, helpless Belgium, ravaged Belgium. Ah, my fellow citizens, I have seen some of the fields of Belgium. I rode with her fine, democratic King over some of those fields. He would say to me, 'This is the village of so and so,' and there was no village there, just scattered stones all over the plain, and the plain dug deep every few feet with the holes made by exploding shells. You could not tell whether it was the earth thrown up or the house thrown down that made the débris which covered the desert made by the war. Then we rode farther in, farther to the east, where there had been no fighting, no active campaigning, and there we saw beautiful green slopes and fields that had once been cultivated, and towns with their factories standing, but standing empty; not empty of workers merely, empty of machinery. Every piece of machinery in Belgium that they could put on freight cars the Germans had taken away, and what they could not carry with them they had destroyed, under the devilishly intelligent direction of experts—great bodies of heavy machinery that never could be used again, because somebody had known where the heart of the machine lay and where to put the dynamite. The Belgians are there, their buildings are there, but nothing to work with, nothing to start life with again; and in the face of all that Belgium did not flinch for a moment to underwrite the interests of mankind by saying to Germany, 'We will not be bought.'

"Italy could have had more by compounding with Austria in the later stages of the war than she is going to get out of the peace settlement now, but she would not compound. She also was a trustee for civilization, and she would not sell the birthright of mankind for any sort of material advantage. She underwrote civilization. And Serbia, the first of the helpless nations to be struck down, her armies driven from her own soil, maintained her armies on other soil, and the armies of Serbia were never dispersed. Whether they could be on their own soil or not, they were fighting for their rights and through their rights for the rights of civilized man.

"I believe that America is going to be more willing than any other nation in the world, when it gets its voice heard, to do the same thing that these little nations did. Why, my fellow citizens, we have been talking constantly about the rights of little nations. There is only one way to maintain the rights of little nations, and that is by the strength of great nations. Having begun this great task, we are no quitters; we are going to see the thing through. The red that this German counsellor of state saw upon the horizon was not the red of any dawn that will reassure the people who attempted the wrong that Germany did. It was the first red glare of the fire that is going to consume the wrong in the world. As that moral fire comes creeping on, it is going to purify every field of blood upon which free men sacrificed their lives; it is going to redeem France, redeem Belgium, redeem devastated Serbia, redeem the fair lands in the north of Italy, and set men on their feet again, to look fate in the face and have again that hope which is the only thing that leads men forward.

"In the next place, every nation agrees to join in advising what shall be done in case any one of the members fails to keep that promise. There is where you have been misled, my fellow citizens. You have been led to believe that the council of the league of nations could say to the Congress of the United States, 'Here is a war, and here is where you come in.' Nothing of the sort is true. The council of the league of nations is to advise what is to be done, and I have not been able to find in the dictionary any meaning of the word 'advise,' except 'to advise.' But let us suppose that it means something else; let us suppose that there is some legal compulsion behind the advice. The advice can not be given except by a unanimous vote of the council and an affirmative vote of the United States. We will be a permanent member of the council of the league of nations, and no such advice is ever going to be given unless the United States votes 'aye,' with one exception. If we are parties to the dispute, we can not vote; but, my fellow citizens, let me remind you that if we are parties to the dispute, we are in the war anyhow, so that we are not forced into war by the vote of the council, we are forced into war by our quarrel with the other party, as we would be in any case. There is no sacrifice in the slightest degree of the independent choice of the Congress of the United States whether it will declare war or not. There is a peculiar impression on the part of some persons in this country that the United States is more jealous of its sovereignty than other countries. That provision was not put in there because it was necessary to safeguard the sovereignty of the United States. All the other nations wanted it, and they were just as keen for their veto as we were keen for our veto. There is not the slightest danger that they will misunderstand that article of the covenant. There is only a danger that some of us who are too credulous will be led to misunderstand it.

"All the nations agree to join in devising a plan for general disarmament. You have heard that this covenant was a plan for bringing on war. Well, it is going to bring on war by means of disarmament and also by establishing a permanent court of international justice. When I voted for that, I was obeying the mandate of the Congress of the United States. In a very unexpected place, namely, in a naval appropriation bill passed in 1915, it was declared to be the policy of the United States to bring about a general disarmament by common agreement, and the President of the United States was requested to call a conference not later than the close of the then present war for the purpose of consulting and agreeing upon a plan for a permanent court of international justice; and he was authorized, in case such an agreement could be reached, to stop the building program provided for by that naval appropriation bill. The Congress of the United States deliberately not only accepted but directed the President to promote an agreement of this sort for disarmament and a permanent court of international justice. You know what a permanent court of international justice implies. You can not set up a court without respecting its decrees. You can not make a toy of it. You can not make a mockery of it. If you, indeed, want a court, then you must abide by the judgments of the court. And we have declared already that we are willing to abide by the judgments of a court of international justice.

"All the nations agree to register every treaty, and they agree that no treaty that is not registered and published shall be valid. All private agreements and secret treaties are swept from the table, and thereby one of the most dangerous instruments of international intrigue and disturbance is abolished.

"They agree to join in the supervision of the government of helpless and dependent people. They agree that no nation shall hereafter have the right to annex any territory merely because the people that live on it can not prevent it, and that instead of annexation there shall be trusteeship, under which these territories shall be administered under the supervision of the associated nations of the world. They lay down rules for the protection of dependent peoples of that sort, so that they shall not have enforced labor put upon them, so that their women and children shall be protected from unwholesome and destructive forms of labor, so that they will be kept away from the opium traffic and the traffic in arms. They agree that they will never levy armies there. They agree, in other words, to do what no nation ever agreed to do before—to treat subject nations like human beings.

"They agree also to accord and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women, and children born in their own countries and in all other countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose they agree to join in establishing and maintaining the necessary international organization. This great treaty, which we are hesitating to ratify, contains the organization by which the united counsels of mankind shall attempt to lift the levels of labor and see that men who are working with their hands are everywhere treated as they ought to be treated, upon principles of justice and equality. How many laboring men dreamed, when this war began, that four years later it would be possible for all the great nations of the world to enter into a covenant like that? They agree to intrust the league with the general supervision of all international agreements with regard to traffic in women and children and traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs. They agree to intrust the league with the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunition with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest. They agree to join in making provision to secure and maintain freedom of communication and of transit and equitable treatment for commerce in respect of all the members of the league. They agree to cooperate in the endeavor to take steps for the prevention and control of disease. They agree to encourage and promote the establishment and cooperation of duly authorized voluntary national Red Cross organizations for the improvement of health, the prevention of disease, and the mitigation of suffering throughout the world.

"I ask you, my fellow citizens, is that not a great peace document and a great human document? And is it conceivable that America, the most progressive and humane nation in the world, should refuse to take the same responsibility upon herself that all the other great nations take in supporting this great covenant? You say, 'It is not likely that the treaty will be rejected. It is only likely that there will be certain reservations.' Very well, I want very frankly to tell you what I think about that. If the reservations do not change the treaty, then it is not necessary to make them part of the resolution of ratification. If all that you desire is to say what you understand the treaty to mean, no harm can be done by saying it; but if you want to change the treaty, if you want to alter the phraseology so that the meaning is altered, if you want to put in reservations which give the United States a position of special privilege or a special exemption from responsibility among the members of the league, then it will be necessary to take the treaty back to the conference table, and, my fellow citizens, the world is not in a temper to discuss this treaty over again. The world is just now more profoundly disturbed about social and economic conditions than it ever was before, and the world demands that we shall come to some sort of settlement which will let us get down to business and purify and rectify our own affairs. This is not only the best treaty that can be obtained, but I want to say, because I played only a small part in framing it, that it is a sound and good treaty, and America, above all nations, should not be the nation that puts obstacles in the way of the peace of nations and the peace of mind of the world.

"The world has not anywhere at this moment, my fellow citizens, peace of mind. Nothing has struck me so much in recent months as the unaccustomed anxiety on the face of people. I am aware that men do not know what is going to happen, and that they know that it is just as important to them what happens in the rest of the world, almost, as what happens in America. America has connections with all the rest of the world not only, but she has necessary dealings with all the rest of the world, and no man is fatuous enough to suppose that if the rest of the world is disturbed and disordered, the disturbance and disorder are not going to extend to the United States. The center of our anxiety, my fellow citizens, is in that pitiful country to which our hearts go out, that great mass of mankind whom we call the Russians. I have never had the good fortune to be in Russia, but I know many persons who know that lovable people intimately, and they all tell me that there is not a people in the world more generous, more simple, more kindly, more naturally addicted to friendship, more patiently attached to peace than the Russian people. Yet, after throwing off the grip of terror that an autocratic power of the Czar had upon them, they have come under a terror even greater than that; they have come under the terror of the power of men whom nobody knows how to find. One or two names everybody knows, but the rest is intrigue, terror, informing, spying, and military power, the seizure of all the food obtainable in order that the fighting men may be fed and the rest go starved. These men have been appealed to again and again by the civilized Governments of the world to call a constituent assembly, let the Russian people say what sort of government they want to have; and they will not, they dare not, do it. That picture is before the eyes of every nation. Shall we get into the clutch of another sort of minority? My fellow citizens, I am going to devote every influence I have and all the authority I have from this time on to see to it that no minority commands the United States. [Great and continued applause.] It heartens me, but it does not surprise me, to know that that is the verdict of every man and woman here; but, my fellow citizens, there is no use passing that verdict unless we are going to take part, and a great part, a leading part, in steadying the counsels of the world. Not that we are afraid of anything except the spread of moral defection, and moral defection can not come except where men have lost faith, lost hope, have lost confidence; and, having seen the attitude of the other peoples of the world toward America, I know that the whole world will lose heart unless America consents to show the way.

"It was pitiful, on the other side of the sea, to have delegation after delegation from peoples all over the world come to the house I was living in in Paris and seek conference with me to beg that America would show the way. It was touching. It made me very proud, but it made me very sad; proud that I was the representative of a nation so regarded, but very sad to feel how little of all the things that they had dreamed we could accomplish for them. But we can accomplish this, my fellow citizens: We can, having taken a pledge to be faithful to them, redeem the pledge. We shall redeem the pledge. I look forward to the day when all this debate will seem in our recollection like a strange mist that came over the minds of men here and there in the Nation, like a groping in the fog, having lost the way, the plain way, the beaten way, that America had made for itself for generations together; and we shall then know that of a sudden, upon the assertion of the real spirit of the American people, they came to the edge of the mist, and outside lay the sunny country where every question of duty lay plain and clear and where the great tramp, tramp of the American people sounded in the ears of the whole world, which knew that the armies of God were on their way."

THE PRESIDENT, AT LUNCHEON, HOTEL PORTLAND, PORTLAND, OREG., SEPTEMBER 15, 1919.

"Mr. Jackson, ladies, and gentlemen, as I return to Portland I can not help remembering that I learned a great deal in Oregon. When I was a teacher I used to prove to my own satisfaction—I do not know whether it was to the satisfaction of my classes or not—that the initiative and referendum would not work. I came to Oregon to find that they did work, and have since been apologizing for my earlier opinion. Because I have always taken this attitude toward facts, that I never let them get me if I see them coming first. There is nothing I respect so much as a fact. There is nothing that is so formidable as a fact, and the real difficulty in all political reform is to know whether you can translate your theories into facts or not, whether you can safely pick out the operative ideas and leave aside the inoperative ideas. For I think you will all agree with me that the whole progress of human affairs is the progress of ideas; not of ideas in the abstract form, but of ideas in the operative form, certain conceptions of justice and of freedom and of right that have got into men's natures and led those natures to insist upon the realization of those ideas in experience and in action.

"The whole trouble about our civilization, as it looks to me, is that it has grown complex faster than we have adjusted the simpler ideas to the existing conditions. There was a time when men would do in their business what they would not do as individuals. There was a time when they submerged their individual consciences in a corporation and persuaded themselves that it was legitimate for a corporation to do what they individually never would have dreamed of doing. That is what I mean by saying that the organization becomes complex faster than our adjustment of the simpler ideas of justice and right to the developing circumstances of our civilization. I say that because the errand that I am on concerns something that lies at the heart of all progress. I think we are all now convinced that we have not reached the right and final organization of our industrial society; that there are many features of our social life that ought to undergo correction; that while we call ourselves democrats—with a little 'd'—while we believe in democratic government, we have not seen yet the successful way of making our life in fact democratic; that we have allowed classes to disclose themselves; that we have allowed lines of cleavage to be run through our community, so that there are antagonisms set up that breed heat, because they breed friction. The world must have leisure and order in which to see that these things are set right, and the world can not have leisure and order unless it has a guaranteed peace.

"For example, if the United States should conceivably—I think it inconceivable—stay out of the league of nations, it would stay out at this cost: We would have to see, since we were not going to join our force with other nations, that our force was formidable enough to be respected by other nations. We would have to maintain a great army and a great navy. We would have to do something more than that: We would have to concentrate authority sufficiently to be able to use the physical force of the Nation quickly upon occasion. All of that is absolutely antidemocratic in its influence. All of that means that we should not be giving ourselves the leisure of thought or the release of material resources necessary to work out our own methods of civilization, our own methods of industrial organization and production and distribution; and our problems are exactly the problems of the rest of the world. I am more and more convinced, as I come in contact with the men who are trying to think for other countries as we are trying to think for this one, that our problems are identical, only there is this difference: Peoples of other countries have lost confidence in their Governments. Some of them have lost confidence in their form of government. That point, I hope and believe, has not been reached in the United States. We have not lost confidence in our Government. I am not now speaking of our administration; I am now thinking of our method of government. We believe that we can manage our own affairs and that we have the machinery through which we can manage our own affairs, and that no clique or special interest is powerful enough to run away with it. The other countries of the world also believe that about us. They believe that we are successfully organized for justice, and they therefore want us to take the lead and they want to follow the lead. If we do not take the lead, then we throw them back upon things in which they have no confidence and endanger a universal disorder and discontent in the midst of which it will be impossible to govern our own affairs with success and with constant achievement. Whether you will or not, our fortunes are tied in with the rest of the world, and the choice that we have to make now is whether we will receive the influences of the rest of the world and be affected by them or dominate the influences of the world and lead them. That is a tremendous choice to make, but it is exactly that tremendous choice that we have to make, and I deeply regret the suggestions which are made on some sides that we should take advantage of the present situation in the world but should not shoulder any of the responsibility. Do you know of any business or undertaking in which you can get the advantage without assuming the responsibility? What are you going to be? Boys running around the circus tent and peeping under the canvas? Men declining to pay the admission and sitting on the roof and looking on the game? Or are you going to play your responsible part in the game, knowing that you are trusted as leader and umpire both?

"Nothing has impressed me more, or impressed me more painfully, if I may say so, than the degree in which the rest of the world trusts us and looks to us. I say 'painfully' because I am conscious that they are expecting more than we can perform. They are expecting miracles to be wrought by the influence of the American spirit on the affairs of the world, and miracles can not be wrought. I have again and again recited to my fellow citizens on this journey how deputations from peoples of every kind and every color and every fortune, from all over the world, thronged to the house in which I was living in Paris to ask the guidance and assistance of the United States. They did not send similar delegations to anybody else, and they did not send them to me except because they thought they had heard in what I had been saying the spirit of the American people uttered. Moreover, you must not forget this, that almost all of them had kinsmen in America. You must not forget that America is made up out of all the world and that there is hardly a race of any influence in the world, at any rate hardly a Caucasian race, that has not scores and hundreds, and sometimes millions, of people living in America with whom they are in correspondence, from whom they receive the subtle suggestions of what is going on in American life, and of the ideals of American life. Therefore they feel that they know America from this contact they have had with us, and they want America to be the leading force in the world. Why, I received delegations there speaking tongues that I did not know anything about. I did not know what family of languages they belonged to, but fortunately for me they always brought an interpreter along who could speak English, and one of the significant facts was that the interpreter was almost always some young man who had lived in America. He did not talk English to me; he talked American to me. So there always seemed to be a little link of some sort tying them up with us, tying them up with us in fact, in relationship, in blood, as well as in life, and the world will be turned back to cynicism if America goes back on it.

"We dare not go back on it. I ask you even as a business proposition whether it is more useful to trade with a cynic or with an optimist. I do not like to trade with a man with a grouch. I do not like to trade with a man who begins by not believing anything I am telling him. I like to trade with a man who is more or less susceptible to the eloquence which I address to him. A salesman has a much longer job if he approaches a grouch than if he approaches a friend. This trivial illustration illustrates, my fellow citizens, our relation to the rest of the world. If we do not do what the rest of the world expects of us, all the rest of the world will have a grouch toward America, and you will find it a hard job to reestablish your credit in the world. And back of financial credit lies mental credit. There is not a bit of credit that has not got an element of assessment of character. You do not limit your credit to men who can put up the collateral, who have the assets; you extend it also to the men in whose characters and abilities you believe; you think they are going to make good. Your credit is a sort of bet on their capacity, and that is the largest element in the kind of credit that expands enterprise. The credit that merely continues enterprise is based upon asset and past accomplishment, but the credit that expands enterprise is based upon your assessment of character. If you are going to put into the world this germ, I shall call it, of American enterprise and American faith and American vision, then you must be the principal partners in the new partnership which the world is forming.

"I take leave to say, without intending the least disrespect to anybody, that, consciously or unconsciously, a man who opposes that proposition either has no imagination or no knowledge, or is a quitter. America has put her hand to this great enterprise already, in the men she sent overseas, and their part was the negative part merely. They were sent over there to see that a malign influence did not interfere with the just fortunes of the world. They stopped that influence, but they did not accomplish anything constructive, and what is the use clearing the table if you are going to put nothing on it? What is the use clearing the ground if you are not going to erect any building? What is the use of going to the pains that we went to, to draw up the specifications of the new building and then saying, 'We will have nothing to do with its erection'? For the specifications of this treaty were American specifications, and we have got not only to be the architects, drawing up the specifications, but we have got to be the contractors, too. Isn't it a job worth while? Isn't it worth while, now that the chance has at last come, in the providence of God, that we should demonstrate to the world that America is what she claimed that she was? Every drop of blood that I have in me gets up and shouts when I think of the opportunity that America has.

"I come of a race that, being bred on barren hills and unfertile plains in Scotland, being obliged to work where work was hard, somehow has the best zest in what it does when the job is hard, and I was repeating to my friend Mr. Jackson what I said the other day about my ancestry and about the implications of it. I come of a certain stock that raised Cain in the northern part of the larger of the British Isles, under the name of the Covenanters. They met in a churchyard—they were church people and they had a convention out of doors—and on the top of a flat tombstone they signed an immortal document called the "solemn league and covenant," which meant that they were going to stand by their religious principles in spite of the Crown of England and the force of England and every other influence, whether of man or the Devil, so long as any of them lived. Now, I have seen men of all nations sit around a table in Paris and sign a solemn league and covenant. They have become Covenanters, and I remain a Covenanter, and I am going to see this job through no matter what influences of evil withstand. [Loud applause.] Nothing has heartened me more on this journey than to feel that that really is the judgment of our fellow citizens. America is made up, as I have just said, out of all sorts of elements, but it is a singularly homogeneous people after all; homogeneous in its ideals, not in its blood; homogeneous in the infection which it has caught from a common light; homogeneous in its purpose. Every man has a sort of consciousness that America is put into the world for a purpose that is different in some respects from the purpose conceived by any other national organization.

"Throughout America you have got a conducting medium. You do not put forth an American idea and find it halted by this man or that or the other, except he be particularly asleep or cantankerous, but it spreads, it spreads by the natural contact of similar ideas and similar ambitions and similar hopes. For, my fellow citizens, the only thing that lifts the world is hope. The only thing that can save the world is such arrangements as will convince the world that hope is not altogether without foundation. It is the spirit that is in it that is unconquerable. You can kill the bodies of insurgent men who are fighting for liberty, but the more of them you kill the more you seem to strengthen the spirit that springs up out of the bloody ground where they fell. The only thing in the world that is unconquerable is the thought of men. One looks back to that legendary story of the Middle Ages, in which certain men who were fighting under one of the semisavage chiefs of that obscure time refused to obey the order of their chief because they considered it inconsistent with the traditions of their tribe, and he said, 'Don't you know that I have the power to kill you?' They said, 'Yes; and don't you know that we have the power to die cursing you?' You can not cut our spirits out. You can not do anything but lay our bodies low and helpless. If you do, there will spring up, like dragon's teeth out of the earth, armed forces which will overcome you.

"This is the field of the spirit here in America. This is the field of the single unconquerable force that there is in the world, and when the world learns, as it will learn, that America has put her whole force into the common harness of civilization, then it will know that the wheels are going to turn, the loads are going to be drawn, and men are going to begin to ascend those difficult heights of hope which have sometimes seemed so inaccessible. I am glad for one to have lived to see this day. I have lived to see a day in which, after saturating myself most of my life in the history and traditions of America, I seem suddenly to see the culmination of American hope and history—all the orators seeing their dreams realized, if their spirits are looking on; all the men who spoke the noblest sentiments of America heartened with the sight of a great Nation responding to and acting upon those dreams, and saying, 'At last, the world knows America as the savior of the world!'"

THE PRESIDENT AT AUDITORIUM, PORTLAND, OREG., SEPTEMBER 25, 1919.

"Mr. Chairman, Mr. Irvine, my fellow countrymen, Mr. Irvine has very eloquently stated exactly the errand upon which I have come. I have come to confer, face to face, with you on one of the most solemn occasions that have ever confronted this Nation. As I have come along through the country and stopped at station after station, the first to crowd around the train have almost always been little children, bright-eyed little boys, excited little girls, children all seeming sometimes of the same generation, and I have thought as I looked upon them from the car platform that, after all, it was they to whom I had come to report; that I had come to report with regard to the safety and honor of subsequent generations of America, and I felt that if I could not fulfill the task to which I had set my hand, I would have to say to mothers with boy babies at their breast, 'You have occasion to weep; you have occasion to fear. The past is only a prediction of the future, and all this terrible thing that your brothers and husbands and sweethearts have been through may have to be gone through with again.' Because, as I was saying to some of your fellow citizens to-day, the task, that great and gallant task, which our soldiers performed is only half finished. They prevented a great wrong. They prevented it with a spirit and a courage and with an ability that will always be written on the brightest pages of our record of gallantry and of force. I do not know when I have been as proud, as an American, as when I have seen our boys deploy on the other side of the sea. On Christmas Day last, on an open stretch of country, I saw a great division march past me, with all the arms of the service, walking with that swing which is so familiar to our eyes, with that sense of power and confidence and audacity which is so characteristic of America, and I seemed to see the force that had saved the world. But they merely prevented something. They merely prevented a particular nation from doing a particular, unspeakable wrong to civilization, and their task is not complete unless we see to it that it has not to be done over again, unless we fulfill the promise which we made to them and to ourselves that this was not only a war to defeat Germany, but a war to prevent the recurrence of any such wrong as Germany had attempted; that it was a war to put an end to the wars of aggression forever.

"There is only one means of doing that, my fellow citizens. I found quoted in one of your papers the other day a passage so apposite that I do not know that I can do better than read it as the particular thing that it is now necessary to do:

"'Nations must unite as men unite in order to preserve peace and order. The great nations must be so united as to be able to say to any single country, 'You must not go to war,' and they can say that effectively when the country desiring war knows that the force which the united nations place behind peace is irresistible. In differences between individuals the decision of a court is final, because in the last resort the entire force of the community is behind the court decision. In differences between nations which go beyond the limited range of arbitral questions, peace can only be maintained by putting behind it the force of united nations determined to uphold it and prevent war.'

"That is a quotation from an address said to have been delivered at Union College in June, 1915, a year after the war began, by Mr. HENRY CABOT LODGE, of Massachusetts. I entirely concur in Senator LODGE's conclusion, and I hope I shall have his cooperation in bringing about the desired result. In other words, the only way we can prevent the unspeakable thing from happening again is that the nations of the world should unite and put an irresistible force behind peace and order. There is only one conceivable way to do that, and that is by means of a league of nations. The very description is a definition of a league of nations, and the only thing that we can debate now is whether the nations of the world, having met in a universal congress and formulated a covenant as the basis for a league of nations, we are going to accept that or insist upon another. I do not find any man anywhere rash or bold enough to say that he does not desire a league of nations. I only find men here and there saying that they do not desire this league of nations, and I want to ask you to reflect upon what that means. And in order to do that I want to draw a picture for you, if you will be patient with me, of what occurred in Paris.

"In Paris were gathered the representatives of nearly 30 nations from all over the civilized globe, and even from some parts of the globe which in our ignorance of them we have not been in the habit of regarding as civilized, and out of that great body were chosen the representatives of 14 nations, representing all parts of the great stretches of the peoples of the world which the conference as a whole represented. The representatives of those 14 nations were constituted a commission on the league of nations. The first resolution passed by the conference of peace in Paris was a resolution in favor of a league of nations, setting up a commission to formulate a league of nations. It was the thought foremost in the mind of every statesman there. He knew that his errand was in vain in Paris if he went away without achieving the formation of a league of nations, and that he dared not go back and face his people unless he could report that the efforts in that direction had been successful. That commission sat day after day, evening after evening. I had the good fortune to be a member of the commission, and I want to testify to the extraordinary good temper in which the discussions were conducted. I want to testify that there was a universal endeavor to subordinate as much as possible international rivalries and conflicting international interests and come out upon a common ground of agreement in the interest of the world. I want to testify that there were many compromises, but no compromises that sacrificed the principle, and that although the instrument as a whole represented certain mutual concessions, it is a constructive instrument and not a negative instrument. I shall never lose so long as I live the impression of generous, high-minded, statesmanlike cooperation which was manifested in that interesting body. It included representatives of all the most powerful nations, as well as representatives of some of those that were less powerful.

"I could not help thinking as I sat there that the representatives of Italy spoke as it were in the tones of the long tradition of Rome; that we heard the great Latin people who had fought, fought, fought through generation after generation of strife down to this critical moment, speaking now in the counsels of peace. And there sat the prime minister of Greece—the ancient Greek people—lending his singular intelligence, his singularly high-minded and comprehensive counsel, to the general result. There were the representatives also of France, our ancient comrade in the strife for liberty. And there were the representatives of Great Britain, supposed to be the most ambitious, the most desirous of ruling the world of any of the nations of the world, cooperating with a peculiar interest in the result, with a constant and manifestly sincere profession that they wanted to subordinate the interests of the British Empire, which extended all over the world, to the common interests of mankind and of peace. The representatives of Great Britain I may stop to speak of for a moment. There were two of them. One of them was Lord Robert Cecil, who belongs to an ancient family in Great Britain, some of the members of which—particularly Lord Salisbury of a past generation—had always been reputed as most particularly keen to seek and maintain the advantage of the British Empire; and yet I never heard a man speak whose heart was evidently more in the task of the humane redemption of the world than Lord Robert Cecil. And alongside of him sat Gen. Smuts, the South African Boer, the man who had fought Great Britain so successfully that, after the war was over and the Boers nominally defeated, Great Britain saw that the wisest thing she could do was to hand the government of the country over to the Boers themselves. Gen. Botha and Gen. Smuts were both members of the peace conference; both had been successful generals in fighting the British arms. Nobody in the conference was more outspoken in criticizing some aspects of British policy than Gen. Botha and Gen. Smuts, and Gen. Smuts was of the same mind with Sir Robert Cecil. They were both serving the common interests of free people everywhere. You seem to see a sort of epitome of the history of the world in that conference. There were nations that had long been subordinated and suffering. There were nations that had been indomitably free but, nevertheless, not so free that they could really accomplish the objects that they had always held dear. I want you to realize that this conference was made up of many minds and of many nations and of many traditions, keen to the same conclusion, with a unanimity, an enthusiasm, a spirit which speaks volumes for the future hopes of mankind.

"When this covenant was drawn up in its first form I had the occasion—for me the very happy occasion—to return for a week or so to this country in March last. I brought the covenant in its first draft. I submitted it to the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate and the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House. We discussed all parts of the document. Many suggestions were made. I took all of those suggestions with me back to Paris, and the conference on the league of nations adopted every one of the suggestions made. No counsels were listened to more carefully or yielded to more willingly in that conference than the counsels of the United States. Some things were put into the covenant which, personally, I did not think necessary, which seemed to me to go without saying, but which they had no objection to putting in there explicitly.

"For example, take the Monroe doctrine. As a matter of fact the covenant sets up for the world a Monroe doctrine. What is the Monroe doctrine? The Monroe doctrine is that no nation shall come to the Western Hemisphere and try to establish its power or interfere with the self-government of the peoples in this hemisphere; that no power shall extend its governing and controlling influence in any form to either of the Americas. Very well; that is the doctrine of the covenant. No nation shall anywhere extend its power or seek to interfere with the political independence of the peoples of the world; and inasmuch as the Monroe doctrine had been made the universal doctrine, I did not think that it was necessary to mention it particularly, but when I suggested that it was the desire of the United States that it should be explicitly recognized, it was explicitly recognized, for it is written in there that nothing in the covenant shall be interpreted as affecting the validity of the Monroe doctrine. The Monroe doctrine is left intact, and the United States is left free to enforce it.

"That is only a sample. The members of the Foreign Relations Committee and of the Committee on Foreign Affairs did not see it anywhere explicitly stated in the covenant that a member of the league could withdraw. I told them that the matter had been discussed in the commission on the league and that it had been the universal opinion that, since it was a combination of sovereigns, any sovereign had the right to withdraw from it; but when I suggested that that should be explicitly put in, no objection was made whatever, and at the suggestion of the United States it was explicitly provided that any member of the league could withdraw. Provision was made that two years' notice should be given, which I think everybody will recognize as perfectly fair, so that no nation is at liberty suddenly to break down this thing upon which the hope of mankind rests; but with that limitation and with the provision that when they withdraw they shall have fulfilled all their international obligations they are perfectly free to withdraw. When gentlemen dwell upon that provision, that we must have fulfilled all our international obligations, I answer all their anxieties by asking them another question, 'When did America ever fail to fulfill her international obligations?' There is no judge in the matter set up in the covenant, except the conscience of the withdrawing nation and the opinion of mankind, and I for one am proud enough American to dismiss from my mind all fear of at any time going before the judgment of mankind on the conduct of the United States, knowing that we will go with clean hands and righteous purpose.

"I am merely illustrating now the provisions that were put in at the suggestion of the United States. Without exception, the suggestions of the United States were adopted, and I want to say, because it may interest you, that most of these suggestions came from Republican sources. I say that, my fellow citizens, not because it seems to me to make the least difference among Americans in a great matter like this which party such things came from, but because I want to emphasize in every discussion of this matter the absolutely nonpartisan character of the covenant and of the treaty. I am not in favor of the ratification of this treaty, including the covenant of the league of nations, because I am a Democrat. I am in favor of it because I am an American and a lover of humanity. If it will relieve anybody's mind, let me add that it is not my work, that practically every portion of the covenant of the league of nations emanates from counsels running back 10, 20, 30 years, among the most thoughtful men in America, and that it is the fulfillment of a dream which five years ago, when the war began, would have been deemed unattainable. What we are discussing ought not to be disfigured, ought not to be tainted, with the least thought of domestic politics. If anybody in this audience allows himself when thinking of this matter to think of the elections of 1920 I want to declare that I separate myself from him.

"I draw all this picture of the care with which the covenant was drawn up, every phrase scrutinized, every interest considered, the other nations at the board just as jealous of their sovereignty as we could possibly be of ours, and yet willing to harness all these sovereignties in a single great enterprise of peace, and how the whole thing was not the original idea of any man in the conference, but had grown out of the counsels of hopeful and thoughtful and righteous men all over the world; because just as there was in America a league to enforce peace, which even formulated a constitution for the league of peace before the conference met, before the conference was thought of, before the war began, so there were in Great Britain and in France and in Italy and, I believe, even in Germany similar associations of equally influential men, whose ideal was that some time there might come an occasion when men would be sane enough and right enough to get together to do a thing of this great sort. I draw that picture in order to show you the other side of what is going on, and I want to preface this part by saying that I hope you will not construe anything that I say as indicating the least lack of respect for the men who are criticizing any portion of this treaty. For most of them, I have reason to have respect, for I have come into close contact and consultation with them. They are just as good Americans as I claim to be; they are just as thoughtful of the interests of America as I try to be; they are just as intelligent as anybody who could address his mind to this thing; and my contest with them is a contest of interpretation, not a contest of intention. All I have to urge with those men is that they are looking at this thing with too critical an eye as to the mere phraseology, without remembering the purpose that everybody knows to have been in the minds of those who framed it, and that if they go very far in attempting to interpret it by resolutions of the Senate they may, in appearance at any rate, sufficiently alter the meaning of the document to make it necessary to take it back to the council board. Taking it back to the council board means, among other things, taking it back to Germany; and I frankly tell you, my fellow citizens, it would sit very ill upon my stomach to take it back to Germany. Germany, at our request—I may say almost at our dictation—signed the treaty and has ratified it. It is a contract, so far as her part in it is concerned. I can testify that we tried to be just to Germany, and that when we had heard her arguments and examined every portion of the counterproposals that she made, we wrote the treaty in its final form and then said, 'Sign here.' What else did our boys die for? Did they die in order that we might ask Germany's leave to complete our victory? They died in order that we might say to Germany what the terms of victory were in the interest of justice and of peace, and we were entitled to take the course that we did take. I can only beg these gentlemen in their criticism of the treaty and in their action in the Senate not to go so far as to make it necessary to ask the consent of the other nations to the interpretations which they are putting upon the treaty. I have said in all frankness that I do not see a single phrase in the covenant of the league of nations which is of doubtful meaning, but if they want to say what that undoubted meaning is, in other words that do not change the undoubted meaning, I have no objection. If they change the meaning of it, then all the other signatories have to consent; and what has been evident in the last week or two is that on the part of some men, I believe a very few, the desire is to change the treaty, and particularly the covenant, in a way to give America an exceptional footing.

"My fellow citizens, the principle that America went into this war for was the principle of the equality of sovereign nations. I am just as much opposed to class legislation in international matters as in domestic matters. I do not, I tell you plainly, believe that any one nation should be allowed to dominate, even this beloved Nation of our own, and it does not desire to dominate. I said in a speech the other night in another connection that, so far as my influence and power as President of the United States went, I was going to fight every attempt to set up a minority government. I was asked afterwards whom I was hitting at, what minority I was thinking of. I said, 'Never mind what minority I may have been thinking of at the moment; it does not make any difference with me which minority it is; whether it is capital or labor. No sort of privilege will ever be permitted in this country.' It is a partnership or it is a mockery.

It is a democracy, where the majority are the masters, or all the hopes and purposes of the men who founded this Government have been defeated and forgotten. And I am of the same principle in international affairs. One of the things that gave the world a new and a bounding hope was that the great United States had said that it was fighting for the little nation as well as the great nation; that it regarded the rights of the little nation as equal to its own rights; that it would make no distinction between free men anywhere; that it was not fighting for a special advantage for the United States but for an equal advantage for all free men everywhere. Let gentlemen beware, therefore, how they disappoint the world. Let gentlemen beware how they betray the immemorial principles of the United States. Let men not make the mistake of claiming a position of privilege for the United States which gives it all the advantages of the league of nations and none of the risks and responsibilities. The principle of equity everywhere is that along with a right goes a duty; that if you claim a right for yourself you must be ready to support that right for somebody else; that if you claim to be a member in a society of any sort you must not claim the right to dodge the responsibilities and avoid the burden, but you must carry the weight of the enterprise along with the hope of the enterprise. That is the spirit of free men everywhere, and that I know to be the spirit of the United States.

"Our decision, therefore, my fellow citizens, rests upon this: If we want a league of nations, we must take this league of nations, because there is no conceivable way in which any other league of nations is obtainable. We must leave it or take it. I should be very sorry to have the United States indirectly defeat this great enterprise by asking for something, some position of privilege, which other nations in their pride can not grant. I would a great deal rather say flatly, 'She will not go into the enterprise at all.' And that, my fellow citizens, is exactly what Germany is hoping and beginning to dare to expect. I am not uttering a conjecture; I am speaking of knowledge, knowledge of the things that are said in the German newspapers and by German public men. They are taking heart because the United States, they hope, is not going to stand with the other free nations of the world to guarantee the peace that has been forced upon them. They see the hope that there will be two nations standing outside the league—Germany and the United States. Germany because she must; the United States because she will. She knows that that will turn the hostility and enmity of all the other nations of the world against the United States, as their hostility is already directed against her. They do not expect that now the United States will in any way align themselves with Germany. They do not expect the sympathy of the United States to go out to them now, but they do expect the isolation of the United States to bring about an alienation between the United States and the other free nations of the world, which will make it impossible for the world ever to combine again against such enterprises as she was defeated in attempting. All over this country pro-German propaganda is beginning to be active again, beginning to try to add to the force of the arguments against the league in particular and against the treaty and the several items of the treaty. And the poison of failure is being injected into the whole fine body politic of the united world, a sort of paralysis, a sort of fear. Germany desires that we should say, 'What have we created? A great power which will bring peace, but will that power be amiable to us? Can we control that power?' We can not control it for any but its proper purpose—the purpose of righteousness and peace—but for that purpose we are invited to control it by the opinion of mankind, for all over the world peoples are looking to us with confidence, our rivals along with the weaker nations. They believe in the honesty of purpose and the indomitable rectitude of purpose of the United States, and they are willing to have us lead.

"I pray God that the gentlemen who are delaying this thing may presently see it in a different light. I fain would appeal to their hearts. I wonder if they have forgotten what this war meant. I wonder if they have had mothers who lost their sons take them by the hand, as they have taken my own, and looked things that their hearts were too full to speak, praying me to do all in my power to save the sons of other mothers from this terrible thing again. I had one fine woman come to me and say as steadily as if she were saying a commonplace, 'I had the honor to lose a son in the war.' How fine that is—'I had the honor to sacrifice a son for the redemption of mankind!' And yet there is a sob back of the statement, there is a tear brushed hastily away from the cheek. A woman came up to the train the other day and seized my hand and was about to say something when she turned away in a flood of tears. I asked a standerby what was the matter, and he said, 'Why, sir, she lost a son in France.' Mind you, she did not turn away from me. I ordered her son overseas. I advised the Congress of the United States to sacrifice that son. She came to me as a friend. She had nothing in her heart except the hope that I could save other sons, though she had given hers gladly, and, God helping me, I will save other sons. Through evil report and good report, through resistance and misrepresentation and every other vile thing, I shall fight my way to that goal. I call upon the men to whom I have referred—the honest, patriotic, intelligent men, who have been too particularly concerned in criticizing the details of that treaty—to forget the details, to remember the great enterprise, to stand with me, and fulfill the hopes and traditions of the United States.

"My fellow citizens, there is only one conquering force in the world. There is only one thing you can not kill, and that is the spirit of free men. I was telling some friends to-day of a legendary story of the Middle Ages, of a chieftain of one of the half-civilized peoples that overran Europe commanding some of his men to do a certain thing which they believed to be against the traditions of their tribe. They refused, and he blazed out upon them, 'Don't you know that I can put you to death?' 'Yes,' they said, 'and don't you know that we can die cursing you?' He could not kill their spirits; and they knew perfectly well that if he unjustly slew them the whole spirit of their tribe would curse him; they knew that, if he did an unjust thing, out of the blood that they split would spring up, as it were, armed men, like dragons' teeth, to overwhelm him. The thing that is vindicated in the long run is the right, and the only thing that is unconquerable is the truth. America is believed in throughout the world, because she has put spirit before material ambition. She has said that she is willing to sacrifice everything that she is and everything that she has not only that her people may be free but that fredom may reign throughout the world.

"I hear men say—how often I heard it said on the other side of the water!—how amazing it was that America went into this war. I tell you, my fellow citizens—I tell it with sorrow—it was universally believed on the other side of the water that we would not go into the war because we were making money out of it, and loved the money better than we loved justice. They all believed that. When we went over there they greeted us with amazement. They said, 'These men did not have to come. Their territories are not invaded. Their independence is not directly threatened. Their interests were not immediately attacked, only indirectly. They were getting a great prosperity out of this calamity of ours, and we were told that they worshipped the almighty dollar; but here come, tramping, tramping, tramping, these gallant fellows with something in their faces we never saw before—eyes lifted to the horizon, a dash that knows no discouragement, a knowledge only of how to go forward, no thought of how to go backward—3,000 miles from home. What are they fighting for? Look at their faces and you will see the answer. They see a vision. They see a cause. They see mankind redeemed. They see a great force which would recall civilization. They love something they have never touched. They love the things that emanate from the throne of justice, and they have come here to fight with us and for us, and they are our comrades.'

"We were told by certain people in France that they went to the Fourth of July celebration last calendar year in Paris with sinking hearts. Our men had just begun to come over in numbers. They did not expect they would come soon enough or fast enough to save them. They went out of courtesy; and before the day was over, having merely been in the presence of those boys, they knew that Europe was saved, because they had seen what that blind man saw in the song. You have heard that spirited song of the blind Frenchman, his boy at the window, music in the streets, the marching of troops, and he says to the lad, 'See what that is. What do you see, lad? What are the colors? What are the men? Is there a banner with red and white stripes upon it? Is there a bit of heaven in the corner? Are there stars in that piece of the firmament? Ah, thank God, the Americans have come!' It was the revelation to Europe of the heart of a great Nation, and they believe in that heart now. You never hear the old sneers. You never hear the old intimation that we will seek our interest and not our honor. You never hear the old fear that we shall not stand by free men elsewhere who make common cause with us for justice to mankind. You hear, on the contrary, confident prediction, confident expectation, a confident hope that the whole world will be steadied by the magnificent purpose and force of the United States. If I was proud as an American before I went over there—and I hope my pride had just foundation—I was infinitely more proud when I came back to feel that I could bring you this message.

"My fellow citizens, let us—every one of us—bind ourselves in a solemn league and covenant of our own that we will redeem this expectation of the world, that we will not allow any man to stand in the way of it, that the world shall hereafter bless and not curse us, that the world hereafter shall follow us and not turn aside from us, and that in leading we will not lead along the paths of private advantage, we will not lead along the paths of national ambition, but we will be proud and happy to lead along the paths of right, so that men shall always say that American soldiers saved Europe and American citizens saved the world."

THE PRESIDENT AT LUNCHEON, PALACE HOTEL, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., SEPTEMBER 17, 1919.

"Mrs. Mott and my fellow citizens, Mrs. Mott has very happily interpreted the feeling with which I face this great audience. I have come to get a consciousness of your support and of your sentiment, at a time in the history of the world, I take leave to say, more critical than has ever been known during the history of the United States. I have felt a certain burden of responsibility as I have mixed with my fellow countrymen across the continent, because I have feared at times that there were those amongst us who did not realize just what the heart of this question is. I have been afraid that their thoughts were lingering in a past day when the calculation was always of national advantage, and that it had not come to see the light of the new day in which men are thinking of the common advantage and safety of mankind. The issue is nothing else. Either we must stand apart, and in the phrase of some gentlemen, 'take care of ourselves,' which means antagonize others, or we must join hands with the other great nations of the world and with the weak nations of the world, in seeing that justice is everywhere maintained.

"Quite apart from the merits of any particular question that may be raised about the treaty itself, I think we are under a certain moral compulsion to accept this treaty. In the first place, my fellow citizens, it was laid down according to American specifications. The initial suggestions upon which this treaty is based emanated from America. I would not have you understanding me as meaning that they were ideas confined to America, because the promptness with which they were accepted, the joy with which they were hailed in some parts of the world, the readiness of the leaders of nations that had been supposed to be seeking chiefly their own interest in adopting these principles as the principles of the peace, show that they were listening to the counsels of their own people, that they were listening to those who knew the critical character of the new age and the necessity we were under to take new measures for the peace of the world, because the thing that had happened was intolerable. The thing that Germany attempted, if it had succeeded, would have set the civilization of the world back a hundred years. We have prevented it, but prevention is not enough. We have shown Germany—and not Germany only, but the world—that upon occasion the great peoples of the world will combine to prevent an iniquity, but we have not shown how that is going to be done in the future with a certainty that will make every other nation know that a similar enterprise must not be attempted.

"Again and again, as I have crossed the continent, generous women, women I did not know, have taken me by the hand and said, 'God bless you, Mr. President.' Some of them, like many of you, had lost sons and husbands and brothers in the war. Why should they bless me? I advised Congress to declare war. I advised Congress to send their sons to their death. As commander in chief of the Army, I sent them over the seas, and they were killed. Why should they bless me? Because in the generosity of their hearts they want the sons of other women saved henceforth, and they believe that the methods proposed at any rate create a very hopeful expectation that similar wars will be prevented, and that other armies will not have to go from the United States to die upon distant fields of battle. The moral compulsion upon us, upon us who at the critical stage of the world saved the world and who threw in our fortunes with all the forward-looking peoples of the world—the moral compulsion upon us to stand by and see it through is overwhelming. We can not now turn back. We made the choice in April, 1917. We can not with honor reverse it now.

"Not only is there the compulsion of honor, but there is the compulsion of interest. I never like to speak of that, because, notwithstanding the reputation that we had throughout the world before we made the great sacrifice of this war, this Nation does love its honor better than it loves its interest. It does yield to moral compulsion more readily than to material compulsion. That is the glory of America. That is the spirit in which she was conceived and born. That is the mission that she has in the world. She always has lived up to it, and, God helping her, she always will live up to it. But if you want, as some of our fellow countrymen insist, to dwell upon the material side of it and our interest in the matter, our commercial interest, draw the picture for yourselves. The other nations of the world are drawing together. We who suggested that they should draw together in this new partnership stand aside. We at once draw their suspicion upon us. We at once draw their intense hostility upon us. We at once renew the thing that had begun to be done before we went into the war. There was a conference in Paris not many months before we went into the war in which the nations then engaged against Germany attempted to draw together in an exclusive economic combination where they should serve one another's interest and exclude those who had not participated in the war from sharing in that interest, and just so certainly as we stay out, every market that can possibly be closed against us will be closed. If you merely look at it from the point of view of the material prosperity of the United States, we are under compulsion to stay in the partnership. I was asking some gentlemen the other day who were engaged in commerce of various sorts, 'Can you sell more easily to a man who trusts you or to a man who distrusts you?' There can be but one answer to that question. Can you sell more easily to a man who takes your goods because he can not do without them or to a man who wants them and believes them the best? The thing demonstrates itself. You make all the lines of trade lines of resistance unless you prove true to the things that you have attempted and undertaken.

"Then, there is a deeper compulsion even than those, the compulsion of humanity. If there is one thing that America ought to have learned more promptly than any other country it is that, being made up out of all the ranks of humanity, in serving itself it must serve the human race. I suppose I could not command the words which would exaggerate the present expectations of the world with regard to the United States. Nothing more thrilling, nothing more touching, happened to me on the other side of the water than the daily evidences that, not the weak peoples merely, not the peoples of countries that had been allowed to shift for themselves and had always borne the chief burden of the world's sufferings, but the great peoples as well, the people of France as well as the people of Serbia, the people of all the nations that had looked this terror in the face, were turning to the United States and saying, 'We depend upon you to take the lead, to direct us how to go out of this wilderness of doubt and fear and terror.' We can not desert humanity. We are the trustees of humanity, and we must see that we redeem the pledges which are always implicit in so great a trusteeship.

"So, feeling these compulsions, the compulsion of honor, the compulsion of interest, and the compulsion of humanity, I wonder what it is that is holding some minds back from acquiescence in this great enterprise of peace. I must admit to you, my fellow citizens, that I have been very much puzzled. I can not conceive a motive adequate to hold men off from this thing, and when I examine the objections which they make to the treaty I can but wonder if they are really thinking, or if, on the other hand, there is some emotion coming from fountains that I do not know of which are obliging them to take this course.

"Let me take the point in which my initial sympathy is most with them, the matter of the cession to Japan of the interests of Germany in Shantung, in China. I said to my Japanese colleagues on the other side of the sea, and therefore I am at liberty to say in public, I am not satisfied with that settlement. I think it ought to have been different, but when gentlemen propose to cure it by striking that clause out of the treaty or by ourselves withholding our adherence to the treaty, they propose an irrational thing. Let me remind you of some of the history of this business. It was in 1898 that China ceded these rights and concessions to Germany. The pretext was that some German missionaries had been killed. My heart aches, I must say, when I think how we have made an excuse of religion sometimes to work a deep wrong. The central Government of China had done all that they could to protect those German missionaries; their death was due to local disturbances, to local passion, to local antipathy against the foreigner. There was nothing that the Chinese Government as a whole could justly be held responsible for; but suppose there had been. Two Christian missionaries are killed, and therefore one great nation robs another nation and does a thing which is fundamentally un-Christian and heathen! For there was no adequate excuse for what Germany exacted of China. I read again only the other day the phrases in which poor China was made to make the concessions. She was made to make them in words dictated by Germany, in view of her gratitude to Germany for certain services rendered—the deepest hypocrisy conceivable! She was obliged to do so by force.

"Then, what happened, my fellow citizens? Then Russia came in and obliged China to cede her Port Arthur and Talien Wan, not for quite so long a period, but upon substantially the same terms. Then England must needs have Wei-Hai-Wei as an equivalent concession to that which had been made to Germany; and presently certain ports, with the territory back of them, were ceded upon similar principles to France. Everybody got in, except the United States, and said, 'If Germany is going to get something, we will get something.' Why? None of them had any business in there on such terms.

"Then when the Japanese-Russian War came, Japan did what she has done in this war. She attacked Port Arthur and captured Port Arthur, and Port Arthur was ceded to her as a consequence of the war. Not one official voice was raised in the United States against that cession. No protest was made. No protest was made by the Government of the United States against the original cession of this Shantung territory to Germany. One of the highest minded men of our history was President at that time—I mean Mr. McKinley. One of the ablest men that we have had as Secretary of State, Mr. John Hay, occupied that great office. In the message of Mr. McKinley about this transaction, he says—I am quoting his language—that inasmuch as the powers that had taken these territories had agreed to keep the door open there for our commerce, there was no reason why we should object. Just so we could trade with these stolen territories we were willing to let them be stolen. Which of these gentlemen who are now objecting to the cession of the German rights in Shantung to Japan were prominent in protesting against the original cession or any one of those original cessions? It makes my heart burn when some men are so late in doing justice.

"In the meantime, before we got into this war, but after the war had begun, because they deemed the assistance of Japan in the Pacific absolutely indispensable, Great Britain and France both agreed that if Japan would enter and cooperate in the war she could do the same thing with regard to Shantung that she had done with regard to Port Arthur; that if she would take what Germany had in China she could keep it. She took it. She has it now. Her troops are there. She has it as spoils of war. Observe, my fellow citizens, we are not taking this thing away from China; we are taking it from Germany. China had ceded it for 99 years, and there are 78 of those 99 to run yet. They were Germany's rights in Shantung, not China's, that were ceded by the treaty to Japan, but with a difference—a difference which never occurred in any of these other cases—a difference which was not insisted upon at the cession of Port Arthur—upon a condition that no other nation in doing similar things in China has ever yielded to. Japan is under solemn promise to forego all sovereign rights in the Province of Shantung and to retain only what private corporations have elsewhere in China, the right of concessionaires with regard to the operation of the railway and the exploitation of the mines. Scores of foreign corporations have that right in other parts of China.

"But it does not stop there. Coupled with this arrangement is the league of nations, under which Japan solemnly undertakes, with the rest of us, to protect the territorial integrity of China, along with the territorial integrity of other countries, and back of her promise lies the similar promise of every other nation, that nowhere will they countenance a disregard for the territorial integrity or the political independence of that great helpless people, lying there hitherto as an object of prey in the great Orient. It is the first time in the history of the world that anything has been done for China, and sitting around our council board in Paris I put this question: 'May I expect that this will be the beginning of the retrocession to China of the exceptional rights which other Governments have enjoyed there?' The responsible representatives of the other great Governments said, 'Yes; you may expect it.' Expect it?

"Your attention is constantly drawn to article 10, and that is the article—the heart of the covenant—which guarantees the territorial integrity and political independence not only of China, but of other countries more helpless even than China; but, besides article 10, there is article 11, which makes it the right of every member of the league, big or little, influential or not influential, to draw attention to anything, anywhere, that is likely to disturb the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends. Whenever formerly anything was done in detriment of the interests of China, we had to approach the Government that did it with apologies. We had, as it were, to say, 'This is none of our business, but we would like to suggest that this is not in the interest of China.' I am repeating, not the words but the purport of notes that I have signed myself to Japan, in which I was obliged to use all the genuflections of apology and say, 'The United States believes that this is wrong in principle and suggests to the Japanese Government that the matter be reconsidered.' Now, when you have the league of nations the representative of the United States has the right to stand up and say, 'This is against the covenants of peace; it can not be done,' and if occasion arises we can add, 'It shall not be done.' The weak and oppressed and wronged peoples of the world have never before had a forum made for them in which they can summon their enemies into the presence of the judgment of mankind, and if there is one tribunal that the wrongdoer ought to dread more than another it is that tribunal of the opinion of mankind. Some nations keep their international promises only because they wish to obtain the respect of mankind. You remember those immortal words in the opening part of the Declaration of Independence. I wish I could quote them literally, but they run this way, that out of respect for the opinion of mankind the leaders of the American Revolution now state the causes which have led them to separate themselves from Great Britain. America was the first to set that example, the first to admit that right and justice and even the basis of revolution was a matter upon which mankind was entitled to form a judgment.

"If we do not take part in this thing, what happens? France and England are absolutely bound to this thing without any qualifications. The alternative is to defend China in the future with important concessions to begin with, or else let the world go back to its old methods of rapacity; or else take up arms against France and England and Japan, and begin the shedding of blood over again, almost fraticidal blood. Does that sound like a practical program? Does that sound like doing China a service? Does that sound like anything that is rational?

"Go to other matters with which I have less patience, other objections to the league. I have spoken of article 10. Those who object to article 10 object to entering the league with any responsibilities whatever. They want to make it a matter of opinion merely and not a matter of action. They know just as well as I know that there is nothing in article 10 that can oblige the Congress of the United States to declare war if it does not deem it wise to declare war. We engage with the other nations of the world to preserve as against external aggression—not as against internal revolution—the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the other members of the league; and then, in the next sentence, it is said that the council of the league of nations shall advise with regard to the measures which may be necessary to carry out this promise on the part of the members. As I have said several times in my speeches, I have in vain searched the dictionary to find any other meaning for the word 'advise' than 'advise.' These gentlemen would have you believe that our armies can be ordered abroad by some other power or by a combination of powers. They are thinking in an air-tight compartment. America is not the only proud nation in the world. I can testify from my share in the counsels on the other side of the sea that the other nations are just as jealous of their sovereignty as we are of ours. They would no more have dreamed of giving us the right of ordering out their armies than we would have dreamed of giving them the right to order out our armies. The advice can come from the United States only after the United States representative votes in the affirmative.

"We have got an absolute veto on the thing, unless we are parties to the dispute, and I want again to call attention to what that means. That means unless we want to seize somebody's territory or invade somebody's political independence, or unless somebody else wants to seize our territory and invade our political independence. I regard either of those contingencies as so remote that they are not troubling me in the least. I know the people of this country well enough to know that we will not be the aggressors in trying to execute a wrong, and in looking about me I do not see anybody else that would think it wise to try it on us. But suppose we are parties. Then is it the council of the league that is forcing war upon us? The war is ours anyhow. We are in circumstances where it is necessary for Congress, if it wants to steal somebody's territory or prevent somebody from stealing our territory, to go to war. It is not the council of the league that brings us into war at that time, in such circumstances; it is the unfortunate circumstances which have arisen in some matter of aggression. I want to say again that article 10 is the very heart of the covenant of the league, because all the great wrongs of the world have had their root in the seizure of territory or the control of the political independence of other peoples. I believe that I speak the feeling of the people of the United States when I say that, having seen one great wrong like that attempted and having prevented it, we are ready to prevent it again.

"Those are the two principal criticisms—that we did not do the impossible with regard to Shantung and that we may be advised to go to war. That is all there is in either of those. But they say, 'We want the Monroe doctrine more distinctly acknowledged.' Well, if I could have found language that was more distinct than that used, I should have been very happy to suggest it, but it says in so many words that nothing in that document shall be construed as affecting the validity of the Monroe doctrine. I do not see what more it could say, but, as I say, if the clear can be clarified, I have no objection to its being clarified. The meaning is too obvious to admit of discussion, and I want you to realize how extraordinary that provision is. Every nation in the world had been jealous of the Monroe doctrine, had studiously avoided doing or saying anything that would admit its validity, and here all the great nations of the world sign a document which admits its validity. That constitutes nothing less than a moral revolution in the attitude of the rest of the world toward America.

"What does the Monroe doctrine mean in that covenant? It means that with regard to aggressions upon the Western Hemisphere we are at liberty to act without waiting for other nations to act. That is the Monroe doctrine. The Monroe doctrine says that if anybody tries to interfere with affairs in the Western Hemisphere it will be regarded as an unfriendly act to the United States—not to the rest of the world—and that means that the United States will look after it, and will not ask anybody's permission to look after it. The document says that nothing in this document must be construed as interfering with that. I dismiss the objections to the Monroe doctrine all the more because this is what happened: I brought the first draft of the covenant to this country in March last. I then invited the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House and the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate to the White House to dinner, and after dinner we had the frankest possible conference with regard to this draft. When I went back to Paris I carried every suggestion that was made in that conference to the commission on the league of nations, which consisted of representatives of 14 nations, and every one of the suggestions of those committees was embodied in the document. I suppose it is a pride of style. I suppose that, although the substance was embodied, they would rather write it differently, but, after all, that is a literary matter. After all, that is a question of pride in the command of the English language, and I must say that there were a great many men on that commission on the league of nations who seemed perfectly to understand the English language and who wished to express, not only in the English text but in its French equivalent, exactly what we wanted to say.

"One of the suggestions I carried over was that we should have the right to withdraw. I must say that I did not want to say, 'We are going into this if you promise we can scuttle whenever we want to.' That did not seem to me a very handsome thing to propose, and I told the men in the conference at the White House, when they raised the question, that it had been raised in the commission on the league of nations and that it was the unanimous opinion of the international lawyers of that body that, inasmuch as this was an association of sovereigns, they had the right to withdraw. But I conceded that if that right was admitted there could be no harm in stating it, and so in the present draft of the covenant it is stated that any member may withdraw upon two years' notice, which, I think, is not an unreasonable length of time, provided that at the end of the two years all the international obligations of that power under the covenant shall have been fulfilled. Would you wish any other condition? Would you wish the United States allowed to withdraw without fulfilling its obligations? Is that the kind of people we are? Moreover, have we ever failed to fulfill our international obligations? It is a point of pride with me, my fellow citizens, not to debate this question. I will not debate with anybody whether the United States is likely to withdraw without fulfilling its obligations or not, and if other gentlemen entertain that possibility and expectation, I separate myself from them.

"But there is another matter. They say that the British Empire has six votes and we have only one. It happens that our one is as big as the six, and that satisfies me entirely. Let me explain what I mean. It is only in the assembly that the British Empire has six votes—not in the council—and there is only one thing that the assembly votes on in which it can decide a matter without the concurrence of all the States represented on the council, and that is the admission of new members to the league of nations. With regard to every other matter, for example, amendments to the covenant, with regard to cases referred out of the council to the assembly, it is provided that if a majority of the assembly and the representatives of all the States represented on the council concur, the vote shall be valid and conclusive, which means that the affirmative vote of the United States is in every instance just as powerful as the six votes of the British Empire. I took the pains yesterday, I believe it was, on the train, to go through the covenant almost sentence by sentence again, to find if there was any case other than the one I have mentioned in which that was not true, and there is no other case in which that is not true. Of course, you will understand that wherever the United States is a party to a quarrel and that quarrel is carried to the assembly, we can not vote; but, similarly, if the British Empire is a party her six representatives can not vote. It is an even break any way you take it, and I would rather count six as one person than six as six persons. So far as I can see, it makes me a bigger man. The point to remember is that the energy of the league of nations resides in the council, not in the assembly, and that in the council there is a perfect equality of votes. That settles that matter, and even some of my fellow countrymen who insist upon keeping a hyphen in the middle of their names ought to be satisfied with that—though I must admit that I do not care to argue anything with a hyphen. A man that puts anything else before the word 'American' is no comrade of mine, and yet I am willing even to discomfit him with a statement of fact.

"Those are the objections to yielding to these compulsions of honor, interest, and humanity, and it is because of the nature of these objections, their flimsiness, the impossibility of supporting them with conclusive argument, that I am profoundly puzzled to know what is back of the opposition to the league of nations. I know one of the results, and that is to raise the hope in the minds of the German people that, after all, they can separate us from those who were our associates in the war. I know that the pro-German propaganda which had theretofore not dared to raise its head again has now boldly raised its head and is active all over the United States. These are disturbing and illuminating circumstances. Pray understand me; I am not accusing some of the honorable men whose objections I am trying to answer with trying to draw near to Germany. That is not my point; but I am saying that what they are attempting to do is exactly what Germany desires, and that it would touch the honor of the United States very near if at the end of this great struggle we should seek to take the position which our enemies desire and our friends deplore.

"I am arguing the matter only because I am a very patient man. I have not the slightest doubt as to what the result is going to be. I have felt the temper and high purpose of this great people as I have crossed this wonderful land of ours, and one of the things that make it most delightful to stand here is to remember that the people of the Pacific coast were the first to see the new duty in its entirety. It is a remarkable circumstance that you people, who were farthest from the field of conflict, most remote from that contact of interests which stirred so many peoples, yet outdid the rest of the country in volunteering for service and volunteering your money. As I came through that wonderful country to the north of us it occurred to me one day that the aspiring lines of those wonderful mountains must lead people's eyes to be drawn upward and to look into the blue serene and see things apart from the confusions of affairs, to see the real, pure vision of the interests of humanity; and that, after all, the spirit of America was best expressed where people withdrew their thoughts from the entangling interests of everyday life, purified their motives from all that was selfish and groveling and based upon the desire to seize and get and turned their thoughts to those things that are worth living for.

"The only thing that makes the world inhabitable is that it is sometimes ruled by its purest spirits. I want to leave this illustration, which I have often used, in your minds of what I mean. Some years ago some one said to me that the modern world was a world in which the mind was monarch, and my reply was that if that was true it must be one of those modern monarchs that reigned and did not govern; that, as a matter of fact, the world was governed by a great popular assembly made up of the passions and that the constant struggle of civilization was to see that the handsome passions had a working majority. That is the problem of civilization, that the things that engage the best impulses of the human spirit should be the prevailing things, the conquering things, the things that one can die comfortably after achieving. How do men ever go to sleep that have conceived wrong? How do men ever get their own consent to laugh who have not looked the right in the face and extended their hand to it? If America can in the future look the rest of the world in the face, it will be because she has been the champion of justice and of right."

THE PRESIDENT AT AUDITORIUM, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., SEPTEMBER 17, 1919.

"Mr. Chairman, Mr. Rolph, my fellow countrymen, you have given me a very royal welcome, and I am profoundly appreciative of the greeting that you have extended me. It is a matter of gratification to me to be permitted to speak to this great audience representing as it does one of the most forward-looking States of the Union, representing as it does a great body of people who are accustomed to look and plan to the future. As I picture to myself the history of this great country which we love, I remember the surging tides of humanity moving always westward, over the eastern mountains and the plains, deploying upon the great further slopes of the Rockies, then overflowing into these fertile and beautiful valleys by the Pacific; and that is a picture to me of the constant forward, confident, hopeful movement of the American people. I feel that it is not without significance that this was the portion of the country which responded with the most extraordinary spirit to the call to arms, responded with the utmost spontaneity and generosity to the call for the money of the people to be loaned to the Government for the conduct of the Great War, responded to all those impulses of purpose and of freedom which underlay the great struggle we have just passed through.

"As I have passed through your streets to-day, and through others in the many generous communities north of you and east of you, you have made me feel how the spirit of the American people is coming to a single vision, how the thought of the American people is back of a single purpose. I have come before you, my fellow citizens, to discuss a very serious theme. I want to analyze for you the very important issue with which this Nation is now face to face. It is by far the most important question that has ever come before this people for decision, and the reason I have come out upon this long journey is that I am conscious that it is the people, their purpose, their wish, that is to decide this thing, and not the thought of those who are planning any private purpose of their own.

"What I first want to call your attention to, my fellow citizens, is this: You know that the debate in which we are engaged centers first of all upon the league of nations, and there seems to have arisen an idea in some quarters that the league of nations is an idea recently conceived, conceived by a small number of persons, somehow originated by the American representatives at the council table in Paris. Nothing could be further from the truth than that. I would not feel the confidence that I feel in the league of nations if I felt that it was so recent and novel a growth and birth as that. On the contrary, it is the fruit of many generations of thoughtful, forward-looking men, not only in this country but in the other countries of the world, who have been able to look forward to the combined fortunes of mankind. The men who have conceived this great purpose are not men who through these generations, when they were concerting counsel in this great matter, thought of the fortunes of parties, thought of the fortunes of individuals. I would be ashamed of myself, as I am frankly ashamed of any fellow countryman of mine who does it, if I discussed this great question with any portion of my thought devoted to the contest of parties and the elections of next year.

"Some of the greatest spirits, some of the most instructed minds of both parties have been devoted to this great idea for more than a generation. It has come before the Paris conference out of the stage of ideal conception. It had long before that begun to assume the shape of a definite program and plan for the concert and cooperation of the nations in the interest of the peace of the world, and when I went to Paris I was conscious that I was carrying there no plan which was novel either to America or to Europe, but a plan which all statesmen who realized the real interests of their people had long ago hoped might be carried out in some day when the world would realize what the peace of the world meant and what were its necessary foundations. When I got to Paris I was not conscious of presenting anything that they had not long considered, and I felt that I was merely the spokesman of thoughtful minds and hopeful spirits in America. I was not putting forward any purpose of my own. So that I beg you will dismiss any personal appearance or personal relationship which this great plan may bear. I would indeed be a very proud man if I had personally conceived this great idea, but I can claim no such honor. I can only claim the privilege of having been the obedient servant of the great ideals and purposes of beloved America.

"I want you to realize, my fellow countrymen, that those Americans who are opposing this plan of the league of nations offer no substitute. They offer nothing that they pretend will accomplish the same object. On the contrary, they are apparently willing to go back to that old and evil order which prevailed before this war began and which furnished a ready and fertile soil for those seeds of envy which sprung up like dragon's teeth out of the bloody soil of Europe. They are ready to go back to that old and ugly plan of armed nations, of alliances, of watchful jealousies, of rabid antagonisms, of purposes concealed, running by the subtle channels of intrigue through the veins of people who do not dream what poison is being injected into their systems. They are willing to have the United States stand alone, withdraw from the concert of nations; and what does that mean, my fellow citizens? It means that we shall arm as Germany was armed, that we shall submit our young men to the kind of constant military service that the young men of Germany were subjected to. It means that we shall pay not lighter but heavier taxes. It means that we shall trade in a world in which we are suspected and watched and disliked, instead of in a world which is now ready to trust us, ready to follow our leadership, ready to receive our traders, along with our political representatives as friends, as men who are welcome, as men who bring goods and ideas for which the world is ready and for which the world has been waiting. That is the alternative which they offer.

"It is my purpose, fellow citizens, to analyze the objections which are made to this great league, and I shall be very brief. In the first place, you know that one of the difficulties which have been experienced by those who are objecting to this league is that they do not think that there is a wide enough door open for us to get out. For my own part, I am not one of those who, when they go into a generous enterprise, think first of all how they are going to turn away from those with whom they are associated. I am not one of those who, when they go into a concert for the peace of the world, want to sit close to the door with their hand on the knob and constantly trying the door to be sure that it is not locked. If we want to go into this thing—and we do want to go into it—we will go in it with our whole hearts and settled purpose to stand by the great enterprise to the end. Nevertheless, you will remember—some of you, I dare say—that when I came home in March for an all too brief visit to this country, which seems to me the fairest and dearest in the world, I brought back with me the first draft of the covenant of the league of nations. I called into consultation the Committees on Foreign Affairs and on Foreign Relations of the House and Senate of the United States, and I laid the draft of the covenant before them. One of the things that they proposed was that it should be explicitly stated that any member of the league should have the right to withdraw. I carried that suggestion back to Paris, and without the slightest hesitation it was accepted and acted upon; and every suggestion which was made in that conference at the White House was accepted by the conference of peace in Paris. There is not a feature of the covenant, except one, now under debate upon which suggestions were not made at that time, and there is not one of those suggestions that was not adopted by the conference of peace.

"The gentlemen say, 'You have laid a limitation upon the right to withdraw. You have said that we can withdraw upon two years' notice, if at that time we shall have fulfilled all our international obligations and all our obligations under the covenant.' 'Yes,' I reply; 'is it characteristic of the United States not to fulfill her international obligations? Is there any fear that we shall wish to withdraw dishonorably? Are gentlemen willing to stand up and say that they want to get out whether they have the moral right to get out or not?' I for one am too proud as an American to debate that subject on that basis. The United States has always fulfilled its international obligations, and, God helping her, she always will. There is nothing in the covenant to prevent her acting upon her own judgment with regard to that matter. The only thing she has to fear, the only thing she has to regard, is the public opinion of mankind, and, inasmuch as we have always scrupulously satisfied the public opinion of mankind with regard to justice and right, I for my part am not afraid at any time to go before that jury. It is a jury that might condemn us if we did wrong, but it is not a jury that could oblige us to stay in the league, so that there is absolutely no limitation upon our right to withdraw.

"One of the other suggestions I carried to Paris was that the committees of the two Houses did not find the Monroe doctrine safeguarded in the covenant of the league of nations. I suggested that to the conference in Paris, and they at once inserted the provision which is now there that nothing in that covenant shall be construed as affecting the validity of the Monroe doctrine. What is the validity of the Monroe doctrine? The Monroe doctrine means that if any outside power, any power outside this hemisphere, tries to impose its will upon any portion of the Western Hemisphere the United States is at liberty to act independently and alone in repelling the aggression; that it does not have to wait for the action of the league of nations; that it does not have to wait for anything but the action of its own administration and its own Congress. This is the first time in the history of international diplomacy that any great government has acknowledged the validity of the Monroe doctrine. Now for the first time all the great fighting powers of the world except Germany, which for the time being has ceased to be a great fighting power, acknowledge the validity of the Monroe doctrine and acknowledge it as part of the international practice of the world.

"They are nervous about domestic questions. They say, 'It is intolerable to think that the league of nations should interfere with domestic questions,' and whenever they begin to specify they speak of the question of immigration, of the question of naturalization, of the question of the tariff. My fellow citizens, no competent or authoritative student of international law would dream of maintaining that these were anything but exclusively domestic questions, and the covenant of the league expressly provides that the league can take no action whatever about matters which are in the practice of international law regarded as domestic questions. We did not undertake to enumerate samples of domestic questions for the very good reason, which will occur to any lawyer, that if you made a list it would be inferred that what you left out was not included. Nobody with a thoughtful knowledge of international practice has the least doubt as to what are domestic questions, and there is no obscurity whatever in this covenant with regard to the safeguarding of the United States, along with other sovereign countries, in the control of domestic questions. I beg that you will not fancy, my fellow citizens, that the United States is the only country that is jealous of its sovereignty. Throughout these conferences it was necessary at every turn to safeguard the sovereign independence of the several governments who were taking part in the conference, and they were just as keen to protect themselves against outside intervention in domestic matters as we were. Therefore the whole heartiness of their concurrent opinion runs with this safeguarding of domestic questions.

"It is objected that the British Empire has six votes and we have one. The answer to that is that it is most carefully arranged that our one vote equals the six votes of the British Empire. Anybody who will take the pains to read the covenant of the league of nations will find out that the assembly—and it is only in the assembly that the British Empire has six votes—is not a voting body. There is a very limited number of subjects upon which it can act at all, and I have taken the pains to write them down here, after again and again going through the covenant for the purpose of making sure that I had not omitted anything, in order that I might give you an explicit account of the thing. There are two things which a majority of the assembly may do without the concurrent vote of the United States. A majority of the assembly can admit a new member to the league of nations. A majority of the assembly can recommend to any nation a member of the league a reconsideration of such treaties as are apparently in conflict with the provisions of the covenant itself; it can advise any member of the league to seek a reconsideration of any international obligation which seems to conflict with the covenant itself, but it has no means whatever of obliging it to reconsider even so important a matter as that, which is obviously a moral duty on the part of any member of the league. All the action, all the energy, all the initiative, of the league of nations is resident in the council, and in the council a unanimous vote is necessary for action, and no action is possible without the concurrent vote of the United States. I would rather, personally, as one man count for six than be six men and count only six. The United States can offset six votes. Here are the cases: When a matter in dispute is referred by the council to the assembly its action must be taken by a majority vote of the assembly, concurred in by the representatives of all the governments represented in the council, so that the concurrence of the vote of the United States is absolutely necessary to an affirmative vote of the assembly itself. In the case of an amendment to the covenant it is necessary that there should be a unanimous vote of the representatives of the nations which are represented in the council in addition to a majority vote of the assembly itself. And there is all the voting that the assembly does.

"Not a single affirmative act or negative decision upon a matter of action taken by the league of nations can be validated without the vote of the United States of America. We can dismiss from our dreams the six votes of the British Empire, for the real underlying conception of the assembly of the league of nations is that it is the forum of opinion, not of action. It is the debating body; it is the body where the thought of the little nation along with the thought of the big nation is brought to bear upon those matters which affect the peace of the world, is brought to bear upon those matters which affect the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends; where this stifled voice of humanity is at last to be heard, where nations that have borne the unspeakable sufferings of the ages that must have seemed to them like æons will find voice and expression, where the moral judgment of mankind can sway the opinion of the world. That is the function of the assembly. The assembly is the voice of mankind. The council, where unanimous action is necessary, is the only means through which that voice can accomplish action.

"You say, 'We have heard a great deal about article 10.' I just now said that the only substitute for the league of nations which is offered by the opponents is a return to the old system. What was the old system? That the strong had all the rights and need pay no attention to the rights of the weak; that if a great, powerful nation saw what it wanted, it had the right to go and take it; that the weak nations could cry out and cry out as they pleased and there would be no hearkening ear anywhere to their rights. I want to bring in another subject connected with this treaty, but not with the league of nations, to illustrate what I am talking about. You have heard a great deal about the cession to Japan of the rights which Germany had acquired in Shantung Province in China. What happened under the old order of things, my fellow citizens? The story begins in 1898. Two German missionaries were killed in China by parties over whom the Central Government of China was unable to exercise control. It was one of those outbreaks, like the pitiful Boxer rebellion, where a sudden hatred of foreigners wells up in the heart of a nation uninformed, aware of danger, aware of wrong, but not knowing just how to remedy it, not knowing just what was the instrumentality of right. And, my fellow citizens, why should not the Chinaman hate the foreigner? The foreigner has always taken from him everything that he could get. When by irresponsible persons these German missionaries were murdered, the German Government insisted that a great part of the fair Province of Shantung should be turned over to them for exploitation. They insisted that the accessible part of Kaiochow Bay, the part where trade entered and left, should be delivered over to them for sovereign control for 99 years, and that they should be given a concession for a railway into the interior and for the right to exploit mines in that rich mineral country for 30 miles on either side of the railway.

"This was not unprecedented, my fellow countrymen. Other civilized nations had done the same thing to China, and at that time what did the Government of the United States do? I want to speak with the utmost respect for the administration of that time, and the respect is unaffected. That very lovable and honest gentleman, William McKinley, was President of the United States. His Secretary of State was one of the most honorable and able of the long series of our Secretaries of State, the Hon. John Hay. I believe Mr. Hay, if he had seen any way to accomplish more than he did accomplish, would have attempted to accomplish it, but this is all that the administration of Mr. McKinley attempted: They did not even protest against this compulsory granting to Germany of the best part of a rich Province of a helpless country, but only stipulated that the Germans should keep it open to the trade of the United States. They did not make the least effort to save the rights of China; they only tried to save the commercial advantages of the United States. There immediately followed upon that cession to Germany a cession to Russia of Port Arthur and the region called Talien-Wan for 25 years, with the privilege of renewing it for a similar period. When soon afterwards Japan and Russia came to blows, you remember what happened. Russia was obliged to turn over to Japan Port Arthur and Talien-Wan, just exactly as Japan is now allowed to take over the German rights in Shantung. This Government, though the conference which determined these things was held on our own soil, did not, so far as I have been able to learn, make the slightest intimation of objecting. At the time Germany got Kaiochow Bay, England came in and said that since Germany was getting a piece of Shantung and Russia was getting Port Arthur and Talien-Wan, she would insist upon having her slice of China, too, and the region of Wei-Hai-Wai was ceded to her. Immediately upon that France got into the unhandsome game, and there was ceded to France for 99 years one of the ports of China with the region lying behind it. In all of those transactions there was not a single attempt made by the Government of the United States to do anything except to keep those regions open to our traders.

"You now have the historic setting of the settlement about Shantung. What I want to call your attention to is that the treaty of peace does not take Shantung from China; it takes it from Germany. There are 78 years of the 99 of that lease still to run, and not only do we not take it from China, but Japan promises in an agreement which is formally recorded, which is acknowledged by the Japanese Government, to return all the sovereign rights which Germany enjoyed in Shantung without qualification to China, and to retain nothing except what foreign corporations have throughout China, the right to run that railroad and exploit those mines. There is not a great commercial and industrial nation in Europe that does not enjoy privileges of that sort in China, and some of them enjoy them at the expense of the sovereignty of China. Japan has promised to release everything that savors of sovereignty and return it to China itself. She will have no right to put armed men anywhere into that portion of China. She will have no right to interfere with the civil administration of that portion of China. She will have no rights but economic and commercial rights. Now, if we choose to say that we will not assent to the Shantung provision, what do we do for China? Absolutely nothing. Japan has what Germany had in China in her military possession now. She has the promise of Great Britain and France that so far as they are concerned she can have it without qualification, and the only way we can take it away from Japan is by going to war with Japan and Great Britain and France.

"The league of nations for the first time provides a tribunal in which not only the sovereign rights of Germany and of Japan in China, but the sovereign rights of other nations can be curtailed, because every member of the league solemnly covenants to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the other members, and China is to be a member. Never before, my fellow citizens, has there been a tribunal to which people like China could carry the intolerable grievances to which they have been subjected. Now a great tribunal has been set up in which the pressure of the whole judgment of the world will be exercised in her behalf.

"That is the significance of article 10. Article 10 is the heart of the whole promise of peace, because it cuts out of the transactions of nations all attempts to impair the territorial integrity or invade the political independence of the weak as well as of the strong. Why did not Mr. Hay protest the acquisition of those rights in Shantung by Germany? Why did he not protest what England got, and what France got, and what Russia got? Because under international law, as it then stood, that would have been a hostile act toward those governments. The law of the world was actually such that if you mentioned anybody else's wrong but your own, you spoke as an enemy. After you have read article 10, read article 11. Article 11 says that it shall be the friendly right of any member of the league, strong or weak, to call the attention of the league to any matter, anywhere, that affects the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends; so that for the first time it affords fine spirits like Mr. McKinley and Mr. John Hay the right to stand up before mankind and protest, and to say, 'The rights of China shall be as sacred as the rights of those nations that are able to take care of themselves by arms.' It is the most hopeful change in the law of the world that has ever been suggested or adopted.

"But there is another subject upon which some of our fellow citizens are particularly sensitive. They say, 'What does the league of nations do for the right of self-determination?' I think I can answer that question; if not satisfactorily, at any rate very specifically. It was not within the privilege of the conference of peace to act upon the right of self-determination of any peoples except those which had been included in the territories of the defeated empires—that is to say, it was not then within their power—but the moment the covenant of the league of nations is adopted it becomes their right. If the desire for self-determination of any people in the world is likely to affect the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations, it becomes the business of the league; it becomes the right of any member of the league to call attention to it; it becomes the function of the league to bring the whole process of the opinion of the world to bear upon that very matter. Where before, and when before, may I ask some of my fellow countrymen who want a forum upon which to conduct a hopeful agitation, were they ever offered the opportunity to bring their case to the judgment of mankind? If they are not satisfied with that, their case is not good. The only case that you ought to bring with diffidence before the great jury of men throughout the world is the case that you can not establish. The only thing I shall ever be afraid to see the league of nations discuss, if the United States is concerned, is a case which I can hardly imagine, where the United States is wrong, because I have the hopeful and confident expectation that whenever a case in which the United States is affected is brought to the consideration of that great body we need have no nervousness as to the elements of the argument so far as we are concerned. The glory of the United States is that it never claimed anything to which it was not justly entitled.

"I look forward with a quickened pulse to the days that lie ahead of us as a member of the league of nations, for we shall be a member of the league of nations—I look forward with confidence and with exalted hope to the time when we can indeed legitimately and constantly be the champions and friends of those who are struggling for right anywhere in the world, and no nation is likely to forget, my fellow citizens, that behind the moral judgment of the United States resides the overwhelming force of the United States. We were respected in those old Revolutionary days when there were three millions of us. We are, it happens, very much more respected, now that there are more than a hundred million of us. Now that we command some of the most important resources of the world, back of the majesty of the United States lies the strength of the United States. If Germany had ever dreamed, when she conceived her ungodly enterprise, that the United States would have come into the war, she never would have dared to attempt it.

"But now, my fellow citizens, the hope of Germany has revived. The hope of Germany has revived, because in the debates now taking place in the United States she sees a hope of at last doing what her arms could not do—dividing the United States from the great nations with which it was associated in the war. Here is a quotation from a recent utterance of one of her counsellors of state:

"'All humanity, Germany particularly, is tensely awaiting the decision of the American Senate on the peace treaty,' ex-Minister of State von Scheller Steinwartz said to-day. 'Apparently'—out of respect for him I will not mention the name that that ex-Minister Steinwartz mentions—'apparently Senator Blank is the soul of the opposition. The Senator is no German hater. He hates all non-Americans equally, and he is absolutely a just man of almost Quakerlike moral strength.' How delightful to receive such praise from such a source! 'When he and other important Senators fight the peace treaty, their course means that the treaty displeases them because in the excessive enslavement of Germany, for which America would be forever responsible, they see grave danger of future complications. That course is thus to be hailed like the morning red of a new dawn.' A new dawn for the world? Oh, no; a new dawn for Germany. 'There is promise of a still better realization of conditions in the prospect that America, in all seriousness, may express the wish for a separate peace with the Central Powers.'

"A separate peace with the Central Empires could accomplish nothing but our eternal disgrace, and I would like, if my voice could reach him, to let this German counsellor know that the red he sees upon the horizon is not the red of a new dawn, but the red of a consuming fire which will consume everything like the recent purposes of the Central Empires. It is not without significance, my fellow citizens, that coincidentally with this debate with regard to the ratification of this treaty the whole pro-German propaganda has shown its head all over the United States. I would not have you understand me to mean that the men who are opposing the ratification of the treaty are consciously encouraging the pro-German propaganda. I have no right to say that or to think it, but I do say that what they are doing is encouraging the pro-German propaganda, and that it is bringing about a hope in the minds of those whom we have just spent our precious blood to defeat that they may separate us from the rest of the world and produce this interesting spectacle, only two nations standing aside from the great concert and guaranty of peace—beaten Germany and triumphant America.

"See what can be accomplished by that. By that the attitude of the rest of the world toward America will be exactly what its recent attitude was toward Germany, and we will be in the position absolutely alien to every American conception, of playing a lone hand in the world for our selfish advantage and aggrandizement. The thing is inconceivable. The thing is intolerable. The thing can and will never happen.

"I speak of these things in order that you may realize, my fellow citizens, the solemnity and the significance of this debate in which we are engaged; its solemnity because it involves the honor of the United States and the peace of humanity; its significance because, whether gentlemen plan it or not, not only refusal on our part, but long hesitation on our part to cast our fortunes permanently in with the fortunes of those who love right and liberty will be to bring mankind again into the shadow of that valley of death from which we have just emerged. I was saying to some of your fellow citizens to-day how touching it had been to me as I came across the continent to have women whom I subsequently learned had lost their sons or their husbands come and take my hand and say, 'God bless you, Mr. President.' Why should they say 'God bless' me? I advised the Congress of the United States to take the action which sent their sons to their death. As Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, I ordered their sons to their death. Why should they take my hand and with tears upon their cheeks say, 'God bless you'? Because they understood, as I understood, as their sons who are dead upon the fields of France understood, that they had gone there to fight for a great cause, and, above all else, they had gone there to see that in subsequent generations women should not have to mourn their dead. And as little children have gathered at every station in playful light-heartedness about the train upon which I was traveling, I have felt as if I were trustee for them. I have felt that this errand that I am going about upon was to save them the infinite sorrows through which the world has just passed, and that if by any evil counsel or unhappy mischance this great enterprise for which we fought should fail, then women with boys at their breasts ought now to weep, because when those lads come to maturity the great battle will have to be fought over again.

"And, my fellow citizens, there is another battle of which we are now upon the eve. That is the battle for the right organization of industrial society. I do not need to tell an audience in this great, progressive State what I mean by that. We can not work out justice in our communities if the world is to continue under arms and ready for war. We must have peace, we must have leisure of mind and detachment of purpose, if we are going to work out the great reforms for which mankind is everywhere waiting. I pray God that normal times may not much longer be withheld from us. The world is profoundly stirred. The masses of men are stirred by thoughts which never moved them before. We must not again go into the camp. We must sit down at the council table and, like men and brethren, lovers of liberty and justice, see that the right is done, see that the right is done to those who bear the heat and burden of the day, as well as to those who direct the labor of mankind. I am not a partisan of any party to any of these contests, and I am not an enemy of anybody except the minority that tries to control. I do not care where the minority is drawn from, I do not care how influential or how insignificant, I do not care which side of the labor question it has been on, if the power of the United States under my direction can prevent the domination of a minority, it will be prevented. I am a champion of that sort of peace, that sort of order, that sort of calm counsel out of which, and out of which alone, can come the satisfactory solutions of the problems of society. You can not solve the problems of society amidst chaos, disorder, and strife. You can only solve them when men have agreed to be calm, agreed to be just, agreed to be conciliatory, agreed that the right of the weak is as majestic as the right of the strong; and when we have come to that mind in the counsels of nations we can then more readily come to that mind in our domestic counsels, upon which the happiness and prosperity of our own beloved people so intimately and directly depend.

"I beg, my fellow citizens, that you will carry this question home with you, not in little pieces, not with this, that, and the other detail at the front in your mind, but as a great picture including the whole of the Nation and the whole of humanity, and know that now is the golden hour when America can at last prove that all she has promised in the day of her birth was no dream but a thing which she saw in its concrete reality, the rights of men, the prosperity of nations, the majesty of justice, and the sacredness of peace."

"Mr. Toastmaster, my fellow countrymen, I stood here yesterday, but before a very different audience, an audience that it was very delightful to address, and it is no less delightful to find myself face to face with this thoughtful group of citizens of one of the most progressive States in the Union. Because, after all, my fellow citizens, our thought must be of the present and the future. The men who do not look forward now are of no further service to the Nation. The immediate need of this country and of the world is peace not only, but settled peace, peace upon a definite and well-understood foundation, supported by such covenants as men can depend upon, supported by such purposes as will permit of a concert of action throughout all the free peoples of the world. The very interesting remarks of your toastmaster have afforded me the opportunity to pay the tribute which they earn to the gentlemen with whom I was associated on the other side of the water. I do not believe that we often enough stop to consider how remarkable the peace conference in Paris has been. It is the first great international conference which did not meet to consider the interests and advantages of the strong nations. It is the first international conference that did not convene in order to make the arrangements which would establish the control of the strong. I want to testify that the whole spirit of the conference was the spirit of men who do not regard themselves as the masters of anybody, but as the servants of the people whom they represent. I found them quick with sympathy for the peoples who had been through all these dolorous ages imposed upon, upon whom the whole yoke of civilization seemed to have been fastened so that it never could be taken off again.

"The heart of this treaty, my fellow citizens, is that it gives liberty and independence to people who never could have got it for themselves, because the men who constituted that conference realized that the basis of war was the imposition of the will of strong nations upon those who could not resist them. You have only to take the formula of the recent war in order to see what was the matter. The formula of Pan-Germanism was Bremen to Bagdad. What is the line from Bremen to Bagdad? It leads through partitioned Poland, through prostrated Roumania, through subjugated Slavia, down through disordered Turkey, and on into distressed Persia, and every foot of the line is a line of political weakness. Germany was looking for the line of least resistance to establish her power, and unless the world makes that a line of absolute resistance, this war will have to be fought over again. You must settle the difficulties which gave occasion to the war or you must expect war again. You know what had happened all through that territory. Almost everywhere there were German princes planted on thrones where they did not belong, where they were alien, where they were of a different tradition and a different people, mere agents of a political plan, the seething center of which was that unhappy city of Constantinople, where, I dare say, there was more intrigue to the square inch than there has ever been anywhere else in the world, and where not the most honest minds always but generally the most adroit minds were sent to play upon the cupidity of the Turkish authorities and upon the helplessness of the Balkan States, in order to make a field for European aggression. I am not now saying that Germany was the only intriguer. I am not now saying that hers was the only plans of advantage, but I am saying that there was the field where lay the danger of the world in regard to peace. Every statesman in Europe knew it, and at last it dawned upon them that the remedy was not balances of power but liberty and right.

"An illumination of profound understanding of human affairs shines upon the deliberations of that conference that never shone upon the deliberations of any other international conference in history, and therefore it is a happy circumstance to me to be afforded the opportunity to say how delightful it was to find that these gentlemen had not accepted the American specifications for the peace—for you remember they were the American specifications—because America had come in and assisted them and because America was powerful and they desired her influence and assistance, but because they already believed in them. When we uttered our principles, the principles for which we were fighting, they had only to examine the thoughts of their own people to find that those were also the principles for which their people were fighting as well as the people of the United States; and the delightful enthusiasm which showed itself in accomplishing some of the most disinterested tasks of the peace was a notable circumstance of the whole conference. I was glad after I inaugurated it that I drew together the little body which was called the big four. We did not call it the big four; we called it something very much bigger than that. We called it the supreme council of the principal allied and associated powers. We had to have some name, and the more dramatic it was the better; but it was a very simple council of friends. The intimacies of that little room were the center of the whole peace conference, and they were the intimacies of men who believed in the same things and sought the same objects. The hearts of men like Clemenceau and Lloyd-George and Orlando beat with the people of the world as well as with the people of their own countries. They have the same fundamental sympathies that we have, and they know that there is only one way to work out peace and that is to work out right.

"The peace of the world is absolutely indispensable to us, and immediately indispensable to us. There is not a single domestic problem that can be worked out in the right temper or opportunely and in time unless we have conditions that we can count on. I do not need to tell business men that they can not conduct their business if they do not know what is going to happen to-morrow. You can not make plans unless you have certain elements in the future upon which you can depend. You can not seek markets unless you know whether you are going to seek them among people who suspect you or people who believe in you. If the United States is going to stand off and play truant in this great enterprise of justice and right, then you must expect to be looked upon with suspicion and hostile rivalry everywhere in the world. They will say, 'These men are not intending to assist; they are intending to exploit us.' You know what happened just a few months before we went into the war. There was a conference at Paris consisting of representatives of the principal allied powers for the purpose of concerting a sort of economic league in which they would manage their purchasing as well as their selling in a way which would redound to their advantage and make use of the rest of the world. That was because they then thought what they will be obliged to think again if we do not continue our partnership with them—that we were standing off to get what we could out of it, and they were making a defensive economic arrangement. Very well; they will do that again. Almost of instinct they will do it again, not out of a deliberate hostility to the United States but by the general instinctive impulse of their own business interest and their own business men. Therefore we can not arrange a single element of our business until we have settled peace and know whether we are going to deal with a friendly world or an unfriendly world.

"We can not determine our own internal economic reforms until then, and there must be some very fundamental economic reforms in this country. There must be a reconsideration of the structure of our economic society. Whether we will or no, the majority of mankind demand it, in America as well as elsewhere, and we have got to sit down in the best temper possible, in times of quiet, in times permitting conciliation and not hostility, and determine what we are going to do. We can not do it until we have peace. We can not release the great industrial and economic power of America and let it run free until there are channels that are free in which it can run. And the channels of business are mental channels as well as physical channels. In an open market men's minds must be open. It has been said so often that it is a very trite saying, but it remains nevertheless true, that a financial panic is a mere state of mind. There are no fewer resources in a country at the time of a panic than there were the day before it broke. There is no less money, there is no less energy, there is no less individual capacity and initiative, but something has frightened everybody and credits are drawn in and everybody builds a fence around himself and is careful to keep behind the fence and wait and see what is going to happen. That is a panic. It is a waiting, a fearful expecting of something to happen. Generally it does not happen. Generally men slowly get their breath again and say, 'Well, the world looks just the same as it did; we had better get to work again.' Even when business is absolutely prostrate they are at least in the condition that a friend of mine described. He was asked at the time of one of our greatest panics, some 25 years ago, if business was not looking up. He said, 'Yes; it is so flat on its back that it can not look any other way.' Even if it is flat on its back, it can see the world; it is not lying on its face, and it will presently sit up and begin to take a little nourishment and take notice, and the panic is over. But while the whole world is in doubt what to expect, the whole world is under the partial paralysis that is characteristic of a panic. You do not know what it is safe to do with your money now. You do not know what plans it is safe to make for your business now. You have got to know what the world of tomorrow is going to be, and you will not know until we have settled the great matter of peace.

"I want to remind you how the permanency of peace is at the heart of this treaty. This is not merely a treaty of peace with Germany. It is a world settlement; not affecting those parts of the world, of course, which were not involved in the war, because the conference had no jurisdiction over them, but the war did extend to most parts of the world, and the scattered, dismembered assets of the Central Empires and of Turkey gave us plenty to do and covered the greater part of the distressed populations of the world. It is nothing less than a world settlement, and at the center of that stands this covenant for the future which we call the covenant of the league of nations. Without it the treaty can not be worked, and without it it is a mere temporary arrangement with Germany. The covenant of the league of nations is the instrumentality for the maintenance of peace.

"How does it propose to maintain it? By the means that all forward-looking and thoughtful men have desired for generations together, by substituting arbitration and discussion for war. To hear some gentlemen talk you would think that the council of the league of nations is to spend its time considering when to advise other people to fight. That is what comes of a constant concentration of attention upon article 10. Article 10 ought to have been somewhere further down in the covenant, because it is in the background; it is not in the foreground. I am going to take the liberty of expounding this to you, though I assume that you have all read the covenant. At the heart of that covenant are these tremendous arrangements: Every member of the league solemnly agrees—and let me pause to say that that means every fighting nation in the world, because for the present, limited to an army of 100,000, Germany is not a fighting nation—that it will never go to war without first having done one or another of two things, without either submitting the matter in dispute to arbitration, in which case it promises absolutely to abide by the verdict, or, if it does not care to submit it to arbitration, without submitting it to discussion by the council of the league of nations, in which case it promises to lay all the documents and all the pertinent facts before that council; it consents that that council shall publish all the documents and all the pertinent facts, so that all the world shall know them; that it shall be allowed six months in which to consider the matter; and that even at the end of the six months, if the decision of the council is not acceptable, it will still not go to war for three months following the rendering of the decision. So that, even allowing no time for the preliminaries, there are nine months of cooling off, nine months of discussion, nine months not of private discussion, not of discussion between those who are heated, but of discussion between those who are disinterested except in the maintenance of the peace of the world, when the purifying and rectifying influence of the public opinion of mankind is brought to bear upon the contest. If anything approaching that had been the arrangement of the world in 1914, the war would have been impossible; and I confidently predict that there is not an aggressive people in the world who would dare bring a wrongful purpose to that jury. It is the most formidable jury in the world. Personally, I have never, so far as I know, been in danger of going to jail, but I would a great deal rather go to jail than do wrong and be punished merely by the look in the eyes of the men amongst whom I circulated. I would rather go to jail than be sent to coventry. I would rather go to jail than be conscious every day that I was despised and distrusted. After all, the only overwhelming force in the world is the force of opinion.

"If any member of the league ignores these promises with regard to arbitration and discussion, what happens? War? No; not war, but something more tremendous, I take leave to say, than war. An absolute isolation, a boycott. It is provided in the covenant that any nation that disregards these solemn promises with regard to arbitration and discussion shall be thereby deemed ipso facto to have committed an act of war against the other members of the league, and that there shall thereupon follow an absolute exclusion of that nation from communication of any kind with the members of the league. No goods can be shipped in or out; no telegraphic messages can be exchanged, except through the elusive wireless perhaps; there shall be no communication of any kind between the people of the other nations and the people of that nation. There is not a nation in Europe that can stand that for six months. Germany could have faced the armies of the world more readily than she faced the boycott of the world. Germany felt the pinch of the blockade more than she felt the stress of the blow; and there is not, so far as I know, a single European country—I say European because I think our own country is an exception—which is not dependent upon some other part of the world for some of the necessaries of its life. Some of them are absolutely dependent, some of them are without raw materials practically of any kind, some of them are absolutely without fuel of any kind, either coal or oil; almost all of them are without that variety of supply of ores which are necessary to modern industry and necessary to the manufacture of munitions of war. When you apply that boycott, you have got your hand upon the throat of the offending nation, and it is a proper punishment. It is an exclusion from civilized society.

"Inasmuch as I have sometimes been said to have been very disregardful of the constitutional rights of Congress, may I not stop to speak just for a moment of a small matter that I was punctilious to attend to in regard to that article? You will notice the language that any member of the league that makes breach of its covenants shall be regarded as thereby 'ipso facto to have committed an act of war.' In the original draft it read, 'Shall thereby be ipso facto regarded as at war with the other nations of the world.' I said, 'No; I can not subscribe to that, because I am bound to safeguard the right of Congress to determine whether it is at war or not. I consent to its being an act of war by the party committing it, but whether Congress takes up the gage thus thrown down or not is another matter in which I can not participate in determining in a document of this sort.' Germany committed several acts of war against us before we accepted the inevitable and took up her challenge, and it was only because of a sort of accumulation of evidence that Germany's design was not merely to sink American ships and injure American citizens, that was incidental to her design, but that her design was to destroy free political society. I remember saying to Congress before we went into the war that if Germany committed some act of war against us that was intolerable, I might have to give them different advice, and I remember a newspaper correspondent asked me what I thought would constitute such an act. I said, 'I don't know, but I am perfectly certain I will know it when I see it. I can not hypothetically define it, but it will be perfectly obvious when it occurs.' And if Congress regards this act by some other member of the league as such an act of war against it as necessitates the maintenance of the honor of the United States, then it may in those circumstances declare war, but it is not bound to declare war under the engagement of the covenant. What I am emphasizing, my fellow citizens, is this: That the heart of this covenant is arbitration and discussion, and that is the only possible basis for peace in the future.

"It is a basis for something better than peace. Civilization proceeds on the principle of understanding one another. You know peace between those who employ labor and those who labor depends upon conference and mutual understanding. If you do not get together with the other side, it will be hostility to the end; and after you have heard the case of the other fellow it sometimes becomes a little awkward for you to insist upon the whole of your case, because the human mind does have this fine quality—that it finds it embarrassing to face the truth and deny it. Moreover, the basis of friendship is intercourse. I know—I am very fond of—a very large number of men whom I know to be crooks. They are very engaging fellows, and when I form a judgment against them I have to be in another room. I can not, because of my personal attitude toward them, form a harsh judgment; indeed, I suppose the very thing that gives some men the chance to be crooks is their fascinating personality. They put it over on you. You remember that very charming remark of Charles Lamb. One night, in company with some friends who were speaking of some person not present, Lamb, in his stuttering fashion, said, 'I—I—I h—hate that fellow.' Some one said, 'Why, Charles, I didn't know you knew him.' 'Oh, I—I d—d—don't,' he said, 'I—I c—can't h—h—hate a m—man I—I know.' That is one of the most genial utterances of the human spirit I have ever read, and one of the truest. It is mighty hard to hate a fellow you know, and it is mighty hard to hate a nation you know. If you had mixed, as I have had the good fortune to mix, with scores of people of other nations in recent months, you would have the same feeling that I do if, after you got over superficial matters like differences of language and some differences of manner, they were the same kind of folks.

"As I have said to a number of audiences on this trip, the most thrilling thing that happened to me over there was the constant intercourse I was having with delegations of people representing nations from all over the globe, some of which, I had shamefacedly to admit, I had never heard of before. Do you know where Adjur-Badjan is? Well, one day there came in a very dignified and interesting group of gentlemen from Adjur-Badjan. I did not have time until they were gone to find out where they came from, but I did find this out immediately, that I was talking to men who talked the same language that I did in respect of ideas, in respect of conceptions of liberty, in respect of conceptions of right and justice, and I did find this out, that they were, with all the other delegations that came to see me, metaphorically speaking, holding their hands out to America and saying, 'You are the disciples and leaders of the free peoples of the world; can't you come and help us?' Until we went into this war, my fellow citizens, it was the almost universal impression of the world that our idealism was a mere matter of words; that what we were interested in was getting on in the world and making as much as we could out of it. That was the sum and substance of the usual opinion of us outside of America; and in the short space that we were in this war that opinion was absolutely reversed.

"Consider what they saw: The flower of our youth sent three and four thousand miles away from their home, a home which could not be directly touched by the flames of that war, sent to foreign fields to mix with foreign and alien armies to fight for a cause which they recognized as the common cause of mankind, and not the peculiar cause of America. It caused a revulsion of feeling, a revulsion of attitude which, I dare say, has never been paralleled in the world; and at this moment, unless the cynical counsels of some of our acquaintances should prevail—which God fordbid—they are expecting and inviting us to lead the civilized world, because they trust us—they really and truly trust us. They would not believe, no matter where we sent an army to be of assistance to them, that we would ever use that army for any purpose but to assist them. They know that when we say, as we said when we sent men to Siberia, that we are sending them to assist in the distribution of food and clothing and shoes so that brigands will not seize them, and that for the rest we are ready to render any assistance which they want us to render, and will interfere in absolutely nothing that concerns their own affairs, we mean it, and they believe us. There is not a place in this world now, unless we wait a little while longer, where America's political ambitions are looked upon with suspicion. That was frankly admitted in this little conference that I have spoken of. Not one of those gentlemen thought that America had any ulterior designs whatever. They were, therefore, in all our conferences, in consulting our economical experts, in consulting our geographical experts, constantly turning to America to act as umpire; and in nine cases out of ten, just because America was disinterested and could look at the thing without any other purpose than reaching a practicable solution, it was the American solution that was accepted.

"In order that we may not forget, I brought with me the figures as to what this war meant to the world. This is a body of business men and you will understand these figures. They are too big for the imagination of men who do not handle big things. Here is the cost of the war in money, exclusive of what we loaned one another: Great Britain and her dominions, $38,000,000,000; France, $26,000,000,000; the United States, $22,000,000,000 (this is the direct cost of our operations); Russia, $18,000,000,000; Italy, $13,000,000,000; and the total, including Belgium, Japan, and other countries, $123,000,000,000. This is what it cost the Central Powers: Germany, $39,000,000,000, the biggest single item; Austria-Hungary, $21,000,000,000; Turkey and Bulgaria, $3,000,000,000; a total of $63,000,000,000, and a grand total of direct war costs of $186,000,000,000—almost the capital of the world. The expenditures of the United States were at the rate of $1,000,000 an hour for two years, including nighttime with daytime. The battle deaths during the war were as follows: Russia lost in dead 1,700,000 men, poor Russia that got nothing but terror and despair out of it all; Germany, 1,600,000; France, 1,385,000; Great Britain, 900,000; Austria, 800,000; Italy, 364,000; the United States, 50,300 dead. The total for all the belligerents, 7,450,200 men—just about seven and a half million killed because we could not have arbitration and discussion, because the world had never had the courage to propose the conciliatory methods which some of us are now doubting whether we ought to accept or not. The totals for wounded are not obtainable except our own. Our own wounded were 230,000, excluding those who were killed. The total of all battle deaths in all the wars of the world from the year 1793 to 1914 was something under 6,000,000 men, so that about a million and a half more men were killed in this war than in all the wars of something more than 100 preceding years. We really can not realize that. Those of us who lost sons or brothers can realize it. We know what it meant. The women who have little children crowding about their knees know what it means; they know that the world has hitherto been devoted to brutal methods of settlement, and that every time a war occurs it is the flower of the manhood that is destroyed; that it is not so much the present generation as the next generation that goes maimed off the stage or is laid away in obscure graves upon some battle field; and that great nations are impaired in their vitality for two generations together and all their life embittered by a method of settlement for which we could find, and have now found, a substitute.

"My fellow citizens, I believe in Divine Providence. If I did not, I would go crazy. If I thought the direction of the disordered affairs of this world depended upon our finite intelligence, I should not know how to reason my way to sanity, and I do not believe that there is any body of men, however they concert their power or their influence, that can defeat this great enterprise, which is the enterprise of divine mercy and peace and good will."

THE PRESIDENT AT BERKELEY, CALIF., SEPTEMBER 18, 1919.

"Dean Jones, Mr. Mayor, ladies and gentlemen, I feel an old feeling come over me as I stand in this presence, and my great danger and temptation is to revert to type and talk to you as college men and women from a college man. I was reminded as I received your very generous welcome of a story told of Mr. Oliver Herford, a very delightful wit and artist. He was one day sitting in his club, and a man came by who did not know him very well, but who took many liberties. He slapped him on the back and said, 'Hello, Ollie, old boy, how are you?' Herford writhed a little under the blow, looked at him a little coldly, and said: 'I don't know your name; I don't know your face; but your manners are very familiar.' I can say to you young ladies and gentlemen, I do not know your names or your faces, but your manners are very familiar, and very delightfully familiar. I think also of a rebuke I used often to address to my classes. I used to say that the trouble about the college youth of America was that it refused to grow up; that the men and women alike continued to be schoolboys and schoolgirls. I used to remind them that on the continent of Europe revolutions often began in the universities, and statesmen were nervous of nothing so much as of the concerted movements of opinion at the centers of learning; and I asked them what Cabinet at Washington ever cared a peppercorn what they were thinking about. It is your refusal, my fellow students, to grow up. One reason I am glad to see that the boys who have been at the front come back is that they have grown up; they have seen the world; seen it at its worst, but nevertheless seen it in action; seen it with its passions in action; seen it with its savage and its liberal passions in action. They have come back to know what they are preparng for, to know the kind of world that they are going to go out in, not to do physical fighting, but to do the kind of thinking that is better than fighting, the kind of thinking that makes men conscious of their duties, the kind of thinking that purifies the impulses of the world and leads it on to better things.

"The burden that is upon my heart as I go about on this errand is that men are hesitating to give us the chance. We can not do any effective thinking for the world until we know that there is settled peace. We can not make any long plans for the betterment of mankind until these initial plans are made, and we know that there is going to be a field and an opportunity to make the plans that will last and that will become effective. That is the ground of my impatience with the debate. I admit that there are debatable things, but I do not admit that they need be debated so long. Not only that, but I do insist that they should be debated more fairly. A remark was repeated to me that was made after the address I made in San Francisco last night. Some man said that after hearing an exposition of what was really in the treaty he was puzzled; he wondered what the debate was about; it all seemed so simple. That was not, I need not assure you, because I was misleading anybody or telling what was not in the treaty, but because the men he had heard debate it, some of the newspapers he had heard debate it, had not told him what was in the treaty. This great document of human rights, this great settlement of the world, had been represented to him as containing little traps for the United States. Men had been going about dwelling upon this, that, and the other feature and distorting the main features and saying that that was the peace proposed. They are responsible for some of the most serious mistakes that have ever been made in the history of this country; they are responsible for misleading the opinion of the United States. It is a very distressing circumstance to me to find that when I recite the mere facts they are novel to some of my fellow citizens. Young gentlemen and young ladies, what we have got to do is to see that that sort of thing can not happen. We have got to know what the truth is and insist that everybody shall know what the truth is, and, above all things else, we must see that the United States is not defeated of its destiny, for its destiny is to lead the world in freedom and in truth."

"Dr. Rinehart, my fellow citizens, you have indeed warmed my heart with your splendid welcome and I esteem it a great privilege to stand here before you to-night to look at some of the serious aspects of the great turning point in the history of this Nation and the history of the world which affairs have brought us to. Dr. Rinehart expressed my own feeling when she said that in my own consciousness those great ranks of little children seemed to me my real clients, seemed to be that part of my fellow citizens for whom I am pleading. It is not likely, my fellow citizens, that with the depelted resources of the great fighting nations of Europe, there will be another war soon, but unless we concert measures to prevent it, there will be another and a final war, at just about the time these children come to maturity; and it is our duty to look in the face the real circumstances of the world in order that we may not be unfaithful to the great duty which America undertook in the hour and day of her birth.

"One thing has been impressed upon me more than another as I have crossed the continent, and that is that the people of the United States have been singularly, and I sometimes fear deliberately, misled as to the character and contents of the treaty of peace. Some one told me that after an address I delivered in San Francisco last night one of the men who had been present, a very thoughtful man, I was told, said that after listening to what I had said he wondered what the debate was about, it all seemed so simple, so obvious, so natural. I was at once led to reflect that that was not the cause of any gift of exposition that I have, but because I had told that audience what the real character and purpose of the covenant of nations are. They had been led to look at certain incidental features of it, either on the assumption that they had not read the document or in the hope that they would not read it, and would not realize what the real contents of it were. I have not come out from Washington, my fellow citizens, on a speech-making tour. I do not see how anybody could get his own consent to think of the way in which he was saying the things that it is necessary for me to say. I should think that every man's consciousness would be fixed, as my own is, upon the critical destiny of the world which hangs upon the decision of America. I am confident what that decision is going to be because I can see the tide of sentiment and the tide of conviction rising in this country in such a manner that any man who tries to withstand it will be overwhelmed. But we are an intelligent and thoughtful people; we want to know just what it is that we are about, and if you will be patient with me I am going to try to point out some of the things I did not dwell upon last night that are the salient and outstanding characteristics of this treaty.

"I am not going to speak to-night particularly of the covenant of the league of nations. I am going to point out to you what the treaty as a whole is. In the first place, of course, that treaty imposes upon Germany the proper penalty for the crime she attempted to commit. It is a just treaty in spite of its severity. It is a treaty made by men who had no intention of crushing the German people, but who did mean to have it burnt into the consciousness of the German people, and through their consciousness into the apprehension of the world, that no people could afford to live under a Government which was not controlled by their purpose and will and which was at liberty to impose secret ambitions upon the civilization of the world. It was intended as notice to all mankind that any Government that attempted what Germany attempted would meet with the same concerted opposition of mankind and would have meted out to it the same just retribution. All that this treaty amounts to, so far as Germany is concerned, is that she shall be obliged to pay every dollar that she can afford to pay to repair the damage that she did; except for the territorial arrangements which it includes, that is practically the whole of the treaty so far as it concerns Germany. What has not been borne in upon the consciousness of some of our people is that, although most of the words of the treaty are devoted to the settlement with Germany, the greater part of the meaning of its provisions is devoted to the settlement of the world.

"The treaty begins with the covenant of the league of nations, which is intended to operate as a partnership, a permanent partnership, of the great and free self-governing peoples of the world to stand sponsor for the right and for civilization. Notice is given in the very first articles of the treaty that hereafter it will not be a matter of conjecture whether the other great nations of the world will combine against a wrongdoer, but a matter of certainty that hereafter nations contemplating what the Government of Germany contemplated will not have to conjecture whether Great Britain and France and Italy and the great United States will join hands against them, but will know that mankind, in serried ranks, will defend to the last the rights of human beings wherever they are. This is the first treaty ever framed by such an international convention, whose object was not to serve and defend governments but to serve and defend peoples. This is the first people's treaty in the history of international dealings. Every member of that great convention of peace was poignantly aware that at last the people of the world were awake, that at last the people of the world were aware of what wrong had been wrought by irresponsible and autocratic governments, that at last all the peoples of the world had seen the vision of liberty, had seen the majesty of justice, had seen the doors thrown open to the aspirations of men and women and the fortunes of children everywhere, and they did not dare assume that they were the masters of the fortunes of any people, but knew that in every settlement they must act as the servants not only of their own people but of the people who were waiting to be liberated, the people who could not win their own liberty, the people who had suffered for centuries together the intolerable wrongs of misgovernment. This is a treaty not merely for the peoples who were represented at the peace table but for the people who were the subjects of the governments whose wrongs were forever ended by the victory on the fields of France.

"My fellow citizens, you know and you hear it said every day, you read it in the newspapers, you hear it in the conversation of your friends, that there is unrest all over the world. You hear that in every part of the world, not excluding our own beloved country, there are men who feel that society has been shaken to its foundations, and that it ought to have been shaken to its foundations, in order that men might be awakened to the wrongs that had been done and were continuing to be done. When you look into the history, not of our own free and fortunate continent, happily, but of the rest of the world, you will find that the hand of pitiless power has been upon the shoulders of the great mass of mankind since time began, and that only with that glimmer of light which came at Calvary, that first dawn which came with the Christian era, did men begin to wake to the dignity and right of the human soul, and that in spite of professions of Christianity, in spite of purposes of reform, in spite of theories of right and of justice, the great body of our fellow beings have been kept under the will of men who exploited them and did not give them the full right to live and realize the purposes that God had meant them to realize. There is little for the great part of the history of the world except the bitter tears of pity and the hot tears of wrath, and when you look, as we were permitted to look in Paris, into some of the particular wrongs which the peoples of Central Europe, the peoples upon whom the first foundations of the new German power were to be built, had suffered for generations together, you wonder why they lay so long quiet, you wonder why men, statesmen, men who pretended to have an outlook upon the world, waited so long to deliver them. The characteristic of this treaty is that it gives liberty to peoples who never could have won it for themselves. By giving that liberty, it limits the ambitions and defeats the hopes of all the imperialistic governments in the world. Governments which had theretofore been considered to desire dominion, here in this document forswore dominion, renounced it, said, 'The fundamental principle upon which we are going to act is this, that every great territory of the world belongs to the people who live in it, and that is their right, and not our right, to determine the sovereignty they shall live under and the form of government they shall maintain.' It is astonishing that this great document did not come as a shock upon the world. If the world had not already been rent by the great struggle which preceded this settlement, men would have stood at amaze at such a document as this; but there is a subtle consciousness throughout the world now that this is an end of governing people who do not desire the government that is over them.

"And, going further than that, the makers of the treaty proceeded to arrange, upon a cooperative basis, those things which had always been arranged before upon a competitive basis. I want to mention a very practical thing, which most of you, I dare say, never thought about. Most of the rivers of Europe traverse the territory of several nations, and up to the time of this peace conference there had been certain historic rights and certain treaty rights over certain parts of the courses of those rivers which had embarrassed the people who lived higher up upon the stream; just as if the great Mississippi, for example, passed through half a dozen States and the people down at New Orleans lived under a government which could control the navigation of the lower part of the Mississippi and so hamper the commerce of the States above them to the north which wished to pass to the sea by the courses of the Mississippi. There were abundant instances of that sort in Europe, and this treaty undertakes to internationalize all the great waterways of that Continent, to see to it that their several portions are taken out of national control and put under international control, so that the stream that passes through one nation shall be just as free in all its length to the sea as if that nation owned the whole of it, and nobody shall have the right to put a restriction upon their passage to the sea. I mention this in order to illustrate the heart of this treaty, which is to cut out national privilege and give to every people the full right attaching to the territory in which they live.

"Then the treaty did something more than that. You have heard of the covenant of the league of nations until, I dare say, you suppose that is the only thing in the treaty. On the contrary, there is a document almost as extensive in the latter part of the treaty which is nothing less than a great charter of liberty for the working men and women of the world. One of the most striking and useful provisions of the treaty is that every member of the league of nations undertakes to advance the humane conditions of labor for men, women, and children, to consider the interests of labor under its own jurisdiction, and to try to extend to every nation with which it has any dealings the standards of labor upon which it itself insists; so that America, which has by no means yet reached the standards in those matters which we must and shall reach, but which, nevertheless, is the most advanced in the world in respect of the conditions of labor, undertakes to bring all the influence it can legitimately to bear upon every nation with which it has any dealings to see that labor there is put upon as good a footing as labor in America. Perhaps some of you have not kept in mind the seamen's act which was passed in a recent session of Congress. Under the law before that act, seamen could be bound to the service of their ship in such fashion that when they came to the ports of the United States, if they tried to leave their ship, the Government of the United States was bound to arrest them and send them back to their ship. The seamen's act abrogates that law and practically makes it necessary for every ship that would take away from the United States the crew that it brings to it shall pay American wages to get it. Before this treaty was entered into the United States had entered upon the business of trying to extend to laboring men elsewhere the advantages which laboring men in the United States enjoy, and supplementing that promise in the covenant of the league there is an elaborate arrangement for a periodic international conference in the interest of labor. It provides that that conference shall be called next month in the city of Washington by the President of the United States, and the President of the United States has already called it. We are awaiting to learn from the Senate of the United States whether we can attend it or not. We can at least sit and listen and wonder how long we are going to be kept out of membership of this great humane endeavor to see that working men and women and children everywhere in the world are regarded as human beings and taken care of as they ought to be taken care of.

"This treaty does not stop there. It attempts to coordinate all the great humane endeavors of the world. It tries to bring under international cooperation every effort to check international crime. I mean like that unspeakable traffic in women, like that almost equally unspeakable traffic in children. It undertakes to control the dealing in deadly drugs like opium. It organizes a new method of cooperation among all the great Red Cross societies of the world. I tell you, my fellow citizens, that simple red cross has come to mean to the world more than it ever meant before. Everywhere—in the remotest recesses of the world—there are people who wear that symbol, and every time I look at it I feel like taking off my hat, as if I had seen a symbol of the world's heart. This treaty is nothing less than an organization of liberty and mercy for the world. I wish you would get a copy of it and read it. A good deal of it is technical and you could skip that part, but read all of it that you do not need an expert to advise you with regard to the meaning of. The economic and financial clauses which particularly affect the settlements with Germany are, I dare say, almost unintelligible to most people, but you do not have to understand them; they are going to be worked out by experts. The rest of it is going to be worked out by the experience of free self-governed peoples.

"One of the interesting provisions of the covenant of the league of nations it that no nation can be a member of that league which is not a self-governing nation. No autocratic government can come into its membership; no government which is not controlled by the will and vote of its people. It is a league of free, independent peoples all over the world, and when that great arrangement is consummated there is not going to be a ruler in the world that does not take his advice from his people. Germany is for the present excluded, but she is excluded only in order that she may undergo a period of probation, during which she shall prove two things—first, that she has really changed her constitution permanently, and second, that she intends to administer that constitution in the spirit of its terms. You read in the newspapers that there are intrigues going on in Germany for the restoration of something like the old government, perhaps for the restoration of the throne and placing upon it some member of the family of Hohenzollern. Very well, if that should be accomplished Germany is forever excluded from the league of nations. It is not our business to say to the German people what sort of government they shall have, it is our fundamental principle that that is their business and not ours, but it is our business to say whom we will keep company with, and if Germany wishes to live in respectable society she will never have another Hohenzollern. The other day, you will notice, Hungary for a little while put one of the Austrian princes upon her throne, and the peace conference, still sitting in Paris, sent word that they could not deal with a government which had one of the Hapsburgs at its head. The Hapsburgs and the Hohenzollerns are permanently out of business. I dare say that they personally, from what I can learn, feel antiquated and out of date. They are out of date because, my fellow citizens, this Great War, with its triumphant issue, marks a new day in the history of the world. There can no more be any such attempts as Germany made if the great leading free people of the world lends its countenance and leadership to the enterprise. I say if, but it is a mere rhetorical if. There is not the least danger that America, after a treaty has been drawn up exactly along the specifications stipulated by America, will desert its associates. We are a people that redeems its honor. We are not, and never will be, quitters.

"You notice that one of the grounds of anxiety of a small group of our fellow citizens is whether they can get out of the league if they ever get in, and so they want to have the key put in their pockets; they want to be assigned a seat right by the door; they want to sit on the edge of their chairs and say, 'If anything happens in this meeting to which I am in the least sensitive, I leave.' That, my fellow citizens, is not the spirit of America. What is going to happen is this: We are not going to sit by the door; we are going to sit in the high seats, and if the present attitude of the peoples of the world toward America is any index of what it will continue to be, the counsels of the United States will be the prevailing counsels of the league. If we were humbly at the outset to sit by the door, we would be invited to go up and take the chair. I, for one, do not want to be put in the attitude of children who, when the game goes against them, will not play, because I have such an unbounded confidence in the rectitude of the purpose of the United States that I am not afraid she will ever be caught proposing something which the other nations will defeat. She did not propose anything in Paris which the other nations defeated. The only obstacles, the only insuperable obstacles, met there were obstacles which were contained in treaties of which she had no notice, in secret treaties which certain great nations were bound in honor to respect, and the covenant of the league of nations abolishes secret treaties. From this time forth all the world is going to know what all the agreements between nations are. It is going to know, not their general character merely, but their exact language and contents, because the provision of the league is that no treaty shall be valid which is not registered with the general secretary of the league, and the general secretary of the league is instructed to publish it in all its details at the earliest possible moment. Just as you can go to the courthouse and see all the mortgages on all the real estate in your county, you can go to the general secretariat of the league of nations and find all the mortgages on all the nations. This treaty, in short, is a great clearance house. It is very little short of a canceling of the past and an insurance of the future.

"Men have asked me, 'Do you think that the league of nations is an absolute guaranty against war?' Of course it is not; no human arrangement can give you an absolute guaranty against human passion, but I answer that question with another, 'If you thought you had 50 per cent insurance against war, would not you jump at it? If you thought you had 30 per cent insurance against war, would not you take it? If you thought you had 10 per cent insurance against war, would not you think it better than nothing?' Whereas, in my judgment, this is 99 per cent insurance, because the one thing that a wrong cause can not stand is exposure. If you think that you have a friend who is a fool, encourage him to hire a hall. The particular thing that this treaty provides in the covenant of the league of nations is that every cause shall be deliberately exposed to the judgment of mankind. It substitutes what the whole world has long been for, namely, arbitration and discussion for war. In other words, all the great fighting nations of the world—for Germany for the time being, at any rate, is not a great fighting nation—promise to lay their case, whatever it may be, before the whole jury of humanity. If there had been any arrangement comparable with this in 1914, the calamitous war which we have just passed through would have been inconceivable.

"Look what happened. The Austrian crown prince was assassinated inside the Austrian dominion, in Bosnia, which was under the Empire of Austria-Hungary, though it did not belong to it, and Austria had no business to have it; and because it was suspected that the assassination was connected with certain groups of agitators and certain revolutionary societies in Serbia, war was made on Serbia, because the Austrian crown prince was assassinated in Austria! Just as if some great personage were to be assassinated, let us say, in Great Britain, and because the assassin was found to have society connections—I mean certain connections with a society that had an active membership—in the United States Great Britain should declare war on the United States. That is a violently improbable supposition, but I am merely using it as an illustration. Every foreign office in Europe, when it got sudden news of what was afoot, sent messages to its representative in Berlin asking the German Government to hold an international conference to see if the matter could not be adjusted, and the German Government would not wait 24 hours. Under the treaty of the league of nations every fighting nation is bound to wait at least nine months, and to lay all the facts pertinent to the case before the whole world. There is nothing so overpowering and irresistible, my fellow citizens, as the opinion of mankind. One of the most interesting and, I think, in one way, one of the most moving sentences in the great Declaration of Independence, is one of the opening sentences—'that out of respect to the opinion of mankind the causes which have led the people of the American Colonies to declare their independence are here set forth.' America was the first country in the world which laid before all mankind the reason why it went to war, and this treaty is the exaltation and permanent establishment of the American principle of warfare and of right. Why, therefore, do we hesitate to redeem the destiny of America? Why do we hesitate to support the most American thing that has ever been attempted? Why do we debate details when the heart of the thing is sound? And the beauty of it, my fellow citizens, is that the heart of America is sound.

"We sent our boys across the sea to beat Germany, but that was only the beginning. We sent them across the sea to assure the world that nothing such as Germany attempted should ever happen again. That is the halo that is going to be about the brows of these fine boys that have come back from overseas. That is the light that is going to rest upon the graves oversea of the boys we could not bring back. That is the glory that is going to attach to the memories of that great American Army, that it made conquest of the armies of Germany not only, but made conquest of peace for the world. Greater armies than sought the Holy Grail, greater armies than sought to redeem the Holy Sepulchre, greater armies than fought under that visionary and wonderful girl, Joan of Arc, greater than the armies of the American Revolution that sought to redeem us from the unjust rule of Britain, greater even than the armies of our Civil War which saved the Union, will be this noble army of Americans who saved the world!"

THE PRESIDENT AT STADIUM, SAN DIEGO, CALIF., SEPTEMBER 19, 1919.

"Mr. Mayor, my fellow countrymen, as you know, I have come from Washington on a very serious errand, indeed, and I need not tell you with what a thrill the sight of this great body of my fellow citizens fills my heart, because I believe that one of the most important verdicts of history has now to be rendered by the great people of the United States. I believe that this is a choice from which we can not turn back. Whether it be the choice of honor or of dishonor, it will be a final choice that we shall make in this great hour of our history.

"One of the most unexpected things that I have found on my journey is that the people of the United States have not been informed as to the real character and scope and contents of the great treaty of peace with Germany. Whether by omission or by intention, they have been directed in all of the speeches that I have read to certain points of the treaty which are incidental, and not central, and their attention has been drawn away from the real meaning of this great human document. For that, my fellow citizens, is just what it is. It not only concludes a peace with Germany and imposes upon Germany the proper penalties for the outrage she attempted upon mankind but it also concludes the peace in the spirit in which the war was undertaken by the nations opposed to Germany. The challenge of war was accepted by them not with the purpose of crushing the German people but with the purpose of putting an end once and for all to such plots against the free governments of the world as had been conceived on Wilhelmstrasse, in Berlin, unknown to the people of Germany, unconceived by them, advised by little groups of men who had the military power to carry out private ambitions.

"We went into this war not only to see that autocratic power of that sort never threatened the world again but we went into it for even larger purposes than that. Other autocratic powers may spring up, but there is only one soil in which they can spring up and that is the wrongs done to free peoples of the world. The heart and center of this treaty is that it sets at liberty people all over Europe and in Asia who had hitherto been enslaved by powers which were not their rightful sovereigns and masters. So long as wrongs like that exist in the world, you can not bring permanent peace to the world. I go further than that. So long as wrongs of that sort exist, you ought not to bring permanent peace to the world, because those wrongs ought to be righted, and enslaved peoples ought to be free to right them. For my part, I will not take any part in composing difficulties that ought not to be composed, and a difficulty between an enslaved people and its autocratic rulers ought not to be composed. We in America have stood from the day of our birth for the emancipation of people throughout the world who were living unwillingly under governments which were not of their own choice. The thing which we have held more sacred than any other is that all just government rests upon the consent of the governed, and all over the world that principle has been disregarded, that principle has been flouted by the strong, and only the weak have suffered. The heart and center of this treaty is the principle adopted not only in this treaty but put into effect also in the treaty with Austria, in the treaty with Hungary, in the treaty with Bulgaria, in the treaty with Turkey, that every great territory in the world belongs to the people who are living on it, and that it is not the privilege of any authority anywhere—certainly not the privilege of the peace conference at Paris—to impose upon those peoples any government which they accept unwillingly and not of their own choice.

"Nations that never before saw the gleam of hope have been liberated by this great document. Pitiful Poland, divided up as spoils among half a dozen nations, is by this document united and set free. Similarly, in the treaty with Austria, the Austrian power is taken off of every people over whom it had no right to reign. You know that the great populations of Bosnia and Herzigovina, which lay between Austria and the Balkan Peninsula, were unjustly under the power of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and it was in a city of Bosnia that the Crown Prince of Austria was assassinated—Bosnia which was under the power of Austria. Though Bosnia was part of Austrian territory, Austria had the audacity to hold Serbia, an outside neighbor, responsible for an act of assassination on Austrian territory, the Austrian Government choosing to believe that certain societies with which it connected the assassin, societies active in Serbia, had planned and executed the assassination. So the world was deluged in blood, and 7,400,000 men lie dead—not to speak of the pitiful wounded, not to speak of the blinded, not to speak of those with distracted brain, not to speak of all the pitiful, shattered nerves of millions of men all over the world—because of an insurgent feeling in a great population which was ruled over by rulers not of their own choice. The peace conference at Paris knew that it would not go to the root of this matter unless it destroyed power of that kind. This treaty sets those great peoples free.

"But it does not stop with that. In the heart of the treaty you will find a new charter for those who labor—men, women, and children all over the world. The heart of the world is depressed, my fellow citizens, the heart of the world is uneasy. The heart of the world is a little despairful of its future, because the economic arrangements of the world have not been just, and the people who are having unjust conditions imposed upon them are, of course, not content to live under them. When the whole world is at unrest you may be sure that there is some real cause for the unrest. It is not whimsical. Men do not disturb the foundations of their lives just to satisfy a sudden impulse. All these troubles, whatever shape they may take, whether the action taken is just or unjust, have their root in age-long wrongs which ought to be, must be, and will be righted, and this great treaty makes a beginning in that great enterprise of humanity. It provides an arrangement for recurrent and periodic international conferences, the main and sole object of which will be to improve the conditions of labor, to safeguard the lives and the health of women and children who work and whose lives would otherwise be impaired or whose health be rendered subject to all the inroads of disease. The heart of humanity beats in this document. It is not a statesman's arrangement. It is a liberation of the peoples and of the humane forces of the world, and yet I never hear the slightest intimation of any of these great features in the speeches of the gentlemen who are opposing this treaty. They never tell you what is really in this treaty. If they did your enthusiasm would sweep them off their feet. If they did they would know that it was an audacity which they had better not risk to impair the peace and the humane conditions of mankind.

"At the very front and heart of the treaty is the part which is most criticized, namely, the great covenant for a league of nations. This treaty could not be executed without such a powerful instrumentality. Unless all the right-thinking nations of the world are going to concert their purpose and their power, this treaty is not worth the paper that it is written on, because it is a treaty where peace rests upon the right of the weak, and only the power of the strong can maintain the right of the weak. If we as a nation indeed mean what we have always said, that we are the champions of human rights, now is the time when we shall be brought to the test, the acid test, as to whether we mean what we said or not. I am not saying that because I have the least doubt as to the verdict. I am just as sure of it as if it had been rendered already. I know this great people among whom I was born and bred and whom I have had the signal honor to serve, whose mouthpiece it has been my privilege to be on both sides of the water, and I know that I am speaking their conscience, when I speak in the name of my own conscience, that that is the duty of America and that it will be assumed and performed.

"You have been led to believe that the covenant of the league of nations is in some sense a private invention. It is not always said of whom, and I need not mention who is suspected. It is supposed that out of some sort of personal ambition or party intention an authorship, an origination is sought. My fellow countrymen, I wish that I could claim the great distinction of having invented this great idea, but it is a great idea which has been growing in the minds of all generous men for several generations. Several generations? Why, it has been the dream of the friends of humanity through all the ages, and now for the first time a great body of practical statesmen, immersed in the business of individual nations, gets together and realizes the dream of honest men. I wish that I could claim some originative part in so great an enterprise, but I can not. I was the spokesman in this matter, so far as I was influential at all, of all sorts and kinds of Americans and of all parties and factions in America. I would be ashamed, my fellow countrymen, if I treated a matter of this sort with a single thought of so small a matter as the national elections of 1920. If anybody discusses this question on the basis of party advantage, I repudiate him as a fellow American. And in order to validate what I have said, I want to make one or two quotations from representatives of a party to which I do not belong. The first I shall make from a man who has for a long time been a member of the United States Senate. In May, 1916, just about two years after the Great War began, this Senator, at a banquet at which I was myself present, uttered the following sentences:

"'I know, and no one I think can know better than one who has served long in the Senate, which is charged with an important share of the ratification and confirmation of all treaties, no one can, I think, feel more deeply than I do the difficulties which confront us in the work which this league—that is the great association extending throughout the country known as the League to Enforce Peace—undertakes, but the difficulties can not be overcome unless we try to overcome them. I believe much can be done. Probably it will be impossible to stop all wars, but it certainly will be possible to stop some wars, and thus diminish their number. The way in which this problem is to be worked out must be left to this league and to those who are giving this great subject the study which it deserves. I know the obstacles. I know how quickly we shall be met with the statement that this is a dangerous question which you are putting into your agreement, that no nation can submit to the judgment of other nations, and we must be careful at the beginning not to attempt too much. I know the difficulties which arise when we speak of anything which seems to involve an alliance, but I do not believe that when Washington warned us against entangling alliances he meant for one moment that we should not join with the other civilized nations of the world if a method could be found to diminish war and encourage peace.'

"'It was a year ago,' he continues, 'in delivering the chancellor's address at Union College, I made an argument on this theory, that if we were to promote international peace at the close of the present terrible war, if we were to restore international law as it must be restored, we must find some way in which the united forces of the nations could be put behind the cause of peace and law. I said then that my hearers might think that I was picturing a Utopia, but it is in the search for Utopias that great discoveries have been made. Not failure, but low aim, is the crime. This league certainly has the highest of all aims for the benefit of humanity, and because the pathway is sown with difficulties is no reason that we should turn from it.'

"The quotation is from the Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE. I read another quotation from one of the most energetic, practical, and distinguished leaders of the Republican Party, uttered in an article published in the New York Times in October, 1914:

"'The one permanent move for obtaining peace which has yet been suggested with any reasonable chance of obtaining its object is by an agreement among the great powers, in which each should pledge itself not only to abide by the decisions of a common tribunal, but to back with force the decision of that common tribunal. The great civilized nations of the world which do possess force, actual or immediately potential, should combine by solemn agreement in a great world league for the peace of righteousness.' A very worthy utterance by Theodore Roosevelt. I am glad to align myself with such utterances as those. I subscribe to every word of them. And here in concrete form is the fulfillment of the plan which they advocate. We can not in reason, we can not as lovers of liberty, we can not as supporters of right, turn away from it.

"What are those who advise us to turn away from it afraid of? In the first place, they are afraid that it impairs in some way that long traditional policy of the United States which was embodied in the Monroe doctrine, but how they can fear that I can not conceive, for the document expressly says in words which I am now quoting that nothing in this covenant shall be held to affect the validity of the Monroe doctrine. The phrase was inserted under my own eye, at the suggestion—not of the phrase but the principle—of the Foreign Relations Committees of both Houses of Congress. I think I am justified in dismissing all fear that the Monroe doctrine is in the least impaired. And what is the Monroe doctrine? It is that no outside power shall attempt to impose its will in any form upon the Western Hemisphere, and that if it does the United States, acting upon its own initiative and alone, if it chooses, can resist and will resist the attempt. Could anything leave the United States freer as a champion of the independence of the Western Hemisphere than this world acknowledgment of the validity and potency of the Monroe doctrine?

"They are afraid that the league will in some way deal with our domestic affairs. The covenant expressly says that it will have no right to deal with the domestic affairs of any member of the league, and I can not imagine anything more definite or satisfactory than that. There is no ambiguity about any part of this covenant, for the matter of that, but there is certainly no ambiguity about the statement concerning domestic affairs, for it is provided that if any matter brought before the council is found to be a matter which, under international law, lies within the exclusive jurisdiction of the State making the claim, the council shall dismiss consideration of it and shall not even make a report about it. And the subjects which are giving these gentlemen the most concern are agreed by all students of international law to be domestic questions; for example, immigration, naturalization, the tariff—these are the subjects most frequently spoken of. No one of these can be dealt with by the league of nations, so far as the sovereignty of the United States is concerned. We have a perfectly clear field there, as we have in regard to the Monroe doctrine.

"It is feared that our delegates will be outvoted, because I am constantly hearing it said that the British Empire has six votes and we have one. I am perfectly content to have only one when the one counts six, and that is exactly the arrangement under the league. Let us examine that matter a little more particularly. Besides the vote of Great Britain herself, the other five votes are the votes of Canada, of South Africa, of Australia, of New Zealand, and of India. We ourselves were champions and advocates of giving a vote to Panama, of giving a vote to Cuba—both of them under the direction and protectorate of the United States—and if a vote was given to Panama and to Cuba, could it reasonably be denied to the great Dominion of Canada? Could it be denied to that stout Republic in South Africa, that is now living under a nation which did, indeed, overcome it at one time, but which did not dare retain its government in its hands, but turned it over to the very men whom it had fought? Could we deny it to Australia, that independent little republic in the Pacific, which has led the world in so many liberal reforms? Could it be denied New Zealand? Could we deny it to the hundreds of millions who live in India? But, having given these six votes, what are the facts? For you have been misled with regard to them. The league can take no active steps without the unanimous vote of all the nations represented on the council, added to a vote of the majority in the assembly itself. These six votes are in the assembly, not in the council. The assembly is not a voting body, except upon a limited number of questions, and whenever those questions are questions of action, the affirmative vote of every nation represented on the council is indispensable, and the United States is represented on the council. The six votes that you hear about can do nothing in the way of action without the consent of the United States. There are two matters in which the assembly can act, but I do not think we will be jealous of those. A majority of the assembly can admit new members into the league. A majority of the assembly can advise a member of the league to reconsider any treaty which in the opinion of the assembly of the league is apt to conflict with the operation of the league itself, but that is advice which can be disregarded, which has no validity of action in it, which has no compulsion of law in it. With the single exception of admitting new members to the league, there is no energy in the six votes which is not offset by the energy in the one vote of the United States, and I am more satisfied to be one and count six than to be six and count only six. This thing that has been talked about is a delusion. The United States is not easily frightened, and I daresay it is least easily frightened by things that are not true.

"It is also feared that causes in which we are interested will be defeated. Well, the United States is interested in a great many causes, for the very interesting and compelling reason that the United States is made up out of all the civilized peoples of the world. There is not a national cause, my fellow citizens, which has not quickened the heartbeat of men in America. There is not a national cause which men in America do not understand, because they come of the same blood, they come of the same traditions, they recollect through long tradition the wrongs of their peoples, the hopes of their peoples, the passions of their peoples, and everywhere in America there are kinsmen to stand up and speak words of sympathy for great causes. For the first time in the history of the world, the league of nations presents a forum, a world forum, where any one of these ambitions or aspirations can be brought to the consideration of mankind. Never before has this been possible. Never before has there been a jury of mankind to which nations could take their causes, whether they were weak or strong. You have heard a great deal about article 10 of the covenant. Very well, after you have read it suppose you read article 11. Article 11 provides that it shall be the friendly right of any member of the league, big or little, strong or weak, to call attention to anything, anywhere, which is likely to disturb the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends. When anybody of kin to us in America is done wrong by any foreign government, it is likely to disturb the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends, and thus any one of the causes represented in the hearts of the American people can be brought to the attention of the whole world. One of the most effective means of winning a good cause is to bring it before that great jury. A bad cause will fare ill, but a good cause is bound to be triumphant in such a forum. Until this, international law made it an unfriendly act for any nation to call attention to any matter which did not immediately affect its own fortunes and its own right. I am amazed that so many men do not see the extraordinary change which this will bring in the transaction of human affairs. I am amazed that they do not see that now, for the first time, not selfish national policy but the general judgment of the world as to right is going to determine the fortunes of peoples, whether they be weak or whether they be strong, and I myself glory in the provisions of article 11 more than I glory in any other part of the covenant, for it draws all men together in a single friendly court, where they may discuss their own affairs and determine the issues of justice—just exactly what was desired in the hearts of the men from whom I have read extracts of opinion.

"But what disturbs me, perhaps the only thing that disturbs me, my fellow countrymen, about the form which the opposition to the league is taking is this: Certain reservations, as they are called, are proposed which in effect—I am not now stopping to form an opinion as to whether that is the intention or not; I have no right to judge the intention of a man who has not stated what his intention is—which in effect amount to this, that the United States is unwilling to assume the same obligations under the covenant of the league that are assumed by the other members of the league; that the United States wants to disclaim any part in the responsibility which the other members of the league are assuming. I want to say with all the emphasis of which I am capable that that is unworthy of the honor of the United States. The principle of justice, the principle of right, the principle of international amity is this, that there is not only an imaginary but a real equality of standing and right among all the sovereign peoples of the world. I do not care to defend the rights of a people if I must regard them as my inferiors, if I must do so with condescension, if I must do so because I am strong and they are weak. You know the men, and the women, too, I dare say, who are respectful only to those whom they regard as their social equals or their industrial equals and of whom they are more or less afraid, who will not exercise the same amenities and the same consideration for those whom they deem beneath them. Such people do not belong in democratic society, for one thing, and, for another, their whole point of view is perverted; they are incapable of justice, because the foundation of justice is that the weakest has the same rights as the strongest. I must admit, my fellow citizens, and you can not deny—and I admit it with a certain profound regret not only but with a touch of shame—that while that is the theory of democratic institutions it is not always the practice. The weak do not always fare as well as the strong, the poor do not always get the same advantage of justice that the rich get; but that is due to the passions and imperfections of human nature. The foundation of the law, the glory of the law, is that the weakest is equal to the strongest in matters of right and privilege, and the goal to which we are constantly though stumblingly and with mistakes striving to go forward is the goal of actual equality, of actual justice, upon the basis of equality of rights, and unless you are going to establish the society of nations upon the actual foundation of equality, unless the United States is going to assume the same responsibility and just as much responsibility as the other nations of the world, we ought not to commit the mockery of going into the arrangement at all.

"I will not join in claiming under the name of justice an unjust position of privilege for the country I love and honor. Neither am I afraid of responsibility. Neither will I scuttle. Neither will I be a little American. America, in her make-up, in her purposes, in her principles, is the biggest thing in the world, and she must measure up to the measure of the world. I will be no party in belittling her. I will be no party in saying that America is afraid of responsibilities which I know she can carry and in which in carrying I am sure she shall lead the world. Why, if we were to decline to go into this humane arrangement we would be declining the invitation which all the world extends to us to lead them in the enterprise of liberty and of justice. I, for one, will not decline that invitation. I, for one, believe more profoundly than in anything else human in the destiny of the United States. I believe that she has a spiritual energy in her which no other nation can contribute to the liberation of mankind, and I know that the heart of America is stronger than her business calculations. That is what the world found out when we went into the war. When we went into the war there was not a nation in the world that did not believe we were more interested in making money out of it than in serving the cause of liberty. And when we went in, in those few months the whole world stood at amaze and ended with an enthusiastic conversion. They now believe that America will stand by anybody that is fighting for justice and for right, and we shall not disappoint them.

"The age is opening, my fellow citizens, upon a new scene. We are substituting in this covenant—and this is the main purpose of it—arbitration and discussion for war. Senator LODGE says if we can stop some wars it is worth while. If you want insurance against war, I take it you would rather have 10 per cent insurance than none; I take it that you would be delighted with 50 per cent insurance; and here I verily believe is 99 per cent insurance against war. Here are all the great fighting nations of the world, with the exception of Germany—because for the time being Germany is not a great fighting nation—solemnly covenant with one another that they will never go to war without first having either submitted the matter in dispute to arbitration and bound themselves to abide by the verdict, or, having submitted it to discussion by the council of the league of nations, in which case they will lay all the facts and documents by publication before the world, wait six months for the opinion of the council, and if they are dissatisfied with that opinion—for they are not bound by it—they will wait another three months before they go to war. There is a period of nine months of the process which is absolutely destructive of unrighteous causes—exposure to public opinion. When I find a man who in a public matter will not state his side of the case, and state it fully, I know that his side of the case is the losing side, that he dare not state it.

"At the heart of most of our industrial difficulties, my fellow citizens, and most of you are witness to this, lies the unwillingness of men to get together and talk it over. Half of the temper which now exists between those who perform labor and those who direct labor is due to the fact that those who direct labor will not talk differences over with the men whom they employ, and I am in every such instance convinced that they are wrong and dare not talk it over. Not only that, but every time the two sides do get together and talk it over they come out of the conference in a different temper from that with which they went in. There is nothing that softens the attitude of men like really, frankly laying their minds alongside of each other and their characters alongside of each other and making a fair and manly and open comparison. That is what all the great fighting nations of the world agree to with every matter of difference between them. They put it either before a jury by whom they are bound or before a jury which will publish all the facts to mankind and express a frank opinion regarding it.

"You have here what the world must have, what America went into this war to obtain. You have here an estoppel of the brutal, sudden impulse of war. You have here a restraint upon the passions of ambitious nations. You here have a safeguard of the liberty of weak nations, and the world is at last ready to stand up and in calm counsel discuss the fortunes of men and women and children everywhere. Why, my fellow citizens, nothing brings a lump into my throat quicker on this journey I am taking than to see the thronging children that are everywhere the first, just out of childish curiosity and glee no doubt, to crowd up to the train when it stops, because I know that if by any chance we should not win this great fight for the league of nations it would be their death warrant. They belong to the generation which would then have to fight the final war, and in that final war there would not be merely seven and a half million men slain. The very existence of civilization would be in the balance, and I for one dare not face the responsibility of defeating the very purpose for which we sent our gallant men overseas. Every mother knows that her pride in the son that she lost is due to the fact, not that he helped to beat Germany, but that he helped to save the world. It was that light the other people saw in the eyes of the boys that went over there, that light as of men who see a distant horizon, that light as of men who have caught the gleam and inspiration of a great cause, and the armies of the United States seemed to those people on the other side of the sea like bodies of crusaders come out of a free nation to give freedom to their fellows, ready to sacrifice their lives for an idea, for an ideal, for the only thing that is worth living for, the spiritual purpose of redemption that rests in the hearts of mankind."

PROMOTION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. HARRIS. I call up Senate resolution 203 submitted by me yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays the resolution before the Senate. It will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Department of Commerce and certain other governmental agencies in various departments and independent establishments, including the Consular Service and office of the Foreign Trade Adviser of the State Department, the War Finance Corporatoin, the Federal Reserve Board, and International High Commission in the Treasury Department, the Bureau of Markets of the Department of Agriculture, the Federal Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the United States Railroad Administration, the United States Shipping Board, and, perhaps, other agencies in other departments or establishments of the Government are, in the exercise of their lawful functions, engaged with matters having to do, either directly or indirectly, with the foreign commerce of the United States, but oftentimes work independently of each other and each without a knowledge of what any of the others may be doing in this direction; and

Whereas, in order to foster, promote, and develop the foreign commerce of the United States in the most effective manner, so as to meet successfully the competition of foreign agencies, it is essential that there should be no unnecessary work or duplication of work on the part of the aforesaid agencies of the Government, and that coordination and cooperation so essential to the successful promotion of the foreign commerce of the United States; and

Whereas it is desired by the Senate to consider the expediency of enacting legislation to provide for such coordination and cooperation of agencies: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the heads of the several departments and establishments hereinbefore referred to be, and they hereby are, requested to submit to the Senate as promptly as possible detailed statements covering the character, amount, and estimated cost to the Government of such work as is now being carried on under their respective jurisdictions which, directly or indirectly, has any relation to the foreign commerce of the United States or which may in any way be of value in connection with the promotion and development of such foreign commerce, which statements should also indicate the number of employees engaged on such work, and also to submit with such statements such suggestions and recommendations as they may be able to make looking to the closer cooperation and coordination of the various agencies of the Government for effective promotion of the foreign commerce of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, there is nothing more important to our country than its foreign commerce. Our factories, our commercial industries, our farmers, and our laborers are all interested in it. We have about a dozen different governmental agencies connected with foreign commerce, among which there is no coordination whatever, but there is a great overlapping of their work. This resolution simply directs the different departments and other governmental agencies to send information so we may know what they are accomplishing.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no doubt that there is a duplication of work in perhaps the geater number of the departments mentioned in the resolution touching our foreign commerce, but I know from past experience we will get very little information from these departments as to what they are doing in foreign commerce by way of duplication of work.

I will state to the Senator from Georgia that I have under way now an investigation of the duplication of the work of all kinds in all of the departments and independent establishments of the Government. I am not content to take the statement of the head of a department or bureau as to what activities they are carrying on in connection with any line of work. I have learned from their requests for appropriations that all deny that they are doing duplicate work in any way, shape, or form, and they believe that their particular work is the most important of all work done by the Government.

I have now under way an investigation of all the answers made by the different employees, consisting of 104,000, as to what they are doing and for what work they are being paid by the Government. When the information is tabulated and the employees of each of the departments of the Government give their story of what their work is and along what line, I mean to compare it with what the departments themselves say they are doing, not only as to their activities in connection with our foreign commerce but as to all other kinds of labor. If I can get that work completed, in a short time I expect to address the Senate on the high cost of government; and I think, if I am not greatly mistaken, I can show to the Senate of the United States that this resolution covers merely a very small part of what ought to be ascertained by Congress in order that it may know how properly to appropriate money for the future.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator how this investigation is being conducted?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I am trying to make it with the assistants which I have now, and to make it most thoroughly, by taking the statements from the reports of the departments themselves as to what they are doing along the lines of their work and also the answers from all of the employees of the Government.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is making the investigation himself and the questions and answers are being tabulated by him rather than through a commission?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no commission which has the work in charge, so far as I am concerned, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah whether he has at hand the figures showing the enormous disparity between the cost of administering the War Risk Insurance Bureau as compared with what it would be likely to cost if the work were handed over to the Pension Bureau?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not those figures.

Mr. PENROSE. I was astounded yesterday when I was informed that the disparity involved many millions of dollars and many thousand employees.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no doubt that is the case. I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that when the war ceased we thought that the number of governmental employees in the District of Columbia would be greatly and quickly reduced; no one thought otherwise than that one-half of the employees in the District of Columbia would be dispensed with; but for the month of July last was there any decrease in the number of employees in the District of Columbia? No; on the contrary, there was an increase of 1,119 employees. It is true that during the month of August there was a decrease of 258.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah—for I am very much interested in this question and I intend to submit some figures to the Senate in a few days in connection with the War Risk Bureau—why does not the Committee on Appropriations stop this wasteful expenditure for useless employees?

Mr. SMOOT. The appropriations have already been made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920; but I am quite sure the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], is going to look into the appropriations more closely for the next fiscal year than they have ever been looked into heretofore, because I have heard him so state; and I promise the Senate that I am going to do the same thing. It seems to me that an investigation ought to be made not only as to our foreign commerce, but that the investigation should extend to every department and activity of the Government.

Mr. PENROSE. I hope the Senator will permit me to suggest that I trust he will also investigate a similar matter, but one of great importance, and that is the magnitude of useless printing the Government is doing of bulletins and reports that are never read by anybody.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that since the enactment of a provision in a bill which was passed by Congress in the closing hours of the last session, the Joint Committee on Printing have stopped the printing of I do not know how many Government publications; but when we began to investigate the question, and when we collected all such publications together, we hardly had space in the committee room of the Joint Committee on Printing to take care of them.

Mr. PENROSE. I want to say—and then I am done—that there is hardly a week goes by that I do not have at least a dozen Government publications sent me by constituents in Pennsylvania asking me why such absurd publications are sent to their offices and houses.

Mr. SMOOT. The experience of the Senator from Pennsylvania is only the experience of every Member of Congress.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely wish to state that on yesterday morning two employees from The Adjutant General's office came to my office. It seems, from their statement, that the Secretary of War has issued an order requiring the clerks there to work half an hour overtime, the ostensible reason given being that the necessities of The Adjutant General's office and the different bureaus require the clerks to give this extra time. Those clerks told me very positively that they did not do more than an hour or at the outside more than two hours of real, genuine work a day, and that frequently their chiefs would come around and tell them to make a showing of being busy. They further stated that they were satisfied that this order requiring extra time, and so forth, has really been issued for the purpose of impressing Congress with the necessity of extra appropriations. I have not any doubt that these persons were telling the truth; and it discloses a condition of things that we ought to try to get at if we can possibly do so.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Washington knows, for he is a member of the Appropriations Committee——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia rose.

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. The Senator from Washington is a member of the Appropriations Committee, and he knows that no matter how much money Congress appropriates for any department of this Government—perhaps with a single, solitary exception—all of it is spent, and the heads of the departments will see that it is spent. If they can not spend it legitimately, they will employ people enough to require the expenditure of every dollar of the appropriation. One reason for that is that they think if they should happen to turn any unexpended balance back into the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year the Congress of the United States would take that as an indication that the money they had asked for was unnecessary. The departments of our Government have now gotten into a position where they not only ask for the amounts they know they have to have, but they ask for all they think they can get, with the idea that Congress is going to cut some of it out anyhow, and they will be on the safe side. That practice must be stopped.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks the resolution will occupy any considerable time? If so, I intend to ask the junior Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Utah to consent that it go over until to-morrow without prejudice.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to its going over without prejudice if the Senator from Georgia desires, and whatever I have to say further on it I will say to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. It is quite agreeable to me to let the resolution go over.

Mr. SMOOT. It is quite agreeable to me also, because I know the senior Senator from Georgia desires to have the bank bill considered, and I have no inclination whatever to interfere with the consideration of that measure.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I desire just a moment in which to say that I have been much interested in the subject that has just been under discussion, and in what has been said in regard to the Committee on Appropriations. There is a great deal of truth in the statements made. I have noted with pleasure the announcements in the newspapers that The Adjutant General of the Army has called upon his employees to add a half hour to the scant number of hours during which such employees are usually on duty. If department and bureau heads would insist that the work in their charge must be kept up to date and that their employees would have to work overtime until their work is caught up, I believe such action would in a measure overcome this soldiering on duty, with a large proportion of the employees doing as little as possible for fear of a reduction of force, or in an endeavor to make the work in hand last as long as possible.

The Committee on Appropriations is surrounded by a great many uncertainties and difficulties. During the war we were, of course, all anxious to win; we asked but few questions, and acted quickly in appropriating all the money thought necessary for war purposes, no matter how fabulous the sums might be. As a consequence, there has been built up, or at least enlarged, a system of appropriating lump sums for various kinds of employment. Of course, there are many old and faithful employees who perform their duties with interest in the affairs of their department and with lively interest, also, in the affairs of the Nation at large. But because of the greatly increased work in the departments during the war, the departments have taken on, from the byways, highways, and hedges, great numbers of boys and girls unused to such service, unused to real labor along any line, and, more particularly, unused to office responsibility and work such as required in these Government departments. And among such employees in particular, and among some of the older employees as well—although I will not say employees of the Government generally—I must acknowledge, as stated by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and as observed by me personally, very little is accomplished for the good of the Government in what they term the day's work. I believe that many of the clerks in the large departments are not doing more than from a quarter to a half of the work they are supposed to do, which they ought to do, and which we have a right to expect them to do.

With the war over, the cleaning-up time is at hand, and it is a tedious matter to unravel all of the changes to which the ordinary line of good conduct has been subjected.

It is true that some of the departments need a generous line of employees in order to get war matters closed up and affairs put back into the natural level.

Congress and the people of the country expect, of course, that the majority of the thousands and tens of thousands of extra clerks will go back to their homes or into other lines of employment. But against this is the fear on the part of the departments that their employees may become too few, and the hope on the part of many of the employees that by droning along and doing as little as possible they may prolong their own tenure of office along with that of their many associates, apparently without thought or care regarding the immense cost to the Government—to the taxpayers. Indeed, it ofttimes seems as though many of the employees, and, I regret to say, their chiefs as well, whose desire seems to be to hold their employees as long as possible in fear that it may be said, in case of reductions of force, that the work and importance of their bureaus are retrograding, are leagued together in the thought that the Government is made of money; that if it runs short it has only to order more money printed at the bureau, and that economy in governmental affairs is by no means necessary but, on the other hand, out of date and old-fashioned.

It has been our hope, as members of the Appropriations Committee, that the joint commission investigating the salaries of Government employees would be able at an early date to furnish us with the information we need for the purpose of establishing proper salary bases for Government employees. We hope that we may learn through the questionnaires which, I understand, have been sent out to both employers and employees—that is to say, to heads and chiefs of divisions and to each and every employee—how many employees, and of what grade, are in each bureau of each department, and what recommendations may be made as to reasonable salaries for each class. After we receive such knowledge, we may then provide for more stated, statutory places—unless lump-sum and emergency employees are to be continued, with the incident hullabaloo and tangle in which we find ourselves when we attempt to determine what employees are really needed in each department and what the line of wages and salaries should be.

It is the desire of the Appropriations Committee to furnish every department with sufficient employees to do its work, and to pay sufficient wages or salaries for the classes of work assigned to them, and then to insist in return that we have less shirking and complaining on the part of the employees, and more real interest in their work. In other words, we want to pay due wages and salaries for each day's work, but we want some showing and some accomplishment registered in the day's work of every employee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in that connection, if I may have just a moment of time, I desire to say there is a new system growing up in the departments which I should like to see stopped at once. Hardly a new clerk is appointed who receives a salary over $2,000 in any of the departments who does not request that he be given a messenger. If you go to the departments you will see herds of messengers in the hallways. Instead of having a central head for the messenger service in each of the departments, clerks now must have a special messenger. I simply throw this suggestion out now, because I understand that the Navy Department have under investigation at the present time a plan of bringing under one head the messenger service of that department so that whenever a messenger is wanted the one calling for the messenger will know just where to call for him. If that plan is carried out I expect to see the number of messengers in the Navy Department reduced two-thirds at least. That policy ought to be carried out in every department of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the resolution went over, I understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has been no request made of the Chair that the resolution shall go over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood that there was a request that it go over without prejudice until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There may have been some discussion on the floor of the Senate to that effect, but there has been no such request made of the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The junior Senator from Georgia stated that such action would be agreeable to him. I request that it go over.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that the resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks that the resolution go over until to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will go over.

CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. McLEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration——

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator permit me to submit a conference report?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to House bill 8624, the so-called food-control bill, embodying also the bill regulating rentals in the District of Columbia. I had intended to ask for the consideration of the conference report at this time, but as it is a measure of very great importance, especially to the people of the District of Columbia, I ask that it lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the matter is of such very great importance that I should like to have the conference report read now, so that Senators may be informed as to what the provisions of the report are. I make this request because I have understood through the public prints that the provisions of the so-called rent bill have been substantially revised and rewritten.

Mr. GRONNA. That is true.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Dakota about how long it will take to read the conference report?

Mr. GRONNA. It will not take very long, I will say to the Senator; it is a very short report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report will lie on the table for the present.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8624) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' approved August 10, 1917," having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "Section 1"; and, on page 1, after line 2, of the engrossed bill, insert the following:

"That this act may be cited as 'the food control and the District of Columbia rents act.'

"TITLE I. FOOD-CONTROL ACT AMENDMENTS."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"TITLE II. DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA RENTS.

"SEC. 101. When used in this title, unless the context indicates otherwise—

"The term 'rental property' means any land or building or part thereof in the District of Columbia rented or hired and the service agreed or required by law or by determination of the commission to be furnished in connection therewith; but does not include a hotel or apartment.

"The term 'person' includes an individual, partnership, association, or corporation.

"The term 'hotel' or 'apartment' means any hotel or apartment or part thereof, in the District of Columbia, rented or hired and the land and outbuildings appurtenant thereto, and the service agreed or required by law or by determination of the commission to be furnished in connection therewith.

"The term 'owner' includes a lessor or sublessor, or other person entitled to receive rent or charges for the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel or apartment, or any interest therein, or his agent.

"The term 'tenant' includes a subtenant, lessee, sublessee, or other person, not the owner, entitled to the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel, or apartment.

"The term 'service' includes the furnishing of light, heat, water, telephone or elevator service, furniture, furnishings, window shades, screens, awnings, storage, kitchen, bath and laundry facilities and privileges, maid service, janitor service, removal of refuse, making all repairs suited to the type of building or necessitated by ordinary wear and tear, and any other privilege or service connected with the use or occupancy of any rental property, apartment, or hotel.

"The term 'commission' means the rent commission of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 102. A commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the rent commission of the District of Columbia, which shall be composed of three commissioners, none of whom shall be, directly or indirectly, engaged in, or in any manner interested in or connected with, the real estate or renting business in the District of Columbia. The commissioners shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The term of each commissioner shall be three years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he succeeds. The commission shall at the time of its organization and annually thereafter elect a chairman from its own membership. The commission may make such regulations as may be necessary to carry this title into effect.

"All powers and duties of the commission may be exercised by a majority of its members. A vacancy in the commission shall not impair the right of the remaining commissioners to exercise all the powers of the commission. The commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed.

"SEC. 103. Each commissioner shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year, payable monthly. The commission shall appoint a secretary, who shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year, payable in like manner; and, subject to the provisions of the civil-service laws, it may appoint and remove such officers, employees, and agents and make such expenditures for rent, printing, telegrams, telephone, law books, books of reference, periodicals, furniture, stationery, office equipment, and other supplies and expenses as may be necessary to the administration of this title. All of the expenditures of the commission shall upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor, approved by the chairman of the commission, be audited and paid in the same manner as other expenditures for the District of Columbia.

"With the exception of the secretary, all employees of the commission shall be appointed from lists of eligibles supplied by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the civil-service law.

"SEC. 104. The assessor of the District of Columbia shall serve ex officio as an advisory assistant to the commission, but he shall have none of the powers or duties of a commissioner. He shall attend the meetings and hearings of the commission. Every officer or employee of the United States or of the District of Columbia, whenever requested by the commission, shall supply to the commission any data or information pertaining to the administration of this title which may be contained in the records of his office. The assessor shall receive for the performance of the duties required by this section a salary of $1,000 per annum, payable monthly, in addition to such other salary as may be prescribed for his office by law.

"SEC. 105. For the purposes of this title the commission or any officer, employee, or agent duly authorized in writing by it, shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy, any books, accounts, records, papers, or correspondence relating to any matter which the commission is authorized to consider or investigate; and the commission shall have power to require by subpœna the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all such books, accounts, records, papers, and correspondence relating to any such matter. Any member of the commission may sign subpœnas, administer oaths and affirmations, examine witnesses, and receive evidence.

"Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such books, accounts, records, papers, and correspondence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. In case of disobedience to a subpœna or of the contumacy of any witness appearing before the commission, the commission may invoke the aid of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or of any district court of the United States. Such court may thereupon issue an order requiring the person subpœnaed to obey the subpœna, or to give evidence touching the matter in question. Any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. No officer or employee of the commission shall, unless authorized by the commission or by a court of competent jurisdiction, make public any information obtained by the commission.

"SEC. 106. For the purpose of this title it is declared that all (a) rental property and (b) apartments and hotels are affected with a public interest, and that all rents and charges therefor, all service in connection therewith, and all other terms and conditions of the use or occupancy thereof, shall be fair and reasonable; and any unreasonable or unfair provision of a lease or other contract for the use or occupancy of such rental property, apartment, or hotel with respect to such rents, charges, service, terms, or conditions is hereby declared to be contrary to public policy. The commission upon its own initiative may, or upon complaint shall, determine whether the rent, charges, service, and other terms or conditions of a lease or other contract for the use or occupancy of any such rental property, hotel, or apartment are fair and reasonable. Such complaints may be made (a) by or on behalf of any tenant, and (b) by any owner except where the tenant is in possession under a lease or other contract the term specified in which has not expired, and the fairness and reasonableness of which has not been determined by the commission.

"In all such cases the commission shall give notice personally or by registered mail and afford an opportunity to be heard to all parties in interest. The commission shall promptly hear and determine the issues involved in all complaints submitted to it. All hearings before the commission shall be open to the public. If the commission determines that such rents, charges, service, or other terms or conditions are unfair or unreasonable, it shall determine and fix such fair and reasonable rent or charges therefor, and / or fair and reasonable service, terms, and conditions of use or occupancy. In any suit in any court of the United States or the District of Columbia involving any question arising out of the relation of landlord and tenant with respect to any rental property, apartment, or hotel, except on appeal from the commission's determination as provided in this title, such court shall determine the rights and duties of the parties in accordance with the determination and regulations of the commission relevant thereto.

"SEC. 107. A determination of the commission fixing a fair and reasonable rent or charge made in a proceeding begun by complaint shall be effective from the date of the filing of the complaint. The difference between the amount of rent and charges paid for the period from the filing of the complaint to the date of the commission's determination and the amount that would have been payable for such period at the fair and reasonable rate fixed by the commission may be added to or subtracted from, as the case demands, future rent payments, or after the final decision of an appeal from the commission's determination may be sued for and recovered in an action in the municipal court of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 108. Unless within 10 days after the filing of the commission's determination any party to the complaint appeals therefrom to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, the determination of the commission shall be final and conclusive. If such an appeal is taken from the determination of the commission, the record before the commission, or such part thereof as the court may order, shall be certified by it to the court and shall constitute the record before the court, and the commission's determination shall not be modified or set aside by the court except for error of law. If any party applies to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shows to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceeding before the commission, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the commission and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as the court may deem proper. The commission may modify its findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which shall be conclusive, and its recommendations, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original determination, with the return of such additional evidence. In the proceedings before such court on appeal from a determination of the commission, the commission shall appear by its counsel or other representative and submit oral or written arguments to support the findings and the determination of the commission.

"SEC. 109. The right of a tenant to the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel, or apartment, existing at the time this act takes effect, or thereafter acquired, under any lease or other contract for such use or occupancy or under any extension thereof by operation of law, shall, notwithstanding the expiration of the term fixed by such lease or contract, continue at the option of the tenant, subject, however, to any determination or regulation of the commission relevant thereto; and such tenant shall not be evicted or dispossessed so long as he pays the rent and performs the other terms and conditions of the tenancy as fixed by such lease or contract, or in case such lease or contract is modified by any determination or regulation of the commission, then as fixed by such modified lease or contract. All remedies of the owner at law or equity, based on any provision of any such lease or contract to the effect that such lease or contract shall be determined or forfeited if the premises are sold, are hereby suspended so long as this title is in force. Every purchaser shall take conveyance of any rental property, hotel, or apartment subject to the rights of tenants as provided in this title. The rights of the tenants under this title shall be subject to the limitation that the bona fide owner of any rental property, apartment, or hotel shall have the right to possession thereof for actual and bona fide occupancy by himself, or his wife, children, or dependents, upon giving 30 days' notice in writing, served in the manner provided by section 1223 of the act entitled 'An act to establish a code of laws for the District of Columbia,' approved May 3, 1901, as amended, which notice shall contain a full and correct statement of the facts and circumstances upon which the same is based; but in no case shall possession be demanded or obtained by such owner in contravention of the terms of any such lease or contract. If there is a dispute between the owner and the tenant as to the accuracy or sufficiency of the statement set forth in such notice as to the good faith of such demand or as to the service of notice, the matters in dispute shall be determined by the commission upon complaint as provided in section 106 of this title.

"SEC. 110. Pending the final decision on appeal from a determination of the commission the commission's determination shall be in full force and effect, and the appeal shall not operate as a supersedeas or in any manner stay or postpone the enforcement of the determination appealed from. Immediately upon the entry of a final decision on the appeal the commission shall, if necessary, modify its determination in order to make it conform to such decision. The difference, if any, between the amount of rent and charges paid for the period from the date of the filing by the commission of the determination appealed from and the amount that would have been payable for such period under the determination as modified in accordance with the final decision on appeal may be added to or allowed on account of, as the case demands, future rent payments or may be sued for and recovered in an action in the municipal court in the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 111. The determination of the commission in a proceeding begun by complaint or upon its own initiative fixing fair and reasonable rents, charges, service, and other terms and conditions of use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel, or apartment shall constitute the commission's determination of the fairness and reasonableness of such rents, charges, service, terms, or conditions for the rental property, hotel, or apartment affected, and shall remain in full force and effect notwithstanding any change in ownership or tenacy thereof, unless and until the commission modifies or sets aside such determination upon complaint either of the owner or of the tenant.

"SEC. 112. If the owner of any rental property, apartment, or hotel collects any rent or charge therefor in excess of the amount fixed in a determination of the commission made and in full force and effect in accordance with the provisions of this title, he shall be liable for and the commission is hereby authorized and directed to commence an action in the municipal court in the District of Columbia to recover double the amount of such excess, together with the costs of the proceeding, which shall include an attorney's fee of $50, to be taxed as part of the costs. Out of any sums received on account of such recovery the commission shall pay over to the tenant the amount of the excess so paid by him and the balance shall be paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia: Provided, That if the commission finds that such excess was paid by the tenant voluntarily and with knowledge of the commission's determination, the whole amount of such recovery shall be paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 113. If in any proceeding before the commission, begun by complaint or on the commission's own initiative, and involving any lease or other contract for the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel, or apartment the commission finds that at any time after the passage of this act but during the tenancy the owner has, directly or indirectly, willfully withdrawn from the tenant any service agreed or required by a determination of the commission to be furnished, or has by act, neglect, or omission contrary to such lease or contract or to the law or any ordinance or regulation made in pursuance of law, or of a determination of the commission, exposed the tenant, directly or indirectly, to any unsafe or insanitary condition or imposed upon him any burden, loss, or unusual inconvenience in connection with his use or occupancy of such rental property, hotel, or apartment, the commission shall determine the sum which in its judgment will fairly and reasonably compensate or reimburse the tenant therefor. In any such proceeding involving a lease or other contract, the term specified in which had not expired at the time the proceeding was begun, the commission shall likewise determine the amount or value of any bonus or other consideration in excess of the rental named in such lease or contract received at any time directly or indirectly by the owner in connection with such lease or contract. The tenant may recover any amount so determined by the commission in an action in the municipal court of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 114. Whenever under this title a tenant is entitled to bring suit to recover any sum due him under any determination of the commission, the commission shall, upon application by the tenant and without expense to him, commence and prosecute in the municipal court of the District of Columbia an action on behalf of the tenant for the recovery of the amount due, and in such case the court shall include in any judgment rendered in favor of the tenant the costs of the action, including a reasonable attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court. Such costs and attorney's fee when recovered shall be paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 115. The commission shall, by general order, from time to time prescribe the procedure to be followed in all proceedings under its jurisdiction. Such procedure shall be as simple and summary as may be practicable, and the commission and parties appearing before it shall not be bound by technical rules of evidence or of pleading.

"SEC. 116. Any person who with intent to avoid the provisions of this title enters into any agreement or arrangement for the payment of any bonus or other consideration in connection with any lease or other contract for the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel, or apartment, or who participates in any fictitious sale or other device or arrangement the purpose of which is to grant or obtain the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel, or apartment without subjecting such use or occupancy to the provisions of this title or to the jurisdiction of the commission shall upon conviction be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding one year or by both.

"SEC. 117. The commission shall prescribe standard forms of leases and other contracts for the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel, or apartment and shall require their use by the owner thereof. Every such lease or contract entered into after the commission has prescribed and promulgated a form for the tenancy provided by such lease or contract shall be deemed to accord with such standard form; and any such lease or contract in any proceeding before the commission or in any court of the United States or of the District of Columbia shall be interpreted, applied, and enforced in the same manner as if it were in the form and contained the stipulations of such standard form. Upon the request of the commission the owner of an hotel or apartment shall file with the commission plans and other data in such detail as the commission requires, descriptive of the rooms, accommodations, and service in connection with such hotel or apartment, and a schedule of rates and charges therefor. The commission may, after consideration of such plans, schedules, data, or other information, determine and fix a schedule of fair and reasonable rates and charges for such hotel or apartment; and the rates and charges stated in such schedule shall thereafter constitute the fair and reasonable rates and charges for such hotel or apartment. The commission's determination in such case shall be made after such notice and hearing and shall have the same force and effect and be subject to appeal in the same manner as a determination of the commission under section 106 of this title.

"SEC. 118. No tenant shall assign his lease of or sublet any rental property or apartment at a rate in excess of the rate paid by him under his lease without the consent of the commission upon application in a particular case, and in such case the commission shall determine a fair and reasonable rate of rent or charge for such assignment or sublease.

"SEC. 119. The public resolution entitled 'Joint resolution to prevent profiteering in the District of Columbia,' approved May 31, 1918, as amended, is hereby repealed, to take effect 60 days after the date of the confirmation by the Senate of the commissioners first nominated by the President under the provisions of this title; but a determination by the commission made within such period of 60 days shall be enforced in accordance with the provisions of this title, notwithstanding the provisions of such public resolution. All laws or parts of laws in conflict with any provision of this title are hereby suspended so long as this title is in force to the extent that they are in such conflict.

"SEC. 120. The sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated and made immediately available to carry out the provisions of this title, one-half thereof to be paid out of money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated and the other one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 121. If any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this title shall be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder thereof, but shall be confined in its operations to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

"SEC. 122. It is hereby declared that the provisions of this title are made necessary by emergencies growing out of the war with the Imperial German Government, resulting in rental conditions in the District of Columbia dangerous to the public health and burdensome to public officers and employees whose duties require them to reside within the District and other persons whose activities are essential to the maintenance and comfort of such officers and employees, and thereby embarrassing the Federal Government in the transaction of the public business. It is also declared that this title shall be considered temporary legislation, and that it shall terminate on the expiration of three years from the date of the passage of this act, unless sooner repealed."

And the Senate agrees to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows. In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"To amend an act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' approved August 10, 1917, and to regulate rents in the District of Columbia."

And the Senate agree to the same.

A. J. GRONNA,
G. W. NORRIS,
HOKE SMITH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
G. N. HAUGEN,
J. C. MCLAUGHLIN,
THOMAS L. RUBEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 190, House bill 7478.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 23, after the word "section," it is proposed to insert the following:

The total liabilities to any association of any person, corporation, firm, or company, or the several members thereof, upon the discount of bills of exchange, drafts, demand obligations, and commercial or business paper, as described in "(1)" and "(2)" hereof, shall not exceed at any time the paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus of said association.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who are attending the session of the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] are detained from the Senate by illness in their families. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] are detained on official business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I discussed this question on yesterday, and I do not expect to occupy the time of the Senate except to state very briefly the purpose of the amendment.

Under this bill as it now stands, by virtue of the amendment which was adopted on yesterday, a borrower, instead of getting 10 per cent of the capital and surplus on his note, can now get 25 per cent of the capital and surplus, provided it is secured by shipping documents. In other words, the Senate and the House have voted to increase the amount that this borrower can get with the aid of these documents 150 per cent. Under paragraph "(4)," and under the ruling of the Comptroller of the Currency, a borrower can get on Government bonds $100 out of the capital, surplus, and deposits of the bank, less legal reserves, for every $105 of Government bonds or certificates of indebtedness which he presents. This privilege is unlimited, except, of course, the bank must retain its legal reserves. Under paragraphs "(1)" and "(2)," on drafts or bills of exchange drawn against existing values, he can now secure the entire contents of the vaults of the bank, less legal reserves. The purpose of my amendment is to limit the amount that he can get under the provisions known as paragraphs "(1)" and "(2)" to an amount equal to the capital and surplus; and it seems to me that in safe banking that is as much as he ought to be permitted to get.

That is all I care to say, Mr. President.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, if adopted, will change the law that has been in operation for many years. If it is adopted, I make the prediction that no small country bank will join the Federal Reserve System; and I had supposed that one of the main purposes of that act was to invite small country banks into the system.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who has not voted. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who has not voted, but I am relieved from that pair on this vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 59, as follows:

YEAS—18.

Borah	Kenyon	Norris	Sherman
Chamberlain	La Follette	Nugent	Wadsworth
Gerry	Lenroot	Phelan	Warren
Harding	McCormick	Phipps

Johnson, Calif.	Nelson	Smith, S. C.

So Mr. POMERENE'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, believing that the Senate should have an opportunity to vote upon this bill, I voted to report it. I am opposed to the bill, however. It proposes to give the country banks an extension of their facilities for discounting drafts. That is one of the purposes of the bill. Practically the object is to enable the cotton producers of the South——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New Jersey inadvertently used the phrase "country banks." The Senator does not mean that the bill gives any special privileges to the country banks.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No.

Mr. GRONNA. It gives the same privileges to all banks.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. To all banks, but practically the effect of it is to enlarge the facilities for loaning on drafts by the smaller banks of the country.

I have a great sympathy with the producer of cotton in the South, in the problems that he has in financing the cotton, in transporting it, carrying it to market, and making the necessary financial arrangements to ship the cotton. This bill is ostensibly for that purpose.

I understand that heretofore under the Federal reserve system a country bank having $50,000 capital and $10,000 surplus was enabled to recognize drafts from a country buyer to the extent of 10 per cent of its capital and surplus. Under the present provision that buyer is enabled to draw drafts against that country bank for $12,500, thereby extending the credit to that extent. When the Federal reserve bank act was originally drawn it was deemed in the interests of conservatism that 10 per cent should be the limit. The South has probably had many difficulties in financing its cotton crop, but it has financed it, and the question before the Senate is to determine whether we want to depart from that conservative policy of the Federal reserve banking system and extend these facilities practically 150 per cent. I am opposed to it because I believe that in this time of inflation it is unwise, and with the experience I have had with regard to the financing of the southern cotton crop, I believe that it is unnecessary.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall vote against this bill. I believe it an unsafe measure. I do not believe that safe banking permits any institution to loan 25 per cent of its capital and surplus to one man or one business concern, even if it is secured by property having an estimated value of 115 per cent.

It is not simply a question, as the Senator from New Jersey said, of drawing drafts. It is an enlargement of the law, and permits a bank to loan 25 per cent of its capital and surplus if secured by shipping documents, warehouse receipts, or other such documents securing title to readily marketable, nonperishable staples, including livestock. That amount of business can not be safely transacted by the banks of this country to the extent of a quarter of all their assets, including their surplus.

The soundness of national banks in this country has been very well established during previous years. Very few of them have failed, because the restrictions have been well advised, and the bankers themselves have observed them. If this bill is passed the best bankers of this country will not follow its provisions, but the imprudent ones will. Good banking will not recognize such a law, and poor banking ought not to be encouraged.

This is not a time for further inflation of credits in this country. The inflation that has occurred, which is to-day imperiling the business interests of the entire world, and increasing the cost of living to the maximum, comes not alone from the inflation of the currency, but enormous inflation of credits. The very large amounts that we borrowed during the war caused inflation, and every time we touch the Federal reserve banking system we permit an increase of currency, an increase of credit, and produce a greater expansion.

Mr. McLEAN. If the bill permitted the increase of a dollar of currency in the country, I should vote against it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not say it did.

Mr. McLEAN. If it increased or expanded the credits of the country one dollar, I should vote against it. It does neither. The bill simply provides for a redistribution of credits already in the vaults of the banks. If a bank has reserves which will permit it to loan, we will say, $30,000, and it can not loan more than $7,000, it must send those reserves to some large bank and that large bank will take toll; but there is no expansion of credit to the amount of one dollar.

Mr. KELLOGG. Sending it to other banks spreads the danger of loss, and the very object of the provision in the present law is to distribute the risk among a large number of banks. I live in a country where enormous sums of money are required to move crops in a few months. The same situation exists in the South with regard to the cotton crop. We move in the Northwest not only grain crops in a few months, but stock, and yet it has been accomplished by spreading the risks over more banks. The South can manage in the same way, but if they want their banks to do all the business and loan all the money, of course they will seek an unlimited credit.

There are banks enough and credit enough in the country to handle all the crops, and I think it is an exceedingly dangerous innovation. It is only the entering wedge. If we make it 25 per cent, they will subsequently contend that 50 per cent is just as safe if it is secured. We might just as well provide that the entire capital may be loaned to one concern if the loan is secured. That is not good banking and it is not good business for the country. Of course, this does not extend the circulating medium—that is, currency—but it permits an undue expansion of the credits in particular banks, which makes it unsafe.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARDING in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. KELLOGG. It makes it unsafe in any community which has an opportunity to loan all the money. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. It simply provides that if a bank has $30,000 to loan, it can loan it to three persons instead of ten, if the security is good. In many of the small towns in the South there may be only one bank. Assume that it is a financially strong bank and a cotton buyer goes there and wants an accommodation of $15,000. The bank's capital is $50,000. Under the law as it is at present——

Mr. KELLOGG. He can not get it.

Mr. McLEAN. No; he can not get it, but what does he do? He goes to the bank across the street, if it is a State bank, which has a limit of 25 per cent and there he gets accommodation. Why should the national banks be discriminated against and why should not they be permitted, if their customer is a good one and there is only one customer, to loan to him 25 per cent if it is secured by cotton?

Mr. KELLOGG. By the same course of reasoning they ought to be permitted to loan the entire amount. The basic principle of the Federal reserve banking system is to keep the banks safe for the whole community and not for the benefit of one or two men who want to borrow the entire capital and surplus of a bank. It is a fact that national banks have maintained their soundness because they have followed the law. That is one of the reasons why it seems to me we ought not to enact the present bill.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, some fear has been expressed that the banks will lose money on cotton. If I may be excused from a personal allusion, I will state that over 20 years ago I organized and built the second bonded warehouse in South Carolina in which to store cotton. In 1900 I organized a bank, and I have been president of both of those institutions ever since. We have handled thousands and thousands of bales of cotton and have never lost a dollar on cotton yet. Not only that, but I do not recall that any bank in our country, and we handle great quantities of cotton down there, of course, has lost a dollar on a bale of cotton in the last 20 years. When cotton was bringing 6 and 7 cents a pound it did not take very much money to handle it, but now it is bringing 30 cents a pound and it takes considerably more money to handle it. The same way with bacon. A few years ago it only brought, 6, 7, and 8 cents, and now it is bringing several times this amount. We buy that from the West. It is the same way with horses and mules; we buy those from Indiana and Kentucky and ship them in. Instead of being worth $100, as they were a few years ago, they are bringing $300, $400, and $500. It is the same way with wheat and corn. So it takes a greater amount of credit to handle the commerce of the country, and that is the reason why we want this limit extended.

Mr. KELLOGG. The very fact that products are very high adds to the risk instead of taking it away.

Mr. DIAL. That, of course, takes more money, but the protection of the bank is in the good judgment of the officers of the bank. Under any law the officers of the bank do not have to loan to the limit to which they are authorized to loan. That depends upon their good judgment. Then, too, if they have the security there, that can readily be turned into cash.

This bill, as I understand it, is not so much a matter of permission to make permanent loans, or loans for long periods of time. It is more in the nature of a loan to aid products in transit.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DIAL. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course, if it is true that it requires more money for the merchant to do a given amount of business, it also by that same token would require more capital and surplus for the banks to do the same amount of business. Is not that true?

Mr. DIAL. That is correct.

Mr. POMERENE. If that be true, and of course it is, then it must follow that when you double or treble the amount of money which a given borrower can get from a bank, you are by that much increasing the risk which the bank runs when it extends the accommodation.

Mr. DIAL. Of course, the bank would not want to loan a big amount to one customer, but it is merely a matter of caring for the product while it is in transit, while it is being turned into cash. It is merely to help the producer get his commodities to market.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I shall not occupy further the time of the Senate on the bill except to ask the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge one or two questions. He stated that the bill would not result in an expansion of credit. I should like to ask the Senator whether it would result in a curtailment of credit?

Mr. McLEAN. Certainly it would.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator then said that the banks have these credits in their vaults.

Mr. McLEAN. If they call them in, they would have them in their vaults.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. Then if the credits were in their vaults, and calling them in would result in a curtailment of credits, I can not see why putting them out of their vaults does not result in expansion.

Mr. McLEAN. It does not affect the total reserves upon which credits can be based. Credits will be called in to-day and loaned out to-morrow. You have simply exchanged the credits; taken them from one borrower and given them to another.

Mr. LENROOT. It is the assumption upon the part of the Senator that all the credits of the bank are utilized which the law permits them to utilize, but it is an assumption that does not rest upon any basis of fact. The fact is that wherever banks have a larger reserve than the minimum required by the law, and if the passage of the pending bill permits the extension of a larger line of credit than is now permitted, you have exactly to that extent expanded the credits of the country, and you can not get away from it.

As the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] very clearly stated, the bill is not alone an expansion of credits relating to drafts and bills of exchange, but under the bill a man may borrow money upon his own property, concerning which there has never been a sale or contract of sale, up to 25 per cent of the capital and surplus of the bank. The result of it is going to be, Mr. President, that it will permit the owners of cotton to speculate in cotton by borrowing from the bank 90 per cent of the then market value of the cotton, and if the speculation is not in the interest of the owner, the bank will be left holding the bag and suffering the loss. It ought not to be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to repeat what I said upon the bill when it was under consideration about a week ago. I have always felt that for the safety of business our banking business and banking institutions should be upon the most conservative plane possible. I feel that the bill as reported and now before the Senate to be voted upon is extending a power for banks to make loans that should not be granted to them.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows that in the State of Utah the State banks are allowed single lines of credit to the amount of 30 per cent of their capital and surplus.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator does not know any such thing.

Mr. McLEAN. That is my recollection.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is mistaken. There is a limit on the amount that can be loaned to any person or corporation to 15 per cent.

Mr. McLEAN. Will the Senator state what the limit is?

Mr. SMOOT. The percentage allowed is 15 per cent of the capital and surplus.

Mr. McLEAN. It has been changed very recently, in my opinion.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I think that is as much as any bank ought to be allowed to loan to one person or corporation. In fact, I am rather inclined to believe that the banking laws as they have existed ever since the national banking system was established, namely, limiting such loans to 10 per cent, is safe and conservative banking.

As I said, the conservative bankers of the country are not going to take advantage of this law. They are not going to change the system under which they have loaned in the past, and they are the bankers who would say that the bill is unwise. The trouble is that the bankers who will take advantage of it will be those who will rely upon receiving assistance from some other banks to carry them through in case trouble came. To what extent it will be used in the country I can not say, but I am quite sure that it will happen that the weaker banks are the very banks that will take advantage of the change. Those that are not doing a conservative banking business to-day will claim that the Congress of the United States has placed its approval upon their past policy.

I presume the bill will pass. I am not going to take any more of the time of the Seante upon it, but I wish to say that I can not quite agree with the Senator having the bill in charge that it is not going to inflate the currency of the country. Whenever there is more money wanted in any one section of the country, and whenever that money is furnished, I care not from what source—I am speaking now of the sources within the United States—it will decrease the volume of money in the section furnishing the money, which, no doubt, will be in great banking centers, and to replace it an additional issue of Federal reserve notes will be requested, and when issued there will be an inflation of the currency to that amount.

Mr. McLEAN. They are not permitted to do it under this bill. The Senator knows this bill does not affect section 13 of the Federal reserve act, which limits the right of rediscount to 10 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware of that, but what I am contending is that if there is a call for this money which it is said this bill is intended to furnish the money has got to come from some other source than the banks of the South, we will say, or from the banks of the West. The whole object of the bill is to increase the indebtedness of the individual to the banks in certain sections of country, and when the individual credit is increased the bank that has not the money to meet same must secure the money from some other section of the country. These banks will appeal to the banks with which they are doing business in New York or Chicago or St. Louis, or the other banking centers of the United States. As that credit is extended there is no question that it will produce an increase in the currency of our country.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, if my information is correct, the banks of the South have all the cash they want in order to finance the cotton crop. All they want is an opportunity to use it. In many towns there is only one buyer of cotton and only one bank, and that condition simply forces the buyer to go to some other town or to New York to get his credit.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator now that if he will examine the last bank statement as to the condition of the banks of the South he will find that to-day very many of them are rediscounting paper. No bank ever rediscounts paper unless it requires more money to loan than it has either from its capital, surplus, or deposits. The rediscounting of paper, the Senator will find, is going on in nearly all sections of the country, and particularly during the time crops are being financed.

Mr. McLEAN. They are not rediscounting such paper under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am not saying that; but this bill proposes to grant the banks the right to loan their customers a greater amount than can be loaned under existing law. It is for that reason that I say that the proposed increase of power as to the loaning of depositors' money is, in my opinion, too great. For that reason I am going to vote against the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I will say only a word. This bill originated with the Federal Reserve Board; it did not originate anywhere else. It was suggested by the Federal Reserve Board after a study of conditions which led them to the conclusion that it was important that the bill should be passed to facilitate the national banks in the smaller towns in themselves transacting the business required instead of having it go to the larger cities. That does not mean to New York. Take my own State, for example, they would go to Atlanta; they would not go to New York. The smaller national banks were handicapped in their work. Under this bill they can make the advances, limited to six months, upon goods that are to be turned over at once; goods that usually do not last in the warehouse 30 days. They can handle the transaction locally, and if they have not all the money they want, instead of sending the borrower to the city of Atlanta, the local bank itself does the business, and goes to the city of Atlanta and gets there the credit if it needs it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator give the information as to whether all the members of the Federal Reserve Board favored this measure?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So far as I understand; yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I doubt that very much.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that it came with the unanimous recommendation of the Federal Reserve Board. It originated with them; it went to the House; it was studied by the House Committee on Banking and Currency, was adopted by them, and passed by the House. The bill then came here, and, after hearing Gov. Harding discuss it fully, the Senate committee approved it. I know nothing about the origin of the bill; I know nothing about it except what I have heard from Gov. Harding and what I have learned from a few letters from small national banks urging its value to them.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, every time we get a recommendation from the Federal Reserve Board it is for expansion, for additional power to issue money and to discount. That is one of the very reasons I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not true that there is a great deal of curtailment in the amount of Federal reserve notes now? Are they not being reduced?

Mr. KELLOGG. They are right now; but there has not been from the time the law was enacted up to the present time. We have passed two or three laws in the last three years that give them an opportunity to increase the circulating medium.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota knows that there is a remedy at hand which the Federal Reserve Board can use at any time if they want to contract the currency.

Mr. KELLOGG. I know there is; but they will not use it.

Mr. McLEAN. That is not the fault of this bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. They do not use it; they are always coming here asking for legislation to give them an opportunity to expand. There is not a part of this country that can not, by spreading its credits over the country generally, handle the crops; but when a section of the country which produces one great staple like wheat or cotton wishes to finance the entire crop in one local community, of course, it can not be done; and it is not safe to do it. It ought to be spread over the country. That is the object of having the restriction upon national banks.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in relation to the aggregate of Federal reserve notes outstanding, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that they now amount to $2,875,259,000. That was the report on September 29. So they are not decreasing the circulation very rapidly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it would be very dangerous for them to do so now.

Mr. SMOOT. That is another question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said the tendency was now toward curtailment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator state what the amount was a year ago?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from New York that the amount last year was $2,869,330,550.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was a year ago?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it was just about the same as it is now.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KELLOGG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

So the bill was passed.

RAILROADS IN ALASKA.

Mr. NEW. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7417.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7417) to amend an act of Congress approved March 12, 1914, authorizing the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, this bill amending the act of March 12, 1914, carries with it an authorization for an appropriation of $17,000,000 additional, which is necessary for the completion of 601 miles of railroad in Alaska, the construction of which was undertaken under the original act. Thirty-five million dollars was appropriated in the original act, all of which has now been expended, except a balance of a very little in excess of $2,000,000 on the 1st of August of this year, and that $2,000,000 will have been expended by the end of this building season, which has really been reached at this time.

There are 2,500 men at present engaged in work along the line of the road. The main line, which runs from Seward, Alaska, to Fairbanks, Alaska, is a little over 400 miles in length. In addition to that line, there are branches of varying lengths—one to Matanuska, one to Chatanika, and one to Chena—aggregating, with sidetracks and switches, nearly 200 miles. Most of the work on the two ends of the main line has been done. They began at Seward, on the south, and built north 265 miles. Most of that work is completed. Then they began at Fairbanks, on the northern end, and built south to mile 365, and the most of that work is completed; but on the 100 miles between mile 265 and mile 365 nothing at all has been done beyond the work of surveying and clearing the right of way. The cost of the road to date exceeds the estimate by about 31 per cent; and the committee felt that, in view of the great increase in the cost of material and the cost of labor, which everybody realizes and recognizes, it is not a bad showing.

The $35,000,000 that has thus far been expended is, of course, money lost unless the road is completed. The company is out of funds entirely, and this money is absolutely necessary for the completion of that project.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NEW. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely wish to suggest, in this connection, that the Senate Committee on Appropriations, upon a showing made to it at the last session, I think it was, recognized the situation and the need of more money, and put in a provision for $10,000,000 in excess of the $35,000,000 estimated, and it was passed by the Senate; but in conference the House conferees, because it exceeded the authorization, insisted upon that part going out. So the Senate, as a matter of fact, has really passed upon this question, in line with the report and the statements the Senator has made, and the Senate has approved the appropriation of $10,000,000 to carry on the work.

Mr. NEW. That is true. If there is any further information desired by anyone, I will be very glad to give it if I can.

Mr. THOMAS. May I inquire of the Senator whether the amount carried by the bill will be sufficient for the purpose?

Mr. NEW. I am assured by the Secretary of the Interior and by the engineers of the Department of the Interior that it will be sufficient to complete the project.

Mr. THOMAS. I certainly hope their assurances will be verified, but I am just a little skeptical.

Mr. NEW. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I do not wonder at his skepticism. These projects almost always require additional appropriations, and this is no exception to the rule; but I really think, and the committee thought, that there is justification for this, because when the original estimate was made nobody could foresee the great increases in the cost of material and in the cost of labor, and the experience of the parties responsible for these estimates differs in no respect from the experience of those who have been in charge of any business and every business enterprise during the last two or three years.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. NEW. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I wish the Senator would tell us, if he knows, what portion of the road is now in operation.

Mr. NEW. None of it is really in operation.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. What portion of it has been completed?

Mr. NEW. It is completed for the most part from Seward north to mile 265, and they are operating a part of that road. It is very nearly complete from Fairbanks, on the north, which is 401 miles north of Seward, south as far as mile 365. Then the branch from the main line out to Matanuska, which is 37.7 miles, is practically completed. The Chatinika branch, which is a narrow-gauge branch of just a little under 32 miles, is completed. So are most of the sidings and terminals along the first 265 miles north from Seward and the 136 miles from Fairbanks south.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. So there is no reason why, if there was any business there, this southern portion of the road, with its branches, should not be in operation?

Mr. NEW. I think not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. What business is there for the road to do?

Mr. NEW. There are a number of really very fertile valleys along the line of that road, in which a good many homesteaders have settled. There are nearly 500 families of homesteaders, in the aggregate, in those valleys. They are engaging in the ordinary agricultural pursuits and some stockraising. It has been demonstrated that agriculture can be carried on successfully and remuneratively up there if they can just get to a market, and this road is required for that.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Did it appear before the committee whether the white population of Alaska had increased or decreased in the last 15 years?

Mr. NEW. Yes; I think the white population of Alaska really has decreased in the last 15 years. But if the Senator will permit, I would like, by way of further answer to that question, to say that it was urged upon the committee that the chief reason for the loss of population in the section of Alaska through which this road runs has been the lack of communication with the outside. Take Fairbanks, for instance, which is on the Tanana River. It has for a great part of the year no way of communicating with the outside world except by dog sleds.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It lies between the Tanana River and the Yukon?

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Is it not true that Fairbanks is the center of the best part of Alaska, agriculturally?

Mr. NEW. I think probably the best part of it is a little south of that; but certainly Fairbanks is in a good part of Alaska.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Does the Senator remember what is the white population of Fairbanks?

Mr. NEW. Fairbanks now has somewhere around 2,500 inhabitants, which is not as many as it did have.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I made these inquiries of the Senator perhaps more from curiosity than anything else. I voted against the original act for building this railroad because I thought it was a foolish venture for the Government, and I am not at all surprised that they have asked for this addition appropriation. I have no idea that the road will ever pay its running expenses, from what I know of the territory, having traveled over it pretty extensively.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, that may all be true. I think the Senator might well justify his vote originally against the project; but he would have more difficulty in justifying a vote now against the completion of it, in view of what has been expended and the present conditions. At least, I felt that way about it myself, and the committee so felt.

That is the situation with reference to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Has the bill been read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would like to hear the bill read.

Mr SMITH of Georgia. That evidently will make it impossible to dispose of the bill before 2 o'clock.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I supposed a Senator could demand the reading of a bill as a matter of right. Really, a bill should be read, I think, before speeches upon it are made. But I will be satisfied, if the bill is printed in the RECORD, to let the Senator from Georgia proceed.

Mr. NEW. The bill can be read in 15 seconds.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I desire is to use the five minutes between now and 2 o'clock, together with the five minutes I will have under the unanimous-consent agreement, to present some reservations to the treaty with Germany. Unfortunately, I was absent yesterday when unanimous consent was given, and unless I present them now, I shall have no opportunity to do so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is entitled to his five minutes, as he has stated, when the first of the Fall amendments is reached, at 2 o'clock. He can then read his reservations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I now ask unanimous consent that the reservations, when presented, may be printed for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will not the Senator allow action on the pending bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was just going to say that, if necessary, I can use several periods of five minutes. I can perhaps get through in five minutes later on, and I will not occupy the time until 2 o'clock, because Senators seem to be ready to vote.

Mr. NEW. I think the bill can be gotten out of the way in a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," be amended by inserting at the conclusion of section 2 the following:

"Provided, That in order to complete on or before December 31, 1922, the construction and equipment of the railroad between Seward and Fairbanks, together with necessary sidings, spurs, and lateral branches, the additional sum of $17,000,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, to be immediately and continuously available until expended."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement entered into on the 1st day of October, the Chair lays before the Senate the German treaty, to be considered as provided by the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I presume the Senate is now in open executive session, although no motion to that effect has been made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that entering upon the execution of the unanimous-consent agreement necessarily passes the Senate into open executive session.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Senate for five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Georgia has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. When the next amendment is before the Senate I shall conclude what I have to say, which will not take more than five minutes longer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have nothing to say on the pending amendment at this time, but I desire to announce that the French Chamber of Deputies has just ratified the treaty by a vote of 372 to 52.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this is the proper occasion to give the Senate my reasons for the vote which I shall cast against the amendment. My view of that part of the treaty which affects Germany——

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. THOMAS. I shall have to yield for that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has just made the statement that the French Chamber of Deputies has, by an almost unanimous vote, ratified the treaty. Is there any rule against applause in the galleries at that momentous statement?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to the rule announced by the permanent occupant of the chair, there is a rule against applause in the galleries, and the present occupant of the chair concurs with the permanent occupant of the chair in that construction of the rule.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I decline to yield further. I have only five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I believe, Mr. President, that the indemnity exacted of Germany should have been laid in what has been generally known as a lump sum. I believe it would have been better for Germany, better for the Allies, and far better from the standpoint of treaty administration. That, however, has not been done, and the treaty provisions regarding it require administration or they will not be effective. It would hardly be fair for the Government of the United States to participate in the making of such a treaty and then refuse to bear its share of the work and expense of making the requirements of the treaty effective. Moreover, Mr. President, we have, since America's entrance into the war, particularly upon this floor, recognized the claims of Poland, the Czecho-Slovaks, and the Jugo-Slavs to independence, based upon the principle of self-determination. The delimitation of the boundaries of those countries also imposes other conditions upon us quite distinct from German indemnity which we should recognize. Having created, or assisted in creating, these governments, it is not American to leave them upon the principle that once delimited they shall assume the obligations of self-support and go it alone or not go at all. It is not possible to conceive two sides to that proposition.

I shall, for the reasons thus briefly and imperfectly outlined, cast my vote against the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I shall vote against this amendment and probably against all of the amendments in this series. I shall vote against this amendment because I have no objection to the participation of the United States upon these commissions, provided the reservations that will be made to this treaty, if it be ratified at all, will relieve the United States from the obligations that would otherwise follow; but I see no objection whatever to the United States sitting as a disinterested party, if our associates desire them to do so, upon these commissions.

The article to which the pending amendment applies provides for a commission of seven to determine the boundaries between Belgium and Germany. If our associates desire the United States to participate in the settlement of that question, which is a judicial question very largely, why should we refuse to do so? Of course, if these were the only changes that were to be made in the treaty, if there were to be no reservations of any kind adopted, I would agree that this amendment ought to be agreed to, because I am opposed to the United States attempting to dictate the boundaries of Europe anywhere, whether it be in Italy, Belgium, or France; for the nation that dictates the boundaries of a country ought also to assume the obligation of defending those boundaries. I am not willing to assume any such obligation; and I apprehend, Mr. President, that when the treaty goes out from this body, with such reservations as will make it plain to our associates that the United States in ratifying the treaty declines to assume any obligation to preserve the territorial integrity of any member of the league, declines to assume any obligation to utilize the military and naval forces of this country for any such purpose, our place upon these commissions, instead of being one of a dictatorship, will be one of an advisory character, as it ought to be. I am also confident that we shall have an opportunity, when the proper time shall arrive, of voting for a reservation with reference to these particular matters that will permit the United States to withdraw from any of these commissions at any time or from any of the obligations that may flow from participation in them; and, furthermore, that with reference to whether we shall participate or not, it shall be a matter for the Congress of the United States to determine and not the Executive alone.

I believe that if the United States shall be of any assistance upon the proposed commissions the representatives of the United States thereon must be men who are not sycophants, who are not entirely unknown, but they must be men of known ability and distinction, and we can secure such men if the Senate shall be given the power to confirm any nominations which may be made to those commissions.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he knows the caliber of the men who are likely to be appointed on the commissions provided for in the treaty? At this time I am told that a man who was formerly an employee of the State Department at a salary of about $3,000 a year is receiving $30,000 as a member of one of those commissions.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I understand that to be the fact; but until this treaty is ratified by the Senate of the United States and the ratifications shall have been exchanged, so as to make it a complete contract, I do not understand that the appointment of any man upon any one of those commissions is worth the paper upon which it is written.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, as I read article 35, to which this amendment applies, it does not necessarily follow that the United States need have membership upon the commission at all. The article provides that there shall be a commission of seven men, in the appointment of five of whom the United States with the other principal allied and associated powers shall join; but it does not necessarily follow, unless we so desire, that one of the appointees shall be an American.

What does the pending amendment do? It asserts that in the solution of the problem of determining the frontier between Belgium and Germany, a problem which arises solely out of the war, the United States refuses, even though there is no obligation imposed, even though there is no burden of money or of men, to associate itself with its former associates in helping to solve one of the very problems which it helped to create.

Why do our associates in the war want the United States to have a part in the selection of this commission? They want the United States to have a part in the selection of this commission because we are the great independent stabilizing factor of the world. Because we have no greed of land or power; because we are impartial. All that is asked in this article of the treaty is that the helpful judgment of the United States—an independent and impartial Nation—shall be joined with the judgment of our allies in the solution of one of the problems that have arisen out of this war. It seems to me, Mr. President, that a decent regard for the wishes and difficulties of our associates in the war requires this country to cooperate in this service; and I shall therefore vote against the amendment.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SPENCER. With pleasure.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does the Senator mean that he believes that impartiality necessarily inheres in the representatives of the United States?

Mr. SPENCER. If we are true to the traditions and history of this country, it ought to inhere; and it certainly does inhere more than in the case of any other country in the solution of post-war problems.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator says, "If true to the traditions of the United States"; but does he mean that impartiality necessarily and inevitably and always inheres in the representatives of the United States?

Mr. SPENCER. Sometimes not.

Mr. McCORMICK. I had in mind the Shantung incident.

Mr. SPENCER. Sometimes not; but that, Mr. President, is the fault of the individual. The fault or inefficiency of an individual has no effect upon the correctness of the principle.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I was one of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations which voted to report favorably this and the other so-called Fall amendments, consisting, I believe, of about 34, the purpose of which is, before the word "powers," to strike out the words "and associated," wherever they occur in this portion of the treaty.

The article in which the pending amendment is proposed is article 35, reading as follows:

"A commission of seven persons, five of whom will be appointed by the principal allied and associated powers, one by Germany, and one by Belgium, will be set up 15 days after the coming into force of the present treaty to settle on the spot the new frontier line between Belgium and Germany, taking into account the economic factors and the means of communication.

"Decisions will be taken by a majority, and will be binding on the parties concerned."

The pending Fall amendment is to strike out the words "and associated," which would take the United States out of the business of determining the boundaries between Germany and Belgium.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] has just stated that this article does not compel the United States to take part in the decision. That is true; the article provides only for the appointment of a commission of seven, and does not provide that the United States shall necessarily have a member upon the commission; but the latter part of the statement of the Senator from Missouri, it seemed to me, was rather inconsistent with the claim that we would have nothing to do with the decisions of the commission, because, if I correctly understood the Senator from Missouri, he stated that he thought it was practically our duty to participate in what he called the solution, to use his own term, of these European questions.

Mr. President, that is just where I differ not only with the Senator from Missouri but with every Senator who desires, under the name of an "associated power," to keep us involved in the settlement of all such questions on the continents of Europe, Asia, and Africa, which are now pending and which may grow out of the infinite complications brought about by this tremendous five years' war.

I do not see why the United States must be a member of these 35 commissions to determine these European questions, about which we know nothing and in which we are only most remotely interested, Mr. President; and if we are not to sit there with delegates and help determine them, at some times in commissions constituted as this one is, where our vote would be decisive in case of a tie, I do not see why we are to participate in the decision of these questions.

I, for one, utterly repel the allegation that it is our moral or bounden duty to mix up in these affairs at all. Some of these commissions will last for 30 years; and I decline to vote to bind this country to participate for these indefinite periods of time in either the appointment or the membership of commissions which shall be engaged in this work for years after the termination of this war and after the settlement of the animosities and the feelings which have arisen out of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think after the history of the last five years nobody can doubt that when the world needs the services of the United States for the protection of civilization and freedom, it will have it; but, Mr. President, it is a very different thing to expect the United States to enter into every boundary dispute and take part in "stabilizing," as the Senator from Missouri suggested, I suppose after the manner in which we have just stabilized the question of Fiume.

Mr. President, in my judgment this treaty never will be ratified unless the Monroe doctrine is finally and absolutely reserved from the jurisdiction of the league. In other words, the United States does not propose, if it can help it, to permit Europe to come in here to settle our boundaries or any purely American question. If we are going to take that attitude—and we shall, in my opinion, if this treaty is to be ratified—they can easily retort that we desire to have the right to interfere in their affairs, while we do not propose that they shall interfere in ours.

I have as little desire to interfere in the boundaries of the European countries, beyond maintaining the decisions of the conference as they are agreed to at this time, as I have to have them interfere in ours. I do not see why we should take up the burden of settling boundaries all over Europe. Leave it to Europe to do. If we had gone there and said to them: "All we ask is that we shall make a treaty with Germany which will prevent her from ever being a menace to the world again; arrange your own boundaries and your partitions among yourselves, and we will back you up, but we will not meddle, if you will comply with our wish that Germany shall be rendered harmless," we should be as strong, as popular, and as well regarded in Europe to-day as we were when the war closed instead of being disliked and distrusted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the sum total of the argument made by the Senator from Massachusetts amounts to this: That we announce to the world, or rather he announces to the world, that "if the world wants America at any time in the cause of the independence and peace of small nations or the liberty of the world, she can have her"; and then, in the next breath, he announces that now, when he is met with the first chance to make good that statement, he declines. Then he tells us that we do not want to fix boundaries in Europe. Well, we have already fixed them. Everybody in America wants to recognize the independence from Turkey of Palestine and Armenia and Thrace, and from Austria-Hungary of Czecho-Slovakia and Jugoslavia, and the independence from all three of the great autocratic powers of Poland. Then the Senator tells us that after we have already done all that we must have nothing to do with their boundaries! We have already, in the treaty, fixed the boundaries. No State can be recognized or exist without boundaries; none of these amendments change the boundaries; they simply say that we, having helped fix them, shall have nothing to do with securing them.

Just prior to that came along the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and the Senator from Connecticut, in substance, said that while we fixed these terms and these independencies and these nationalities, and therefore these boundaries, we might be kept in Europe a few years, and therefore we ought to stand out from under. I humbly submit that the United States are not in the habit of standing out from under where they have already taken a position. We have already taken a position in favor of the freedom and independence of Poland, of Bohemia, of Bosnia, of Herzegovina, of Hejaz, of Serbia, of Armenia, whose poor people have been massacred since the first gospel was preached to them by a Christian apostle, and we have taken a position in favor of self-government of Palestine, the home of the chosen race, as they consider themselves, the Jews; and yet the Senator cynically remarked that we might have to stay several years—doing what? Making good our word, that is all; making good the wounds and the deaths and the sufferings of our boys in France, and of our boys in Italy.

Mr. President, I do not believe American citizenry has reached the low level which is here depicted. It does seem to me that when a man says, "The world knows that when she wants America in behalf of liberty and in behalf of the rights of small nationalities, the world can have her," and then, when he is faced with the very first opportunity that ever was furnished for America to do just what he says "the world knows" she will do, and when he follows up his previous utterance by the practical advice of quitting the game just as soon as possible, he is doing a rather inconsistent thing; and yet that is all that was contained in the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts. "Lame and impotent conclusion" for one supposed to lead a great American party! That is also, after analysis, all that was contained in the speech of the Senator from Connecticut. There is not another idea in either except "stand out from under." Stand out from under what? Something that somebody else has forced upon us? No; something we have fought and bled for, just as these gentlemen who want to defeat the league of nations want to stand out from under all the endeavors to secure an ultimate and just and enduring peace among the nations of the world, and among the sons and daughters of men.

"Am I my brother's keeper?" Cain inquired; and God replied, substantially, "Yes; to some extent you are."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am opposed to any amendment to this treaty. There are some provisions in it which I do not like. If they turn out to be what we do not want we can get out from under the treaty in two years, or we can amend it in the method provided for. Our duty in Europe has not been ended.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] always speaks learnedly and eloquently on any subject to which he addresses himself. The situation to-day in this Chamber is not unlike that which existed here during the consideration of the Spanish-American treaty; and I want to call attention very briefly to the utterances of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts on that occasion, and commend his thoughts then to those who are seeking to have this treaty defeated and to return our commissioners to Europe.

When the Spanish-American treaty was before the Senate the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts said:

> I believe that we shall have the courage not to depart from those islands—
> The Philippines—
> fearfully, timidly, and unworthily and leave them to anarchy among themselves, to the brief and bloody domination of some self-constituted dictator, and to the quick conquest of other powers, who will have no such hesitation as we should feel in crushing them into subjection by harsh and repressive methods. It is for us to decide the destiny of the Philippines, not for Europe, and we can do it alone and without assistance. I believe that we shall have the wisdom, the self-restraint, and the ability to restore peace and order in those islands and give to their people an opportunity for self-government and for freedom under the protecting shield of the United States until the time shall come when they are able to stand alone, if such a thing be possible, and if they do not themselves desire to remain under our protection.

Let us apply that sentiment to the new-born nations of Europe to-day.

> This is a great, a difficult, and a noble task. I believe that American civilization is entirely capable of fulfilling it, and I should not have that profound faith which I now cherish in American civilization and American manhood if I did not think so.
> During the campaign of last autumn I said in many speeches to the people of my State that I could never assent to hand those islands back to Spain; that I wanted no subject races and vassal States; but that we had by the fortunes of war assumed a great responsibility in the Philippines; that we ought to meet it, and that we ought to give to those people an opportunity for freedom, for peace, and for self-government; that we ought to protect them from the rapacity of other nations and seek to uplift those whom we had freed. From those views I have never swerved, and I believed then, as I believe now, that they met with the approbation of an overwhelming majority of the people of Massachusetts. I believe those results can be and will be obtained.

I commend that sentiment to the Senator from Massachusetts so far as it applies to the new-born nations.

Suppose we reject the treaty; what follows? Let us look at it practically. We continue the state of war, and every sensible man in the country, every business interest, desires the reestablishment of peace in law as well as in fact. At the same time we repudiate the President and his action before the whole world, and the repudiation of the President in such a matter as this is, to my mind, the humiliation of the United States in the eyes of civilized mankind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well; I will suspend until the next amendment is reached.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I, too, intend to vote against the Fall amendments, but not entirely for the reasons given by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

I do not like the provisions of the treaty to which the amendments have been offered, and I am in sympathy with the amendments and should vote for them did I not believe that the same purpose can be accomplished by reservations. I expect to vote for reservations later on which will take care of these matters. I believe that these reservations can provide that it shall be optional with us not only as to whether we shall serve on these commissions, but as to whether we shall take any part in making them up. I further think that we can provide by a reservation that no man from this country shall be a member of any of these commissions without the consent of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in 1917, when Germany, suffering from the blows she was then receiving from the Allies, began to put out feelers to see what could be done in the matter of a peaceful settlement of this war, the most eloquent appeal that was made on the floor of the Senate at that time, and the one which received the approbation of every Senator on this floor, was the declaration of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as to what the United States would demand from Germany as conditions of peace.

What were those demands? First, that the United States would demand the return of Alsace and Lorraine to France. Second, that the United States would demand that Turkey be put out of Europe. Third, that the United States would demand a new country, a Jugo-Slavic country and a Czecho-Slavic country, be placed upon the map of Europe. Again, that the United States would demand reparation from Germany for all the offenses that she had committed against the rules of honorable warfare.

Now, we have carried the war to that final conclusion in which we are able to make good the demands which were made by the Senator from Massachusetts. We will see that Alsace and Lorraine go back to France. There will be little difficulty in determining the borders of those two Provinces. But we had to create a new country—a new Czechoslovakia. We had to create a new Poland, and we who were the followers of the Senator from Massachusetts in those demands, all understood at that time, that if we created those countries we would have to create boundaries, and if they were to be created through the war power of the United States, and after our soldiers had gone down to death to establish the right of the United States to so determine what Germany should do, we understand it would require a commission to fix those boundaries.

And it was understood, Mr. President, that the United States, the great country which most of us claim really won the war, would have something to say with reference to how those countries should be established, and what their boundaries should be.

It was further understood by all of us, who agreed so earnestly with the Senator from Massachusetts, that there should be reparation for those wrongs so committed by Germany; that some commission would have to ascertain what the reparation should be. We all understood that the United States would be represented in determining what should be just and fair as a matter of reparation.

I have not changed in my attitude of earnest support of the Senator from Massachusetts in everything he then said. I believe as earnestly to-day as I believed then that this was the duty of the United States in this war, and that we should perform our duty; and if there is anything to be done in the settlement of these disputes, any questions of boundaries of the nations which we helped to create and bring into existence, it is our duty to assist in establishing those boundaries, our duty not to get away from the troubles and perplexities and anxieties that necessarily follow the establishment of new boundary lines of these newly created nations, but to shoulder the burden, and to shoulder it honestly and fearlessly. No harm will ever come to this country because of its purpose to do its duty to the very last requirement in the final settlement of every question imposed upon us by the victorious ending of this Great War.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, if we might get to the subject at issue for just a moment, I remind the Senator from Missouri that one greater even than he has spoken already as to our participation in this particular boundary question. The President of the United States, in answer to a direct question, has said:

> It was deemed wise that the United States should be represented by one member of the commission for settling the new frontier lines of Belgium and Germany because of the universal opinion that America's representative would add to the commission a useful element of entirely disinterested judgment.

Mr. President, I would also recommend that one or two of the Senators at least read part third, with reference to the boundaries of Belgium, and ascertain just what this commission is supposed to do. Such reading will disclose the fact that the commission is not only charged with a ministerial duty, but also with the exercise of judgment for the present in settling the boundaries and hereafter in fixing them, after a plebiscite may be held and the report of that plebiscite communicated to the league of nations.

Of course, Mr. President, if I had been aware of the fact that some Senators would favor a reservation which would do exactly what these amendments were proposed to do with reference to this commission, I would have been even more insistent than I have insisted heretofore that the orderly procedure was to vote upon article 1 of the treaty, and then on any reservations to the treaty, before we reached the amendments under the text of the treaty itself. I am aware of the fact, of course, that certain statements have been made to Senators here who desire to support the amendments, that the same result exactly would be obtained by reservations to be hereafter offered, and which would be adopted.

Mr. President, I have absolutely no pride of authorship whatsoever. If the same results can be obtained through the efforts of other Senators in writing reservations into the treaty, I shall most cheerfully vote for such reservations. My purpose is the perfectly sincere one of seeing that the United States has nothing to do with the fixing of the boundary lines between Belgium and Germany further than to agree to them as fixed in this treaty, and that she should not take part in it. The United States has been criticized by the civilized world for the fact that she did not enforce with Germany a treaty which she had entered into for the protection of Belgium heretofore. Now, you are not only proposing a further neutralization treaty, but you are distinctly taking part in the fixing of certain specific lines and obligating yourself hereafter never to change.

In so far as the general statement made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is concerned, and in view of the fact that he seemed to be laboring under the impression that the proposed amendments referred simply to boundary commissions, I may say to him that of the entire number of some 34, 4 and 4 only apply to boundary commissions; and the purpose of each of those as applied to boundary commissions is just exactly what I avow my purpose here now, to see that the United States has nothing to do with boundary lines and does not pledge herself to a moral or legal obligation hereafter to send her troops there and stand them across those lines to preserve them eternally.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I can not, of course, in the time permitted, discuss these amendments. I shall simply say a very few words in explanation of my vote against the amendments proposed.

The associated and allied powers defeated Germany in the greatest, the most devastating, and criminal war ever waged by an aspiring monarchy, and I am willing, as I was willing to go into the war, that this country should do everything it can to make that victory complete and to see that Germany pays reparation to the bitter end to make that victory effectual. I am not willing to withdraw this country from the reparation commission. I am not willing that this country should stand aside and say that it is not going to see that Germany is disarmed and rendered powerless to again perpetrate upon the world such a crime. I am willing to go to the extent necessary to make that victory complete. I know the terms are harsh, but the crime was great, the greatest ever known in history against the civilization of the world. Should we hesitate now to stand with the Allies and see that Germany is rendered powerless?

During the war, when the result was in doubt, and the world shuddered at the consequences if Germany should win, we were more than willing to encourage Poland, Hungary, and other nations in Europe to set up an independent government and to avail ourselves of their assistance and of their help in defeating Germany. I say now, go to the extent necessary to see that they are set up as an independent people.

I know Senators upon this floor stated there must be an independent Poland on the east of Prussia. Is there anything startling in the statement that we, as one of the allied and associated powers which made it possible, should run the boundaries or assist in it? I think not.

We were willing, then, in the dark days of the war, to avail ourselves of their assistance. Now, it is said we should abandon Europe. I am as anxious to avoid Europe and its quarrels as anyone. I wish it had been possible for us to say, "Arrange these matters among yourselves. We have done our part." But it was not done, and I am not now willing to vote for amendments which will relieve us entirely. I do not say that I would not vote for an amendment which would give us the option of withdrawing when the time comes wherein we consider it proper to withdraw from these commissions. In fact, in most of them we are not obliged to nominate a representative of this country at all. I think perhaps such a reservation would be wise, but I am not willing now to vote for these amendments which practically represent new treaty provisions upon the subject.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if a vote is about to be taken, I desire to ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to offer just one word of explanation as to the vote on the pending amendment that I intend to cast. I believe in the principle of the amendment, but I feel positive it can be covered by a reservation, and I prefer a reservation to an amendment; and I understand a form of reservation has been prepared covering this amendment and the other so-called Fall amendments. As we will have a chance to vote for the reservation, I shall vote against the pending amendment, but shall vote for the reservation referred to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. SWANSON (when Mr. MARTIN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. MARTIN] is detained on account of illness. He is paired with the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. PAGE's name was called). I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] on account of illness. Were he present he would vote "yea."

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). As stated by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] I have a general pair with the senior Senator from that State [Mr. SMITH]. Under the announcement of the junior Senator from South Carolina, that if his colleague were present he would vote "nay." I am at liberty to vote upon this amendment. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] on account of illness in his family. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

So Mr. FALL'S amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 61, line 5, in article 40, it is proposed, after the word "allied," to strike out the words "and associated," so as to make it read, "allied powers."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee as stated by the Secretary.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, that there may be no misunderstanding and that Senators if they desire to speak upon it may have their attention called to the purpose and effect of the proposed amendment, I will state briefly that it is provided in the portion of the treaty now under consideration and in the article to which the amendment refers that Germany renounces the benefits of certain treaties with the Duchy of Luxemburg; that she "renounces all rights to the exploitation of the railways in Luxemburg, adheres to the termination of the régime of neutrality of the Grand Duchy, and accepts in advance all international arrangements which may be concluded by the allied powers relating to the Grand Duchy." The amendment simply provides that the United State shall not take part in any such future arrangements. It strikes out the United States.

I may say while I am on my feet that article 41 also applies to Luxemburg and provides that Germany will agree to have any of the other provisions of the present treaty applied to Luxemburg at the demand of the allied and associated powers. The amendment there is to strike out the words "and associated."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Senate for five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Georgia has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will conclude my remarks on the next amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, with relation to this provision and the other provisions covered by the Fall amendments, I desire to submit a few of the precepts laid down by Thomas Jefferson, the progenitor of the Democratic Party and politically of the present occupant of the White House. What Washington said has been often quoted, what Jefferson said has been strangely neglected at this, of all moments, when it applies so directly. Jefferson for some 40 years spoke and wrote consistently against such conventions being entered into on our part. I now quote from his writings:

"I know that it is a maxim with us, and I think it a wise one, not to entangle ourselves with the affairs of Europe." (To E. Carrington (Paris, 1787). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, ii, 334. Ford edition, iv, 483.)

"Better keep together as we are, haul off from Europe as soon as we can and from all attachments to any portions of it." (To John Taylor (Philadelphia, 1798). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, iv, 247. Ford edition, vii, 205.)

"I am for free commerce with all nations, political connection with none, and little or no diplomatic establishment. And I am not for linking ourselves by new treaties with the quarrels of Europe." (To Elbridge Gerry (Philadelphia, 1799). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, iv, 268. Ford edition, vii, 328.)

"Commerce with all nations, alliance with none, should be our motto." (To T. Lomax (Monticello, March, 1799). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson, Washington edition, iv, 301. Ford edition, vii, 374.)

"I sincerely join you in abjuring all political connection with every foreign power; and though I cordially wish well to the progress of liberty in all nations, and would forever give it the weight of our countenance, yet they are not to be touched without contamination from their other bad principles." (To T. Lomax (Monticello, March, 1799). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, iv, 301. Ford edition, vii, 374.)

"Let our affairs be disentangled from those of all other nations except as to commerce." (To Gideon Granger (Monticello, 1800). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, iv, 331. Ford edition, vii, 452.)

"The Constitution thought it wise to restrain the Executive and Senate from entangling and embroiling our affairs with those of Europe." (Parliamentary Manuel ix, 81 (1800).)

"To take part in European conflicts would be to divert our energies from creation to destruction." (To George Logan (Washington, March, 1801). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Ford Edition, vii, 23.)

"It ought to be the very first object of our pursuits to have nothing to do with the European interests and politics. Let them be free or slaves, at will, navigators or agriculturists, swallowed into one government or divided into a thousand, we have nothing to fear from them in any form." (To George Logan (Washington, March, 1801). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Ford Edition, viii, 23.)

"Determined as we are to avoid, if possible, wasting the energies of our people in war and destruction, we shall avoid implicating ourselves with the powers of Europe, even in support of principles we mean to pursue. They have so many other interests different from ours that we must avoid being entangled in them. We believe we can enforce these principles, as to ourselves by peaceable means, now that we are likely to have our public councils detached from foreign views." (To Thomas Paine (Washington, March, 1801). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington Edition, iv, 370. Ford Edition, viii, 18.)

"Our Nation has wisely avoided entangling itself in the system of European interests, has taken no side between its rival powers, attached itself to none of its ever-changing confederacies." (Reply to Address of Baltimore Baptists (1808). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington Edition, viii, 137.)

"The seed of hatred and revenge which they are now sowing with a large hand will not fail to produce their fruits in time." (To M. de Marbois (Monticello, 1817). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson, Washington Edition, vii, 76.)

"Treaties of alliance are generally insufficient to enforce compliance with their mutual stipulations." (The Anas (1818), ix, 88. The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Ford Edition, i, 157.)

"It is a theatrical farce"—

Speaking of the Holy Alliance—

"in which the five powers are the actors." (To President Monroe (Monticello, June, 1823). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington Edition, vii, 289. Ford Edition, x, 258.)

"It is against our system to entangle ourselves at all with the affairs of Europe." (To Philip Massei (Washington, 1824). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington Edition, iv, 553.)

Yet Jefferson, misliked by many then and now, as to his idealism, was at least as earnest, at least as well read, at least as experienced, at least as liberal, and at least as competent to judge human tendencies, and the results of human action as are any of the idealists of to-day. Nor has human nature, which remained unchanged through the centuries and persistently held its traits through many leagues of nations, altered in the last 100 years. Nor are world conditions to-day different from those of Jefferson's time, which was that of the overthrow of Napoleon, of the bankruptcy of Europe, of the threatened revolution in England, of the disorder and misery of the nations of the great convulsion of the nineteenth century, and of the founding for the same purposes of a league of nations, known as the Holy Alliance, to secure peace and guarantee the territorial integrity of the associated powers. Of it, to quote him finally, Jefferson says:

"With respect to the European combinations against the rights of man, I join an honest Irishman of my neighborhood in his Fourth of July toast, 'The Holy Alliance—To hell the whole of them.'" (To Thomas Leiper (Monticello, 1824). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Ford Edition, x, 298.)

The volume and page where these extracts from Jefferson occur are given in connection with the quotations.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to continue for two or three minutes to present the gospel according to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in 1899:

Suppose we reject the treaty; what follows? Let us look at it practically. We continue the state of war, and every sensible man in the country, every business interest, desires the reestablishment of peace in law as well as in fact. At the same time we repudiate the President and his action before the whole world, and the repudiation of the President in such a matter as this is, to my mind, the humiliation of the United States in the eyes of civilized mankind and brands us as a people incapable of great affairs or of taking rank where we belong, as one of the greatest of the great world powers.

The President can not be sent back across the Atlantic in the person of his commissioners, hat in hand, to say to Spain, with bated breath, "I am here in obedience to the mandate of a minority of one-third of the Senate to tell you that we have been too victorious, and that you have yielded us too much, and that I am very sorry I took the Philippines from you." I do not think that any American President would do that, or that any American would wish him to. Still less do I think that any American would withdraw Gen. Otis and his soldiers and recall Admiral Dewey from the scene of his great victory, leaving it to be said of us that we had deserted our post without an effort to repair the ruin we had made or to save the people we had freed with—

One task more declined, one more footpath untrod,
One more devil's triumph and sorrow for angels,
One wrong more to man, one more insult to God.

* * * * * * *

I believe in the rule of the majority, because I believe that in the long run the majority is far more likely to be right than the minority, and I have no faith in Matthew Arnold's self-complacent doctrine of "the remnant." Great policies and great questions must be decided by higher standards and on grounds more relative than this. I have given a large part of my life to the study of the time when this country freed itself from England, and when this Government was established, and of the men who did the great work. No one has a greater reverence for those men and their deeds than I. Nobody loves better than I the ideals set forth in the Declaration of Independence; but my ideals do not stop there. Nor do they stop even with that greater period when the life of the Nation was at stake. I have ideals and beliefs which pertain to the living present, and a faith in the future of my country. I believe in the American people as they are to-day, and in the civilization they have created. I believe not merely in what they have done but in what they are yet to do.

* * * * * * *

I can look at this question in only one way. A great responsibility has come to us. If we are unfit for it and unequal to it, then we should shirk it and fly from it. But I believe that we are both fit and capable, and that therefore we should meet it and take it up.

Later on in the same speech he uses this language:

I want to get this country out of war and back to peace.

That is my thought.

I want to take the disposition and control of the Philippines out of the hands of the war power and place them where they belong, in the hands of the Congress and of the President. I want to enter upon a policy which shall enable us to give peace and self-government to the natives of those islands.

That is what we want to do who favor this treaty now, namely, to give peace and self-government to the nations of Europe.

The rejection of the treaty makes all these things impossible, and the delay in its ratification retards and endangers them.

These quotations are taken from a speech delivered by the Senator from Massachusetts January 24, 1899, and found in volume 32 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pages 959 and 960.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in addition to the very interesting statement with regard to the position of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] taken on the particular question then before the Senate, we have a very much later statement by the Senator which, it seems to me, is wholly in conflict with his present position. I desire to call attention to an address which he delivered in this body on December 21, 1918, a prepared address. I shall read only one or two extracts from it, but I commend it to those who have not read it as having a direct bearing on the very question now before us.

At page 760, the Senator said:

The first thing needful is to face the situation and look facts in the face. Nothing can be accomplished unless we work in complete harmony with those who are associated with us in the war against the Central Powers. I know very well that technically we had no treaty of alliance with the allies by whose side we fought, but technicalities are of no consequence in the presence of facts. No treaty of alliance could have caused a greater unity of action than was established between us and the nations with whom we joined in the war against Germany.

A little further down he says:

If these are fulfilled, then comes the practical work of making the peace effective. In other words, the terms of the peace must be carried out and executed. The United States did not enter this Great War simply to vindicate its rights at sea, which had been invaded and disregarded by the German use of submarines, although that may have been the last drop which caused the cup of wrong and outrage to overflow. It was no doubt the technical point on which relations were broken, but it was trifling compared to the really great objects with which we entered the war and which alone justified our doing so. We took up arms against Germany because we were determined not only to protect our own safety and independence against her attacks but because the people of the United States believed that if the world was to be a possible place for free, law-abiding people to live in the autocratic system and the organized barbarism of Germany must once for all be eliminated from among the nations. We went to war to save civilization. For this mighty purpose we have sacrificed thousands of American lives and spent billions of American treasure. We can not, therefore, leave the work half done. We are as much bound, not merely by interest and every consideration for a safe future but by honor and self-respect, to see that the terms of peace are carried out, as we were to fulfill our great determination that the armies of Germany should be defeated in the field. We can not halt or turn back now. We must do our share to carry out the peace as we have done our share to win the war, of which the peace is an integral part. We must do our share in the occupation of German territory which will be held as security for the indemnities to be paid by Germany. We can not escape doing our part in aiding the peoples to whom we have helped to give freedom and independence in establishing themselves with ordered governments, for in no other way can we erect the barriers which are essential to prevent another outbreak by Germany upon the world. We can not leave the Jugo-Slavs, the Czecho-Slovaks, and the Poles, the Lithuanians, and the other States which we hope to see formed and marching upon the path of progress and development unaided and alone.

These are some of the tasks which the war has brought and which peace demands. They involve no alliances. They are specific questions, the settlement of which has been imposed upon us by the war, and they all are vital to an enduring peace. They ought to make the peace of the world. And behind the work of occupation to insure the payment of indemnities, behind these new States, whose existence we have recognized and whom we have helped to call into existence, lies the great problem of Russia.

And so forth. I quote LODGE against LODGE on this question.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in view of my vote on amendment No. 3, I think perhaps I should say a word in explanation of my vote on the pending amendment.

Amendment No. 3 related to boundaries alone; and I think the United States would incur neither a legal nor a moral obligation in sharing in the appointment of this commission of seven to fix the Belgian boundaries, or in having a representative to serve on the commission itself. It is purely a question of boundary; and, Mr. President, if there is a legal or moral obligation to protect and preserve that boundary in article 35 itself, and on the face of it, we shall protect ourselves against that by the important and material reservation we shall make affecting article 10 of the covenant of the league of nations.

But, Mr. President, the pending amendment is a different thing altogether. This does not relate to boundaries alone. It assumes that the allied and the associated powers may make an international arrangement which will relate not alone to boundaries, but to any other subject which may affect international relations. It is not a question alone, then, of the interests of Luxemburg and Germany, respectively, but it may become a question that affects every power in Europe. Arising as they will out of an international arrangement concerning Luxemburg, although Luxemburg is small, territorially considered, the issues may be such in any given case as to involve every nation on the Continent of Europe in controversy, and possibly in war. It may involve us, because the "international arrangements" referred to in article 40 are those to which we are to be a party.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that our country should subscribe to that portion of article 40 in which this proposed amendment occurs; so, when it comes to a vote upon amendment No. 4, I shall vote, or would vote if permitted to do so—I announced my pair a while ago—in favor of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the committee in article 40, page 61.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, in view of the significance of the vote which was taken a few moments ago, and which makes it evident to the people of the United States that a treaty will be framed which will suit the Senate of the United States before it is ever adopted, I shall not ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment, nor upon the next.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the committee in article 40, page 61. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a division.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fall	Kellogg	New
Ball	Fernald	Kendrick	Newberry
Bankhead	Fletcher	Kenyon	Norris

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee in article 40, page 61.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 61, in article 41, line 2, to strike out the words "and associated," after the word "allied."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Senate in continuation of his previous remarks. His speech entire is as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the framers of our Constitution realized the great importance and binding effect of treaties, and provided that while they can be negotiated by the President they must be ratified by two-thirds of the Senate before they can be executed. The framers of our Constitution were unwilling that the President should execute treaties, even with the approval of a majority of the Senate.

The requirement that a treaty should receive the approval of two-thirds of the Senate was intended to guarantee this country against the execution of any treaty which had not been maturely considered and overwhelmingly approved.

The peace treaty with Germany, including, as it does, the covenant of the league of nations and a provision for the international organization of labor, is the most important that has ever been submitted to the Senate. It is probably true that this treaty, in its present shape, would be more far-reaching in its effect upon the people of the United States than any measure ever acted upon by Congress.

No higher trust is confided to a Senator than that of considering and determining how he will vote upon the question of ratifying a treaty. We may make mistakes in our own internal affairs. We can not afford to make mistakes in international affairs. We must not agree to the treaty unless we are ready to carry out in perfect good faith all its obligations. If a treaty contains doubtful provisions, they should be made clear in advance of execution. If a treaty contains provisions which we do not expect our Nation in good faith to perform, we should frankly so declare before executing the treaty.

The treaty of peace with Germany contains two distinct and separate agreements. One is the treaty of peace with Germany; the other is the covenant of the league of nations, a portion of which is found after the treaty with Germany, in part 13, headed "Labor" and called "Organization of labor."

Germany, while signing the entire instrument, is not a party to the league of nations. Germany has not been admitted to the league of nations. Germany may hereafter apply for admission, but in the meantime the league covenant expressly provides for amendments to the covenant by the other nations.

The covenant of the league, agreed upon by the five principal nations associated in war against Germany, affects them alone at present, and they control it. As it affects them alone, they can make a supplemental agreement modifying and explaining provisions of the covenant without submitting it to Germany.

I am opposed to changes in the actual treaty with Germany. These, of course, could not be made without resubmission to Germany, but I am in favor of reservations clarifying the meaning of portions of the covenant and in some instances clarifying and restricting the language of the covenant, as I construe it, in its application to the United States.

I may say here that the restriction to which I refer does not in the opinion of some seem necessary as they view the meaning of the covenant, and as I would view it were the restrictions added.

I believe that substantial modifications should be placed upon part 13 of the covenant entitled "Organization of labor," but I have not undertaken to prepare them. The Senator from Colorado intends, I understand, to present such modifications and reservations, and as he has made a special study of this part of the covenant, I shall await his suggestions.

I desire to present seven reservations to the main covenant of the league. Most of these reservations have already been presented in a somewhat different form, either by the Senator from North Dakota or by the Senator from Minnesota.

One of the reservations embodies part of a reservation from the committee, and part of a reservation on the same subject by the Senator from North Dakota. Only two of the reservations are entirely my own.

It is hardly necessary to call the attention of Senators to the fact that the treaty can not be ratified in its present form. Instead of receiving the required two-thirds vote for ratification in its present form, there seems little doubht that more nearly two-thirds of the Senate are convinced it should not be so ratified, and would vote against ratification.

I desire to see the treaty ratified, but I believe reservations should be made, and call upon all Senators wishing the treaty ratified to aid in perfecting reservations, that we may ratify the treaty as soon as possible. The Senate can adopt reservations I shall submit, without affecting the treaty with Germany, any they could be accepted by cable without again requiring a reference to the Paris council.

I know it has been urged that the entire treaty and league covenant should be ratified, and amendments and corrections be made afterwards. This would be dangerous and impracticable. To amend the treaty the representatives of the nine members of the league in the council must each consent, and a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly must consent.

This is the mode of procedure for amendment if we wait until the matter is completely organized before modifications are made.

Such an agreement would be difficult to obtain.

We should not bind this country by doubtful language or objectionable provisions, trusting to so uncertain a means of future correction. This is the time to make clear what we mean and what we are willing to do. Great Britain and France can approve, and the reservation will be passed on practically as a supplement to the covenant.

In March, 1912, soon after I entered the Senate, a peace treaty with Great Britain was under consideration. Senator Bacon, of Georgia, the ranking Democrat upon the Committee of Foreign Relations, prepared reservations to the resolution of ratification, excepting from arbitration any question "which affects the admission of aliens into the United States, or the admission of aliens to the educational institutions of the several States, or any question which depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions, commonly described as the Monroe doctrine, or other purely governmental policy."

The reservations were supported by all of the Democrats, and by a large number of Republicans in the Senate.

I had the privilege of addressing the Senate at that time in support of these reservations, and of advocating cooperation between the leading nations of the world to reduce the size of standing armies, to stop the construction of battleships, and to use their influence to adjust differences that may arise between nations and settle disputes through arbitration.

I believe earnestly in the benefits which may come from such a course of action. I hope the league of nations may be an influence to prevent war. Intensely opposed to war, I wish the league every possible success toward preserving peace, but we must not forget that a majority of the white people of the world are not and may possibly never be members of the league. Nearly half of the people of the other races are not self-governing people, but are Provinces ruled by foreign countries. Under these circumstances it would be foolish to claim that the league is a guaranty against war. It may help preserve peace, but it could not be hoped that it would help if its very provisions left a certainty of dispute among its members as to what it meant.

I shall, at a later day, discuss the reservations which I present. For the present I only wish to lay them before the Senate, with the hope that they may help bring us to an agreement on reservations that may make the ratification of the treaty possible at an early date.

I have sought in part to interpret in these reservations the views of many Senators who favor ratification of the treaty and the league and favor speedy action.

I desire now to read the proposed reservations. They are as follows:

Reservations intended to be proposed by Mr. SMITH of Georgia to the pending treaty of peace with Germany, viz:

Resolved, That the Senate advises and consents to the ratification of the treaty with Germany with the following provisos to be made a part of such ratification:

First. The United States understands and construes the words "dispute between members" and the words "disputes between parties," in article 15, to mean that a dispute with a principal member, self-governing dominion, colony, or dependency represented in the assembly is a dispute with the dominant or principal member represented therein, and with each of the other self-governing dominions, colonies, or dependencies thereof, and that the exclusion of the parties to the dispute provided in the last paragraph of said article will cover the dominant or principal member, its dominions, colonies, and dependencies.

Second. The United States understands that, as the covenant provides no tribunal to pass judgment upon the subject, whenever the two years' notice for withdrawal from the league of nations shall have been given by a member nation, as provided in article 1, the member nation shall be the sole judge whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States can be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

Third. The United States understands that the reference to the Monroe doctrine in the league covenant means that the long-established policy of the United States, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine, is preserved unaffected by the covenant, and that no question which depends upon or involves this policy is to be submitted to arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council of the league.

Fourth. The United States understands that, under the league covenant, no question can be raised either in the assembly or in the council of the league which will give either body the right to report or to make any recommendation, or to take any action upon the policy of the United States or any other member nation with regard to domestic or political questions relating to its internal affairs, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other purely domestic questions, but these questions, in whatever manner they may arise, are solely within the jurisdiction of each member nation, and are not by the covenant submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or the assembly of the league of nations, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power, and, in the case of the United States, they are reserved for action by the Congress of the United States.

Fifth. The United States understands that the advice which may be given by the council or the assembly of the league with regard to the employment of the military or naval forces by a member nation, or with regard to the use of economic measures for the protection of any other country, whether member of the league or not, or for the purpose of coercing any other country or for the purpose of intervention in the internal conflicts or other controversies which may arise in any other country, is to be regarded only as advice, and leaves each member nation free to exercise its own judgment as to whether it is wise or practicable to act upon that advice, and that the Congress must determine for the United States its course.

The United States can not assume, under the provisions of article 10, or any other article, any obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country, or to interfere, under the provisions of article 16, in controversies between other nations, whether members of the league or not.

The authority for decisions in all matters, referred to in this reservation, is placed by the Constitution of the United States upon the Congress, and the failure of the Congress to adopt the suggestions of the assembly or the council of the league of nations, or to take independent action, shall not constitute a violation of the treaty, and no mandate shall be accepted by the United States, as provided in article 22, part 1, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

Sixth. The United States understands that the representatives of the other nations upon the reparations commission will interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States also approves the interference.

Seventh. The United States understands that no one may represent the United States in any of the positions created by the treaty, except when appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, unless provision is hereafter made by the Congress for selections in a different manner, and the representative of the United States, either in the assembly or the council, shall have no authority to agree for the United States to any amendment to, or change in, the covenant of the league until the same has been first submitted to and ratified by the Senate of the United States, as other treaties.

Mr. President, as the subjects to which these reservations pertain are reached, I hope to have an opportunity of discussing somewhat elaborately the questions that are involved in each reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee in article 41, page 61.

The amendment was rejected.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is on page 77, "Government of the Territory of the Saar Basin." In subdivision 17, the last line on page 77, after the words "France or Germany" it is proposed to insert the words "or the United States of America," so that if amended, the paragraph will read:

The Governing Commission provided for by paragraph 16 shall consist of five members chosen by the Council of the League of Nations, and will include one citizen of France, one native inhabitant of the Saar Basin, not a citizen of France, and three members belonging to three countries other than France or Germany or the United States of America.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that wherever the United States was named in any of these commissions, the Senator from New Mexico moved to exclude it, and wherever it was not, he moved to include it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the reading of this amendment, I suppose, is explanation enough to the majority of Senators. The Saar Basin matter is a very important one. The governing commission is to handle the Saar Basin for the next 15 years, and then turn it over to whomever it sees fit, irrespective of the result of a vote after that time. In other words, the league of nations, the governing commission, is not to be obligated at all by the result of a vote. Although the vote might be in favor of Germany, the commission itself, the league, exercises its discretion. The articles are very prolix and lengthy, and under the general subject cover the delivery of coal for a term of an unknown duration practically to Italy by land routes and water routes, the delivery of coal to France, the working of the mines, the governing of the people; in fact, setting up an absolute government. It is the purpose of the amendment simply to strike the United States out of the governing commission.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The purpose of the Saar Basin agreement in the treaty is to restore to France the values of which she was robbed when the Germans flooded the coal mines in northern and northwestern France. The object of the Saar Basin agreement is to give France an opportunity to keep from freezing in the winter, notwithstanding the fact that Germany voluntarily, deliberately, and with malice aforethought, flooded all the mines of northwestern France. There is no particular reason why the representative of any Government except France should have anything to do with this particular question, except that at the end of the period fixed the league of nations is to take jurisdiction; and the league of nations, in fact, does take jurisdiction even before that.

Mr. President, the most wonderful piece of deliberate atrocity ever committed in the world, almost, except atrocities where men, women, and children were slaughtered, was committed by Germany when she was retreating from the coal basin of France, and deliberately flooded the mines and deprived capital of all opportunity for dividends and labor of all opportunity for wages. When the council sitting upon this question came to it, they concluded that France had the right of reparation for that act, and the President of the United States, when it was going on, took the trouble of making himself a voluntary interferer in European affairs, as some Senators might express it, sending a message to the German Army, which Ludendorff, in his memoirs published in this morning's paper, mentions, saying that that sort of thing must stop or the allied and associated powers would demand full reparation in money for it. That is all. Any man who wants to quarrel with France about having her coal furnished her for a limited number of years, long enough to enable her to get her own mines back into working order—that is how they arrived at the period—is perfectly willing to have Germany freeze the French people to death in the winter time without one word said by all the people who fought with France and against Germany.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is almost universally understood, by those who have not had an opportunity to read the treaty and examine it in detail, that the Saar Valley provisions of the treaty provide that at the end of 15 years that territory shall be returned or shall be joined to whatever nationality or nation the people shall decide they wish to have it under. In other words, if they vote that it shall be returned to Germany, it will go to Germany; or, if they vote to ally themselves with France, the supposition is that it will go to France.

But these are not the terms or conditions of the treaty at all. The vote is at most advisory. The great objections I have to the Saar Valley proposition are, first, that it engages the United States practically to take part in a supergovernment over the Saar Valley, and, secondly, the plebiscite is really of no force or effect at all. The league of nations may determine it as they see fit, regardless of how the vote may be cast. It says that the league of nations shall decide on the sovereignty under which the territory is to be placed, taking into account the wishes of the inhabitants as expressed by the voting. In other words, the vote is simply advisory. If one will examine the terms of the treaty and then take into consideration who will constitute the council or the control of the assembly, there will be no difficulty in determining where the Saar Valley will inevitably land.

It is for that reason, Mr. President, with the other reason which I have just stated, that it necessitates the Government of the United States taking part in a governmental affair in Europe for an interminable length of time, that I shall vote in favor of the amendment. If the provisions of the treaty were such as to accomplish nothing more than that which has been suggested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], there could be no objection to it. No one would object to France being properly repaid for any damages which had been done during the late war, but they do not stop with that proposition at all, and it is when they get beyond that that I object to it, and therefore I shall vote for the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi has already spoken once, and under the agreement no one is permitted to speak more than once.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not speak five minutes. I am entitled to speak at least five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator, however, can not now consume the time he omitted before.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho in summary has expressed the opinion of many of us, but before Senators vote on this amendment I wish to recall to the Senate the secret agreement between the Imperial Russian Government and the French Government, if my memory does not fail me, during the presidency of the council of ministers of Monsieur Briand, which stipulated, in brief, that Russia should draw her western frontier where she saw fit and that France should annex Alsace and Lorraine and the Saar Basin. It stipulated further, that a neutral State should be constituted west of the Rhine. This provision, as I think may be very easily demonstrated, is in fulfillment of that project, as the plan for the occupation of the territory west of the Rhine is in partial fulfillment of that project. If Senators doubt that statement, they may find evidence in support of it not only in the treaty, but in the debates in the French Chamber of Deputies, in which I have taken the pains to study for French opinion of the treaty. Sections in the treaty provide that the Saar Basin shall be economically united to France, that its currency shall be French, that the tariff customs shall be French; in short, that before they vote the inhabitants shall be bound to France by every economic tie. Monsieur Maurice, in the French Chamber, predicated part of his speech upon the assumption that, of course, the inhabitants of the Saar would vote to unite to France at the end of the period of occupation.

In order that the unsupported opinion of the partisans on this side of the Chamber may not stand alone, I venture to read in part the comment of the great New York World, the organ of his excellency the President and his administration:

Nothing at all has been said in the Senate about the Saar Valley arrangement, yet in comparison the Shantung provision is an act of diplomatic philanthropy. Theoretically, the Saar Valley arrangement was made to compensate France for the wanton destruction of the coal mines in the Lens district; but the French representatives were not satisfied with obtaining ton for ton of coal, or with operating the Saar mines until the Lens district could be rehabilitated. They demanded the Saar Valley itself by way of reparation, with its 500,000 German inhabitants.

President Wilson forced a compromise under which the French are to have the mines and the coal outright, the Saar Valley is to be governed by the league of nations, the question of ultimate nationality is to be left to a plebiscite at the end of 15 years, and the Germans are to have the privilege of buying back the mines with gold, provided the reparations commission leaves them any funds with which to make the purchase.

There is no more dishonest provision in the whole treaty than this for the Saar Basin. If it had been provided that the territory should be annexed outright to France; that the German inhabitants should be indemnified for their property, so they might go to Germany, that would have been an open act of annexation; that would have been candid; that could be defended. But it is not defensible to provide for annexation, disguised and glossed over by the dishonest terms of the text of the treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the idea has been advanced that inasmuch as Germany is not a member of the league of nations and for some time to come is not to be a member, amendments may be proposed by the Senate or reservations may be annexed without the necessity to obtain the assent of Germany to such amendments or reservations. I submitted some remarks upon this subject some days ago, and at that time promised to put in the RECORD a reference to those parts of the treaty conferring power upon the league of nations of very vital interest to Germany.

Time will not permit, under the rule under which we are now operating, to put in the entire list, but I desire to invite the attention of the Senate at this time to provisions conferring power upon the league of nations, or the council of the league, so far as the Saar Basin is concerned.

Article 48, page 67, of the treaty provides that—

A commission composed of five members, one appointed by France, one by Germany, and three by the council of the league of nations, which will select nationals of other powers, will be constituted within 15 days from the coming into force of the present treaty to trace on the spot the frontier line described above.

This commission, appointed by the council of the league of nations, defines boundaries of the Saar Basin, which is temporarily to be turned over to the league of nations as a part of the territory of Germany.

Article 49. Germany renounces in favor of the league of nations, in the capacity of trustee, the government of the territory defined above.

Accordingly, Germany is vitally concerned in the constitution of the league of nations and, of course, in the important body, the council.

At page 77, sections 16 and 17 of the annex to article 49, I read as follows:

The government of the territory of the Saar Basin shall be intrusted to a commission representing the league of nations. This commission shall sit in the territory of the Saar Basin.

Section 17 reads:

The governing commission provided for by paragraph 16 shall consist of five members chosen by the council of the league of nations, and will include one citizen of France, one native inhabitant of the Saar Basin, not a citizen of France, and three members belonging to three countries other than France or Germany.

And then:

The members of the governing commission shall be appointed for one year and may be reappointed. They can be removed by the council of the league of nations, which will provide for their replacement.

The members of the governing commission will be entitled to a salary which will be fixed by the council of the league of nations and charged on the local revenues.

Then section 18 provides that—

The chairman of the governing commission shall be appointed for one year from among the members of the commission by the council of the league of nations and may be reappointed.

That is to say, the league of nations not only appoints the commission but elects the chairman of the commission.

Section 34 of the annex concerns the plebiscite. After the Saar Basin is thus governed by the commission appointed by the league of nations for 15 years a plebiscite is to be taken which shall determine the future of that important territory. A vote is to be taken, and section 34 provides that—

All persons, without distinction of sex, more than 20 years old at the date of the voting, resident in the territory at the date of the signature of the present treaty, will have the right to vote.

Then—

The other conditions, methods, and the date of the voting shall be fixed by the council of the league of nations in such a way as to secure the freedom, secrecy, and trustworthiness of the voting.

That is to say, all the machinery, practically all the laws, under which the election is to be conducted, will be prescribed by the council of the league of nations.

Then after the vote is taken it is canvassed by the league of nations and a determination as to the future of that territory is made by the council in accordance with the provisions of section 35, as follows:

The league of nations shall decide on the sovereignty under which the territory is to be placed, taking into account the wishes of the inhabitants as expressed by the voting:

(a) If, for the whole or part of the territory, the league of nations decides in favor of the maintenance of the régime established by the present treaty and this annex, Germany hereby agrees to make such renunciation of her sovereignty in favor of the league of nations as the latter shall deem necessary. It will be the duty of the league of nations to take appropriate steps to adapt the régime definitively adopted to the permanent welfare of the territory and the general interest;

(b) If, for the whole or part of the territory, the league of nations decides in favor of union with France, Germany hereby agrees to cede to France in accordance with the decision of the league of nations all rights and title over the territory specified by the league;

(c) If, for the whole or part of the territory, the league of nations decides in favor of union with Germany, it will be the duty of the league of nations to cause the German Government to be reestablished in the government of the territory specified by the league.

Then section 36 reads:

If the league of nations decides in favor of the union of the whole or part of the territory of the Saar Basin with Germany, France's rights of ownership in the mines situated in such part of the territory will be repurchased by Germany in their entirety at a price payable in gold.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Montana has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, just a word in reply to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. Under this treaty the league of nations is constituted by the representatives of those countries which have ratified the treaty and of such countries as shall accept the invitation to join. Therefore, when France, Japan, and England have ratified this treaty, the league of nations, I take it, comes into being. If that be not so, there can be no league of nations at all, because China has refused to ratify or become a party to it. Then, if that be true, when our deposit of ratification takes place those members who have then ratified the treaty constitute the league of nations, and they can amend the league of nations covenant in any way they see fit. If they unanimously agree that these amendments shall be adopted, then, of course, they become effective without the action of Germany.

I wish, however, to say a word, Mr. President, upon the pending amendment. I am wholly in sympathy with the criticisms which have been made concerning the provisions of this treaty relative to the Saar Basin. I think it is a sham in so far as any plebiscite or any right of self-determination is concerned; but the pending amendment does not in the least degree affect that question. If this amendment be adopted, all the evils of this part of the treaty will still remain. The final sovereignty of the Saar Basin, under this treaty, will not be determined by this commission, whether the United States be a member of it or not. That sovereignty, under the provisions of the treaty, will be determined by the league of nations. This amendment has nothing whatever to do with it. All that the amendment would do, if adopted, would be to render the United States ineligible to become a member of the commission for the government of the Saar Basin pending its final disposition.

We need adopt no amendment, Mr. President, to insure that the United States can not become a member of this commission without its consent. By reservation we can and, I hope, will provide that the United States shall accept membership upon no commission under this treaty unless Congress itself shall authorize such acceptance, so that, in so far as this commission is concerned, the United States can protect itself to the fullest extent without any amendment of the treaty. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, after the armistice was concluded the President appeared before Congress and declared that the objects for which we entered the war had been accomplished. Shortly afterwards the Foreign Relations Committee reported favorably Senate resolution 76. That resolution had been prepared and introduced by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and it provided as follows:

Mr. BRANDEGEE proceeded to read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the remainder of the resolution may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution entire is as follows:

"Whereas the Congress of the United States in declaring, pursuant to its exclusive authority under the Constitution, the existence of a state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, solemnly affirmed that the Imperial Government has so "committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States" that a state of war had been thrust upon them by that Government, and thereupon formally pledged the whole military and national resources of the country "to bring the conflict to a successful termination"; and

"Whereas the Senate of the United States, being a coequal part of the treaty-making power of this Government, and therefore coequally responsible for any treaty which is concluded and ratified, is deeply concerned over the draft treaty of peace negotiated at Versailles by which it is proposed to end our victorious war and is gravely impressed by the fact that its provisions appear calculated to force upon us undesirable and far-reaching covenants inimical to our free institutions under the penalty that failing to accept these we shall continue in a state of war while our cobelligerents shall be at peace and enjoying its blessings; that it is proposed to make us parties to a league of nations, under a plan as to which the people of the United States have had neither time to examine and consider nor opportunity to express regarding it a matured and deliberate judgment, whereas the treaty may be easily so drawn as to permit the making of immediate peace, leaving the question of the establishment of a league of nations for later determination; and that the treaty as drawn contains principles, guaranties, and undertakings obliterative of legitimate race and national aspirations, oppressive of weak nations and peoples, and destructive of human progress and liberty: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Senate of the United States will regard as fully adequate for our national needs and as completely responsive to the duties and obligations we owe to our cobelligerents and to humanity, a peace treaty which shall assure to the United States and its people the attainment of those ends for which we entered the war, and that it will look with disfavor upon all treaty provisions going beyond these ends.

"2. That since the people of the United States have themselves determined and provided in their Constitution the only ways in which the Constitution may be amended, and since amendment by treaty stipulation is not one of the methods which the people have so prescribed, the treaty-making power of the United States has no authority to make a treaty which in effect amends the Constitution of the United States, and the Senate of the United States can not advise and consent to any treaty provision which would have such effect, if enforced.

"3. That the Senate advises, in accordance with its constitutional right and duty, that the great paramount, if not sole duty, of the peace conference is quickly to bring all the belligerents a full and complete peace; that to this end the treaty shall be so drawn as to permit any nation to reserve without prejudice to itself for future separate and full consideration by its people the question of any league of nations, that neither such an article nor the exercise of the rights reserved thereunder, whether at the time of signature, the time of ratification, or at any other time, shall affect the substance of the obligations of Germany and its cobelligerents under the treaty, nor the validity of signature and ratification on their behalf; and that any indispensable participation by the United States in matters covered by the league covenant shall, pending the entry of the United States into the league, be accomplished through diplomatic commissions which shall be created with full power in the premises.

"4. That this resolution indicates and gives notice of the limits of the present obligations against the United States in which the Senate of the United States is now prepared to acquiesce by consenting to the ratification of a treaty embodying peace conditions that may be found otherwise acceptable to its judgment, and that the adoption by the peace conference of the foregoing reasonable limitations and positions will facilitate the early acceptance of the treaty of peace by the Senate of the United States, will in no wise interfere with the league of nations as between these countries prepared to ratify the treaty without further consideration and will afford such a manifestation of real respect for the wishes of a great people as can not fail more firmly to cement the friendship already existing between ourselves and our cobelligerents.

"5. That, finally, it shall be the declared policy of our Government, in order to meet fully and fairly our obligations to ourselves and to the world, that the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers, the United States will regard such a situation with grave concern as a menace to its own peace and freedom, will consult with other powers affected with a view to devising means for the removal of such menace, and will, the necessity arising in the future, carry out the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have not said much in reference to the ratification of the treaty of peace, but I think this amendment goes to the very vitals of the situation. Lest we forget, I wish to remind Senators that France was our ally in the war with Germany. I think we should make a just peace, and we should see that justice is done our ally; but we might as well strike out of the treaty of peace the word "justice" if we propose by our action to countenance the efforts of the German Army to freeze to death the people of France. It was only a year ago that the commander of the German armies ordered the French mines flooded with water; not to stop the French Army, but, if possible, to make the French people freeze during the winter of 1918–19. Now the time has come to balance the books and do justice; and, to my mind, even and exact justice requires the people of Germany and the German nation to pay the bill as the bill is rendered.

So far as I am concerned, I feel willing to turn the Saar Basin and its coal mines over to France permanently to pay this bill; but it is left to the future to determine what shall be the result after 15 years. For 15 years, however, the coal mines of the Saar Valley are to supply the people of France in place of the French coal mines which a year ago were destroyed deliberately, without necessity, and without cause by the German armies.

What will be the effect of this amendment? It will not affect the ultimate result, because, even if we refuse to be represented on this commission and the treaty is ratified, the commission will be there, and, thank God, justice will be done to the French people. But if we vote for the pending amendment, we say that we will not be represented on this commission, and what will be the conclusion that our allies must draw? It will be that we do not approve of the justice of this treaty; that we do not approve of the proposition that the Germans must pay in full for the fuel which they took from the nation that a year ago was struggling to maintain the battle for humanity and the rights and liberty of the world.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama pardon an interruption with a view of reinforcing what he has just said?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A few moments ago some Senator—one, at any rate, and, I think, two—said that we are turning over the Saar Basin everlastingly and indefinitely to France. Now, I wish to call attention not only to the English but to the French of this treaty. If the Senate will read Chapter III, under the head of "Plebiscite," and the same language under the head of "Consultation Populaire," which means "popular consultation," they will find this language, which is clearer in the French of the treaty than it is even in the English:

> At the termination of a period of 15 years from the coming into force of the present treaty, the population of the territory of the Saar Basin will be called upon to indicate their desires in the following manner:
> A vote will take place by communes or districts on the three following alternatives:

I will say that it was determined that the vote should take place by communes or districts, because it was thought that perhaps the population closest to the Rhine might want to vote to go with Germany; that the population closest to Lorraine might want to go with Lorraine, and perhaps the central population might want to be an independent country. I will read what the article says——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure, Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has reinforced my statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not want to ask unanimous consent for anything, because it might delay something here. I will go on. Later on I will then bring what I want in, and I will prove beyond all peradventure and challenge that all the statements about definite and ultimate French sovereignty in the Saar Basin are absolutely false.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I think attention might well be called to paragraph or subdivision 19, which will be found on page 79; it has not as yet been read into the RECORD by any of the Senators who have discussed this amendment, so, as a brief introductory to my own remarks, I desire to read it:

> Within the territory of the Saar Basin the governing commission shall have all the powers of government hitherto belonging to the German Empire, Prussia, or Bavaria, including the appointment and dismissal of officials and the creation of such administrative and representative bodies as it may deem necessary.
> It shall have full powers to administer and operate the railways, canals, and the different public services.
> Its decisions shall be taken by a majority.

Mr. President, an examination of that language reveals the fact, of course, that the powers vested in this governing commission are practically without limit. There is no constitutional provision that I know of contained in this part of the treaty, or in any other part of the document, which places any restraint upon the governing commission which is to rule the Saar Basin for 15 years. I make no criticism of that; but I do believe that we should give pause to our haste and determine whether it is an entirely healthy thing for the Government of the United States—for that is what this amounts to—to endeavor to govern or take a principal share in the government of a European community for a period of 15 years.

Mr. President, "government is politics" and politics is government."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. BORAH. It might be for an indefinite period, might it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Indeed it might, as I read the language; but I do not pretend to guess what the future will bring forth under this treaty, particularly this portion of it referring to the Saar Basin.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has plead for France, and the compensation to be given to France for the loss of her coal. So, also, has the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I make no objection whatsoever against the contention that the French people should be compensated for the terrific losses they suffered in the destruction of their coal mines in the Lens area. I make no criticism of this treaty on that ground. I hope they do get compensation; I hope the German people are made to pay; but I am not convinced that that depends upon the United States taking part in the government of a European community for 15 years.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. FALL. Of course, this plea for France is very touching, and, as the Senator says, we all agree to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Absolutely.

Mr. FALL. At the same time, this very treaty takes away from Germany, aside from the Saar Basin coal fields, all the East Prussian coal fields and the Upper Silesian coal fields, and turns them over to other nations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, it is true that there are other provisions in this treaty affecting reparations or compensations in the matter of coal. I think, under other provisions of the treaty, Germany must deliver so many million tons of coal per year to other nations for a limited number of years.

However, as I said before, I am not criticizing the proposal that France should be compensated. I may be charged with being old-fashioned, Mr. President, but I doubt the ability of the people and Government of the United States successfully to interfere with and manage the politics of Europe. This government of the Saar Basin is going to become a political problem. I think the Europeans are competent to solve it themselves. I entertain the suspicion that our interference in some of these things has been gratuitous upon our part and not by their invitation. If I thought that our services in this regard were absolutely vital and essential in securing to France compensation for the destruction or injury of the Lens area coal mines, I would say, "Yes; I will accept that burden for the United States"; but I do not believe it is essential. I doubt if there are many people who do believe it is essential. This article seems to be a part of the scheme, a part of this new philosophy which teaches or attempts to teach the American people that for indefinite periods of time they shall take part in the political concerns of Europe; and I am opposed to that philosophy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if anything should develop in the future so that it would be necessary for the United States to be on this commission, this amendment excludes her absolutely, if it is adopted, from ever being permitted to be a member of the commission, because if this amendment is adopted it becomes a part of this treaty, and we have agreed to the exclusion of the United States.

There are a great many parts of this treaty that are left to commissions, and that are as absolutely necessary to be administered, because they are executory and as important as the treaty itself. All that this does is to leave it to the council, on which the United States will have a member, to determine which ones of the disinterested parties shall administer the Saar Basin and be on the commission. If the United States does not want to be on that commission, it has a member on the council, and the decision must be by a unanimous vote of the council, as I understand. Does this provide that the question shall be determined by a majority vote of the council unless otherwise provided?

Mr. FALL. The council has nothing to do with it, has it?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; the council of the league of nations.

Mr. FALL. Very well. In the matter of all committees it is distinctly provided that the council goes by majority.

Mr. SWANSON. The council of the league of nations. Now, the United States is certainly under some obligation to the signatories to this treaty, if it makes the treaty, if it is a party to it, and makes promises that certain things shall and will be done, to see that they are done; and I can not see why the United States should be prohibited under all circumstances, and for all time to come, from being a party to seeing that this treaty is properly executed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia pardon me just a moment?

Mr. SWANSON. I will in a minute. The paragraph reads as follows:

> The governing commission provided for by paragraph 16 shall consist of five members chosen by the council of the league of nations and will include one citizen of France, one native inhabitant of the Saar Basin not a citizen of France, and three members belonging to three countries other than France or Germany.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And if the Senator will pursue it a little further——

Mr. SWANSON. Now, if this is added, it will read "or the United States of America." I have but five minutes, and the Senator can take his own time. Consequently if that is added we are excluded as much as France and Germany, and if things should develop in the future so that we wanted to be a member of that commission and it was necessary for the peace of the world, we are prohibited. I think that even if it would be wise to amend the treaty it would be unwise to amend it in this respect. I think to amend this treaty means sending it back to the peace conference to be negotiated again, which means long delay, and nobody can tell what would come out of the peace conference if it were sent back. Consequently I am opposed to all these amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. FALL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and vote "nay."

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). I desire to announce that the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate on account of illness. He has a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], which I will ask to have transferred to the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). The junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] has announced the transfer of the pair of the senior Senator from South Carolina

[Mr. SMITH] to the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. That leaves me free to vote, and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN] is detained from the city on account of illness. He has a pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. If my colleague were present and could vote, he would vote "nay." I desire that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 56, as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to say that when the bell rang for the vote which was just taken on the Saar Valley amendment I made haste to reach the Chamber. I reached the Chamber just a moment too late to vote on that call. I desired to vote for the Saar Valley amendment. I was under the impression, when the previous vote was taken this afternoon, that that particular amendment was involved in the vote. I understood that a number of amendments were being voted on en bloc at that time, as has just been done. I learned afterwards of my misapprehension. This misapprehension was due to the fact that I have not been able to be in constant attendance in the Senate.

Mr. President, I merely add that I hesitate to obligate ourselves or to have the United States assume an obligation to send our boys to the Saar Valley or elsewhere to do police duty for the next 15 or 20 years to come.

I desire, as far as possible and as fast as possible, to have the United States withdraw from European politics and European quarrels. If they desire to try the experiment, I see no reason at this time why Great Britain, France, Italy, and the other European allies should not establish a Monroe doctrine with respect to Europe as the United States has established the Monroe doctrine with respect to the Americas. My only purpose is to diminish the dangers and possibilities of war and multiply and strengthen the guaranties of peace.

I should like to have this statement follow the roll call, if there is no objection.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment of the committee is, on page 103, in article 65, after the word "allied" to strike out the words "and associated."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was calling attention to those provisions of the treaty giving the league of nations powers over the Saar Basin. We have come to the plebiscite, section 36. It reads:

If the league of nations decides in favor of the union of the whole or part of the territory of the Saar Basin with Germany, France's rights of ownership in the mines situated in such part of the territory will be repurchased by Germany in their entirety at a price payable in gold.

37.

If, in consequence of the repurchase provided for in paragraph 36, the ownership of the mines or any part of them is transferred to Germany, the French State and French nationals shall have the right to purchase such amount of coal of the Saar Basin as their industrial and domestic needs are found at that time to require. An equitable arrangement regarding amounts of coal, duration of contract, and prices will be fixed in due time by the council of the league of nations.

38.

It is understood that France and Germany may, by special agreements concluded before the time fixed for the payment of the price for the repurchase of the mines, modify the provisions of paragraphs 36 and 37.

39.

The council of the league of nations shall make such provisions as may be necessary for the establishment of the régime which is to take effect after the decisions of the league of nations mentioned in paragraph 35 have become operative, including an equitable apportionment of any obligations of the Government of the territory of the Saar Basin arising from loans raised by the commission or from other causes.

From the coming into force of the new régime, the powers of the governing commission will terminate, except in the case provided for in paragraph 35 (a).

In all matters dealt with in the present annex, the decisions of the council of the league of nations will be taken by a majority.

In view of these provisions, which I will supplement later by other provisions, I can not understand how it can be asserted that Germany, even though she is not a member of the league, is not vitally concerned in every provision of the treaty in relation to the league of nations.

Just a word further on another subject, Mr. President. I was deeply interested in the criticisms of the provision of the treaty now under consideration, because when that particular part of the treaty was under consideration at the conference at Versailles I listened to the most terrific arraignment of the President of the United States because he endeavored in the negotiations to temper in some degree the demands of France with reference to that particular territory. It was rather vulgarly but emphatically expressed by the gentleman who was conversing with me by saying, "What business has the President of the United States to stick his nose into that business?" Now the complaint is made that he was not able to succeed as well as he ought to have succeeded in reference to this feature of the treaty. In other words, he was condemned because he tried to temper them, and now he is condemned because they were too severe.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the last vote was taken I attempted to gain a hearing. I was following House rules; and I thought that if one had five minutes to talk, and took two minutes at one time, he could have the remaining three later on. The Chair ruled against me, and I think the Chair was right, under the wording of the rule.

So many misunderstandings, or misinterpretations, or misrepresentations, whichever they may be, have taken place in connection with the Saar Basin provision in the treaty, that I want to put in the RECORD just the bare words of the treaty itself. That is all I want. This is what it says under the head of "Plebiscite," chapter 3, page 87:

At the termination of a period of 15 years from the coming into force of the present treaty, the population of the territory of the Saar Basin will be called upon to indicate their desires in the following manner:

A vote will take place by communes or districts on the three following alternatives.

I want to call attention, Mr. President, to the fact that it is not only the vote of the entire country, but a vote by districts and communes, so that if there be communes up close to Lorraine that want to go to France, and communes down by the Rhine that want to go to Germany, and communes in the center that want to be independent, each one can express its own opinion and have its destiny determined by itself. This continues:

A vote will take place by communes or districts on the three following alternatives: (a) Maintenance of the régime established by the present treaty and by this annex; (b) union with France; (c) union with Germany.

Gentlemen are quarreling because our ally, France, got too much out of this. If I have any quarrel with it, it is because Germany is getting too much.

The Senator from New Mexico has just denied that the council had anything to do with it. Those are the plain words of the treaty. I continue the reading:

All persons without distinction of sex, more than 20 years old at the date of the voting, resident in the territory at the date of signature of the present treaty, will have the right to vote.

The other conditions, methods, and the date of the voting shall be fixed by the council of the league of nations in such a way as to secure the freedom, secrecy, and trustworthiness of the voting.

Even the female inhabitants of the district and the communes can vote.

I continue reading article 35:

The league of nations shall decide upon the sovereignty under which the territory is to be placed, taking into account the wishes of the inhabitants as expressed by the voting.

I remember that in committee the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] had some doubt about the meaning of that, but after my explaining it he agreed with me. Then the treaty provides (a), (b), and (c), part of it is to remain as it is, if so determined; part of it is to go to France, if so determined by vote; and a part or all to Germany, if so determined, and I will read (c).

If for the whole or part of the territory the league of nations decides in favor of union with Germany—

After taking into account the wishes of the inhabitants, as expressed by the voting of the people, males and females over 20 years of age voting—

it will be the duty of the league of nations to cause the German Government to be reestablished in the government of the territory specified by the league.

That is more than anybody ever did in a forced treaty for an enemy since the world began. This treaty differs from all other treaties in that respect; it carries justice even to the enemy. I continue to read:

36.

If the league of nations decides in favor of the union of the whole or part of the territory of the Saar Basin with Germany, France's rights of ownership in the mines situated in such part of the territory will be repurchased by Germany in their entirety at a price payable in gold. The price to be paid will be fixed by three experts, one nominated by Germany, one by France, and one, who shall be neither a Frenchman nor a German, by the council of the league of nations; the decision of the experts will be given by a majority.

How could anybody have made innocently such a misrepresentation as to what these provisions plainly contain after reading the plain language?

Mr. BORAH. I send to the desk, Mr. President, a letter, and ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, October 1, 1919.

DEAR SENATOR: In its issue of September 30, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD publishes a speech made by you in that body on September 29, from which I take the following extract:

"Sir, it is reported that upon the 26th day of February, 1919, the Secretary of the Navy declared before the Press Club in Washington: 'The constitution of the league of nations will be remembered long after the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States are forgotten.'"

I never made such a statement at the Press Club in Washington or anywhere else. I do not entertain such opinion and never gave expression to such a view. Inasmuch as you have been misled by an incorrect report, for you say "it is reported," I am sure you will wish to have this denial printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a matter of simple justice.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am very glad, of course, to have the letter inserted in the RECORD. I desire to say, however, in justification of the statement which I made, that the evidence seems to be ample that there was a complete misunderstanding upon the part of those who were present that night as to what the Secretary said, if the Secretary is now correct in his memory. I have before me, Mr. President, a copy of the special dispatch from Washington to the New York Times of February 25, 1919, which reads as follows:

[New York Times, Feb. 26, 1919, Washington dispatch of Feb. 25, 1919.]

In a speech at the National Press Club to-night Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, only a few hours after he had attended a Cabinet meeting, said that President Wilson had returned from Europe bringing with him the first draft of a document—the charter of the proposed league of nations—which would live longer than the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, because the league of nations, he added, "means for the whole world what these documents have meant for America."

Since the Secretary sent me the letter I have conversed with several parties who were present at the meeting that night, and they all understood the speech of the Secretary to be as I have quoted it.

I also have a letter addressed to me by a business man in Washington, under date of February 26, 1919, whose business place is in the Munsey Building. I do not put his name in the RECORD because I have not been able to get in touch with him to obtain his consent, but I feel free to furnish it to the Secretary of the Navy in a confidential way. His letter is as follows:

Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BORAH: At the National Press Club last evening, Secretary Josephus Daniels made a speech in which he included an appeal for support for the league of nations. He came to the club fresh from his attendance at the Cabinet meeting at the White House, where, presumably, he had been duly inspired by the atmosphere of "internationalism" which prevails there. In his speech Secretary Daniels said:

"The constitution of the league of nations will be remembered long after the Declaration of Independence and the United States Constitution are forgotten."

I do not know of any statement which has been made, of equal brevity, which so well sustains the position which you have taken on this vital matter.

You can secure confirmation of the above from any of those who were present at the club last evening. For your further information, I would say that the Secretary was speaking at that moment along the lines of the statement in the President's recent speech about the isolation which would be the lot of those who opposed the league of nations. The Secretary spoke of the oblivion suffered by those who opposed the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. Then, in an outburst of eloquence, he uttered the sentence which I have quoted literally above.

Confidentially, yours,

_____.

The letter is signed by the individual whose name, I say, I do not give for the reason that I have not perhaps the right, although I will assume the right to give it to the Secretary for his personal use in case he desires to see it.

I desire to say, too, in further justification of my statement, that I believe that the Secretary of the Navy will find that this quotation was carried by the press generally throughout the country. I saw it in several newspapers, and did not suppose there was any doubt as to the correctness of the statement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] whether it will be possible to secure unanimous consent for the consideration of some of these amendments en bloc. I will state that I have been discussing the matter with him to some extent and I think it may be possible to reach some agreement which will greatly shorten this proceeding.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I will say frankly that I have no desire for a yea-and-nay vote upon the various amendments which are pending, and am satisfied that the vote might as well be taken en bloc, though possibly it might be well to state what the amendments are.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will read the numbers slowly so that the Secretary can take them down: Nos. 7, 8, 10, 13, 14, 15, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, and 38.

Mr. FALL. It will be very satisfactory to me to have a viva voce vote taken on these amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask a question for information. Are the amendments that have just been designated those in which the words "and associated" are stricken out?

Mr. FALL. Yes; they are the amendments in which those words are asked to be stricken out, but they are not all the amendments in which the words "and associated" appear.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are a part of those?

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I inquire what amendments that would leave undisposed of of the Fall amendments?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That would leave undisposed of Nos. 9, 11, 12, 16, 17, 23, and 45, and on some of those the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] desires a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. FALL. On at least one of them I would ask a yea-and-nay vote, but as to the desire of other Senators, of course, I can not speak.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments, the numbers of which I have read from 7 to 38, may be considered en bloc and that a vote be taken on them viva voce.

Mr. FALL. I suppose it is satisfactory to the Senate to vote on them by number without knowing what they are.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the amendments which were designated by the Senator from Nebraska may be voted on en bloc and disposed of by a viva voce vote.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I only want to be perfectly clear that one of the amendments, touching the provisions dealing with the Polish or Czecho-Slovak treaty, relative to the rights of linguistic and racial minorities, shall be reserved for a roll call.

Mr. FALL. Neither of those amendments, I will say to the Senator from Illinois, is included in the list indicated by the Senator from Nebraska. The amendments referring to the Czecho-Slovak treaty and the Polish treaty are Nos. 9 and 16, respectively.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I ask if they refer to the amendment on page 129, under paragraph numbered 2 of the annex, with reference to plebiscite, area, and international government? I have not the treaty before me showing the numbers, and that is the reason why I make the inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary advises the Chair that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Washington is excepted and will be voted on separately.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the agreement proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered. The question is upon agreeing to the amendments named by the Senator from Nebraska, voting on them en bloc.

The amendments were rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 123, amendment No. 9, in article 86. The article reads:

The Czecho-Slovak State accepts and agrees to embody in a treaty with the principal allied and associated powers, etc.

After the word "allied," in line 2, it is proposed to strike out the words "and associated."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, this article is one of those touching the constitution of the Czecho-Slovak State which is being created or organized from territory belonging to several other powers. The inhabitants, of course, represent various races and as many languages and as many religions. It is proposed in the treaty with Germany, to which the Czecho-Slovak State is made a party, that a treaty shall hereafter be made between the principal allied and associated powers by the terms of which Czechoslovakia shall agree "to protect the interests of inhabitants of that State who differ from the majority of the population in race, language or religion."

Czechoslovakia, of course, may be compelled to accept this provision. Poland may be compelled to accept a similar provision under article 93. Amendment No. 16 refers to a similar proposition concerning Poland. At least one of the Allies, Roumania, who took a portion of the territory which is now taken by force of arms or by agreement of written word, to which the United States signs its name, has refused to adopt a similar provision in a treaty submitted to her. Roumania has insisted that if such provision should be written into the constitution of nations or in the treaties between them, it should be a general provision.

Roumania has distinctly stated that she would not submit to have the principal allied and associated powers force upon her a treaty of this kind when they themselves did not adopt similar provisions. Some of her great statesmen have instanced the fact that in the United States of America we have various races and religions. Some of them have referred to the fact that we have some 13,000,000 citizens of African descent in this country, and some of the statesmen of these foreign countries have insisted that before these smaller nations should be compelled by the power of the allied and associated nations to agree to a provision of this kind the five allied and associated nations should obligate themselves to a similar provision and set the example.

As I have said, one at least of our gallant allies, who suffered as much as any country has possibly suffered during this great war, Roumania, has refused to agree to such a provision in the treaty proposed with her. I do not believe that it is the business of the United States of America, nor do I believe the people will ever consent to make it their business in the event of a violation of the terms of the proposed treaty containing these provisions, made under force of arms or under duress or under bribery by Czechoslovakia or by Poland, nor will the people of the United States ever allow their Congress, if it becomes a question of the permission of Congress, to draft their men and send them across the borders to protect the racial minority or those of different language or different religion within the Czecho-Slovak State.

I believe it is useless, I believe it is futile, and I most thoroughly sympathize with the objection made by these smaller nations that if the principal allied and associated powers, the United States of America being one, compel them to adopt these provisions, they should themselves adopt them. For these reasons I moved in committee to strike out the words "and associated"—that is, the United States—from the provisions of this article, and the committee adopted the amendment.

Mr. President, there is another motive which influences me. The demands that are now made by Roumania will be made just so surely as you ever constitute a council of the league of nations or an assembly of the league of nations; and aligned then against the United States, for the purpose of compelling the United States to adopt a similar provision in our Constitution and in our laws, you will find the colored nations of the earth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from New Mexico has expired.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I concede that there is a slight difference between the case of Roumania and either Poland or Czechoslovakia. Roumania existed as an independent nation prior to the time when this treaty was negotiated. We are constituting these new nations; and I desire to inquire of the Senator from New Mexico—he may answer the question in my time—whether or not he would like to see this arrangement entered into between these new and yet unstable countries and any of the nations of Europe; in other words, whether he would like to see any kind of a guaranty that these new and unstable countries will accord religious freedom, for instance, to all the people within their boundaries? If the Senator would like to see some guaranty of that kind as between Czechoslovakia, Great Britain, and France, why should he hesitate about our assuming whatever responsibility the other countries may assume with respect to that matter?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has asked me to reply in his time, and therefore I am not violating the rules, I presume, in undertaking to reply to the question. If the Senator remains upon his feet, I suppose I can not be taken from mine.

Mr. President, of course I want religious freedom all over the earth; I want racial freedom all over the earth; and yet I am not one who goes so far as some others in the demand for racial equality. I do not know how far the Senator from Montana goes in that regard.

I want language protected all over the earth; and yet I want the English language and no other language spoken in the United States and no other language to be the language of the people. Does the Senator from Montana agree with me on that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is quite apart from my question. My question is, Whether or not the Senator from New Mexico would like to have guaranties of any kind given to any country?

Mr. FALL. No. The Senator from Montana asked me specific questions, and I am answering the specific questions. I think that it is no part of the duty of the United States to say that the Serbian language shall not be spoken in some portion of Roumania, or that any other language shall not be spoken in some portion of Roumania. I do not think it is any part of the business of the United States to say, "If you do not allow perfect freedom of language within some part of Roumania or Czechoslovakia, the United States will see that you do do it, because we have written it into a treaty for you."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has not yet answered whether he would like to have guaranties as between Czechoslovakia and any other country.

Mr. FALL. No; not with the United States obligated to carry them out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Leave the United States out of the question. Would the Senator like to see guaranties between Czechoslovakia and any other country?

Mr. FALL. Guaranties of what? Does the Senator mean of racial equality?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of racial and religious freedom.

Mr. FALL. No.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well. The Senator from New Mexico, then, as I understand him, is perfectly willing to intrust such matters to the unrestrained discretion of the new States?

Mr. FALL. If I were not, I would place them under article 23 or under article 19 of the league of nations as powers over which the league of nations should exercise a mandate. I would not provide by treaty the specific provisions which they should write into their constitutions. I would leave them under the great league of nations which it is proposed shall regulate the world.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely desire to say that in a number of treaties which we have negotiated with other countries, adding territory to our own domain, we have stipulated that we would give certain rights and privileges to the people within such territory.

Mr. FALL. Certainly, Mr. President. When we acquired from France the Louisiana Purchase, when we acquired from Spain East and West Florida and New Mexico, Arizona, California, and Texas, we promised the utmost freedom to citizens of Spanish descent remaining within our boundaries. We bound ourselves, and we have kept our promises.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But we did promise them religious freedom, did we not?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir; we promised them religious freedom and we also demanded it of Mexico; but you have sat still and allowed Mexico to adopt a constitution under which she denounces religious freedom and denounces her treaty with us; and yet you have recognized her.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. FALL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. Were he present I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore, I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I announce the same pair and the same transfer that I have heretofore announced to-day and vote "nay."

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). I desire to make the same announcement concerning my colleague, the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], that I made on a former roll call. I ask that the announcement stand for the day.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair I withhold my vote on this amendment. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Owing to the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to withdraw my vote, as I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER], who is necessarily absent from the Chamber. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS. In view of the announcement of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] as to the action of his colleague I vote "nay."

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 53—as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The SECRETARY. Amendments Nos. 11 and 12, reserved, will be found on page 129, in the same paragraph, subdivision 2, of the annex to article 88.

On line 3 of subdivision 2, the committee proposes to strike out the words "the United States of America," and the comma following; and, on the next line, after the word "Allied," it proposes to strike out the words "and Associated."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, under the consent agreement entered into a few moments ago, six amendments, included in which were the two now before the Senate, were reserved for a possible yea-and-nay vote.

I desire to say now that amendment 16 covers the provisions of a treaty with Poland similar to that which was voted on under amendment 9, with reference to Czechoslovakia, so that I shall not ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon amendment 16. I shall not ask for a yea-and-nay vote on amendment 17 and amendment 23. One relates to a plebiscite and governing commission in East Prussia, and the other relates to the same character of a government in Rosenberg and Marienburg, and certain other burgs or territories, unknown, I may say, to myself. In the case of the amendments before the Senate—that is, 11 and 12—which relate to the governing commission for the territory known as Upper Silesia, one roll call is sufficient to cover both of the amendments. The first amendment simply provides that the international commission for Upper Silesia shall not be constituted with one representative from the United States of America. I am going to read the provision to which amendment 12 applies:

It—

Referring to this district—

shall be occupied by troops belonging to the Allied and Associated Powers, and the German Government undertakes to give facilities for the transference of these troops to Upper Silesia.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator submit to a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Was any information placed before the Foreign Relations Committee as to the number of troops that would be required to police this district?

Mr. FALL. None whatever.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. How long is it expected that the troops will have to remain there?

Mr. FALL. At least 18 months, and then for an indefinite length of time; that is, until, in the opinion of the governing commission, Poland and Prussia are so quiet that the necessity for troops no longer exists. Otherwise it is indefinite.

Mr. LODGE. Is this where the two regiments have just been sent?

Mr. FALL. It is.

Mr. LODGE. We have just sent two regiments to Upper Silesia.

Mr. FALL. Already, preceded by Hilaire's army, which, however, has gone over into Poland, and is holding down Poland while Poland is acquiring certain oil and coal lands from Ukrainia. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] asks who is holding down Ukrainia. I do not know. It is rather mixed up; but Hilaire's army is holding down Poland while the Polish Army is occupied in getting a portion of Ukrainia, so that our troops are engaged in very beneficial work, I suppose. It is not necessary to comment.

This commission has unlimited governmental powers. The district is at the present time in confusion. There have been conflicts between Germans and Poles—whether between the armies of the respective governments or not is doubtful, but certainly between the citizens of the two countries—respecting the coal mines in particular, which have long been producing very large amounts of coal for the use of Prussia. Conflicts are going on now, just as they are going on in the great free city of Danzig, which the Senate will not want to vote on, I presume, by a separate yea-and-nay vote; but this is one of the questions upon which we should have the yeas and nays. We should have an expression of sentiment, it seems to me, by each of the Senators as to whether he proposes to vote for the adoption of a treaty under the terms of which we not only will maintain a governing commission in Upper Silesia, but under the terms of which the direct provision is that we shall furnish troops to occupy that area.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, as has been stated by the Senator from New Mexico, this section of the treaty provides expressly that the United States shall occupy certain portions of the territory of Upper Silesia by American troops.

The result of a policy of the kind that is provided for in this section of the treaty—the interposition of the military forces of the United States in the interior of Europe for the purpose of enforcing by military action the obligations assumed by the United States—is illustrated by an incident that occurred in Siberia a few days ago, where we have troops of the United States. One of the inevitable characteristics of the administration of such duties as are provided by this section of the treaty is that we have a comparatively small number of troops. We have duties, and we have troops for the purpose of enforcing them by military action, and it may be assumed that the number of troops we will have in Upper Silesia will not be sufficient to protect themselves against the possible and very probable antagonism that the decision of disputed questions between hostile factions and races will undoubtedly create. They are going into a fight without the possibility of being able to see it through with dignity and honor either to themselves or to the Nation which they represent.

We have a few thousand men in Siberia for the purpose of enforcing our obligations there, and in the few moments that I have at my disposal I want to read an incident which occurred, which is very likely to be repeated at any one of these various places in Europe where we are assuming obligations and proposing to send troops, either under the express provisions of the treaty, as in this case, or under the necessary implications of the treaty where it is not expressly provided for.

A press dispatch from Vladivostok, dated Friday, September 19, states as follows:

ARRESTED BY COSSACKS.

The two Americans, in uniform and on official business, went to Iman, a town 170 miles north of this city, on the section of the railroad guarded by Chinese troops, passports being unnecessary, by agreement between the Allies. While they were at a hotel there a detachment of Cossacks entered and arrested the Americans, claiming they were not provided with identification papers. Capt. Johns managed to escape, and, catching a moving train, went to Spasske, where he reported to the American officer in command. A detachment of 150 Americans from the Twenty-seventh Regiment at once entrained and went to Iman to effect Sperling's release, and on arriving there took three Cossacks as hostages.

JAPANESE DEFENDS COSSACKS.

They found Gen. Kalmikoff's men intrenched near the station and were prepared to use force against them when a Japanese major interceded for the Cossacks, stating, it is alleged, that in the event of hostilities between the Americans and Cossacks the Japanese troops at Iman would side with the latter.

* * * * * * *

AMERICAN FLOGGED.

A preliminary investigation of the incident shows, it is said, that Sperling was flogged, a punishment that is usually meted out to a recalcitrant Cossack.

The parties referred to were Capt. L. P. Johns, an officer of the American Army in Siberia, and Corpl. Sperling, a noncommissioned officer of the American forces, who were engaged in an attempt to perform these duties in a country with which we are at peace, supported by an insignificant force which is perfectly helpless there in case antagonisms are created. Under those circumstances this indignity to the uniform of the United States and to the people of the United States was perpetrated, and the United States is helpless to vindicate its honor. It is the inevitable result of this sort of inefficient meddling with governmental business in distant parts of the world which the Senator from New Mexico seeks to relieve us of in this series of amendments.

The five principal allied and associated powers were to settle the Dalmation boundary; and the result of the performance of that duty on the part of the principal allied and associated powers was that Japan, one of the principal allied powers, went home, and has paid no attention whatever to it. I do not blame Japan for doing so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Washington has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am not in favor of the United States assuming any obligation to send or maintain troops anywhere. I am not in favor of the United States assuming the obligation that is involved in this article that is proposed to be amended. But, Mr. President, it is no more necessary to amend this article to relieve the United States from that obligation than it is necessary to amend article 10 of the covenant of the league of nations, and there is no proposal to amend article 10. It is proposed to relieve the United States from the obligation imposed by article 10 by reservation, and the United States can be just as readily relieved of the obligation under this article as it can be relieved of the obligation under article 10.

I shall not vote for the treaty at all, Mr. President, unless the United States is relieved of the obligation to employ the military and naval forces of the United States for any purpose, and that includes this purpose, and a reservation of that kind will fully protect and relieve us of the obligation that is imposed under this article. It is plain to everybody, I think, that this treaty can not be ratified unless a reservation is adopted that will relieve the United States of just such obligations as this, but it is not necessary, Mr. President, to amend the treaty and send it back to the peace conference to accomplish that object.

Because that object can be fully accomplished by a reservation instead of an amendment, I am opposed to this amendment, but shall favor a reservation that will fully relieve the United States of the obligation imposed by this article.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I should like to get the Senator's opinion on the clause in the annex which reads:

It shall be within the competence of the commission to interpret the powers hereby conferred upon it and to determine to what extent it shall exercise them.

And then, again:

The commission will maintain order with the help of the troops which will be at its disposal.

If we ratify this treaty, do we not lose all control of the troops we have placed under that commission?

Mr. LENROOT. The answer is that when the treaty is ratified we will have no troops there. The moment the treaty is ratified, with the reservation we propose to adopt, our troops will be withdrawn, unless Congress expressly authorizes their maintenance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If we have troops there, how can we get them out?

Mr. LENROOT. Because those troops, unless the President violates his oath of office, with that reservation can not be lawfully kept there for a single hour.

Mr. MOSES. But suppose the President declines to deposit the ratification of the treaty, as has been threatened through the newspapers?

Mr. LENROOT. If the President declines to deposit the ratification of the treaty, you can make all the amendments to this treaty that you choose, and they will not be worth the snap of your finger.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the eleventh and twelfth amendments in subdivision 2.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, do I understand that this vote is to cover both amendments 11 and 12?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent, amendments 11 and 12 in subdivision 2 of the annex to article article 88, on page 129, will be submitted at a single vote. The yeas and nays are demanded. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as on the previous vote and vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as heretofore and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who was compelled to leave the Chamber. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would on these two amendments vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). On this question my general pair the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is released and can be otherwise paired.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. GRONNA. I transfer my pair with my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 46, as follows:

So the amendments were rejected.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, under the agreement which was arrived at, all the remaining amendments to be voted on, as

I understand the agreement to be, may now be voted on by viva voce in one vote.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that to be the case, but can the Senator recall what amendments still remain to be acted upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Amendments 16, 17, and 23.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is my recollection,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] asks unanimous consent that amendments 16, 17, and 23 be voted upon together. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The amendments were rejected.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I would like to suggest, before we adjourn, that I think the proceedings this afternoon have undoubtedly convinced any doubting Thomas that there is no intention to filibuster upon the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, October 3, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, October 2, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, creator, upholder and sustainer of all, we humbly bow in Thy presence and acknowledge with gratitude our indebtedness to Thee for all things; and we humbly pray that by the nobility of our thought and rectitude of our behavior, we may acknowledge Thy goodness and wonderful works to the children of men, this day. In the spirit of the Lord Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. BROWNING was granted leave of absence for three days, on account of important business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the form of resolutions of the Society of Sons of the Revolution of the State of California upon the subject of Bolshevism and other matters of importance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing resolutions adopted by the Sons of the Revolution of California on Bolshevism and kindred subjects. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the subject of those things?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. OSBORNE. Two things. One is the character of foreign immigration, and the other is on the subject of Bolshevism, both very pertinent to the time and without any partisan bias.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does the article that the gentleman attempts to put in the RECORD cry down Bolshevism?

Mr. OSBORNE. Well, it is not in favor of Bolshevism.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, unless it denounces it in unmistakable terms, I shall object. The time has come when we should quit monkeying with that subject. I shall object.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman can not qualify his objection in that way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not object conditionally. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, by reason of the poem which was put in yesterday by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] on a subject with which, in my judgment, it had no connection at all, until I can see the article I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 208. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to expend certain sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, and June 30, 1920, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege respecting the integrity of the proceedings of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, September 30, after the conclusion of the consideration of the cold-storage bill, so called, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], on page 6165 of the RECORD, secured unanimous consent for all gentlemen in the House to have three legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the cold-storage bill, and in the RECORD yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] extended his remarks upon the cold storage, presumably, by putting in a dozen or so lines in which the words "cold-storage bill" appear once, and then putting in a poem of some 10 or 12 stanzas entitled "Our Own—A Cry Across the Atlantic," by Israel Zangwill. It is a very eloquent poem, and I presume perhaps that the view of the gentleman from New York was that he was putting this poem in cold storage by having it inserted in the RECORD [laughter], and that, therefore, it was a proper insertion under the consent secured by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Now, the RECORD is being rather taxed to its capacity, and the patience of the many readers of it, I think, is being somewhat burdened by extensions of remarks, speeches, and articles that are caused to be put in it by a jurisdiction other than the House. But it is just such insertions as these, I think, that make the RECORD appear to be a sort of semicomic daily magazine. It is clearly not within the purview of the consent which was granted to print a poem of that length in the RECORD, and it has nothing to do with the subject of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the poem about—cold storage?

Mr. WALSH. No; the poem is about——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Read it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. It is about a certain race of people——

Mr. ASHBROOK. Irish? [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. And the suffering that they have encountered during the ages, and so forth, and the blood that courses through their veins.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it the Irish? [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. No; it is not the Irish. But, Mr. Speaker, in view of the consent that was granted and in view of what appears to me to be a plain infraction of the rules of the House in making this extension, I move that the poem in the RECORD of October 1 entitled "Our Own—A Cry Across the Atlantic," by Israel Zangwill, which was inserted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL], be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve that until my colleague gets into the House?

Mr. WALSH. Yes. I wanted to offer it on the moment, but action can be deferred until the gentleman from New York is present.

DUTY ON MAGNESITE ORE.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5218.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5218. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] will resume the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5218, with Mr. ANDERSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5218, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5218) to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of magnesite ores and manufactures thereof in the United States.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, magnesite is a mineral that is indispensable in the manufacture of steel. Before the war, practically the entire supply of this mineral came from Austria.

There was some also shipped to this country from Greece, and I understand that some was sent from southeastern Germany. When the war broke out it was impossible for the foreign product to be shipped to this country. In the first place, tonnage was not available, and in the next place there was a rather tight cordon drawn around Austria and the ports that received the cargoes to be transported from Austria to the United States. It was in this extremity that those who had been engaged in the manufacture of magnesite bricks turned to the western part of our country for their supply. Magnesite had not been produced in any considerable quantity in this country for quite a period of time, because the manufacturers could not compete with the producers of Europe. The wage that is paid per day in the Austrian fields, I am told, is a maximum of about $1.10 a day. I am told that women work in the industry there at a very much reduced wage. The wages that prevail in the States of California and Washington in the mining of this commodity are $5 a day, and it requires no prophet or son of a prophet to see what will happen to the American industry operating at that high cost of labor if it is thrown into direct competition with the article that is produced at a so much lower cost of labor in Austria. It is contended that the Austrian article is a very excellent quality of magnesite. It seems there is a solution of iron in the Austrian product that is very serviceable when the product is manufactured into bricks. In order to make the American product equally valuable it has to be treated and the iron has to be introduced artificially and separately.

It is contended by the people in the West that unless they receive the tariff proposed in this bill they will have to go out of business. Now, the production of magnesite is really an infant industry in this country. The war made it necessary for those who could go into the region where it was found to do so. It made the production of it obligatory by those who could produce it. Our steel production would have been materially decreased and possibly stopped altogether if this had not been done. The mine owners accepted the situation and frankly put their money into the venture. My constituents in San Francisco put over $1,000,000 into one mine alone in order to supply the magnesite that was necessary for the manufacture of the steel products of this country. Practically all of the western mines have closed down already, because those who buy the burned magnesite are waiting for the introduction of the Austrian article which will come in at such a low rate that the purchase of the home-mined article will be unprofitable; and although in California there were 17 counties in which magnesite was mined during the war, not a single mine is operting in that State at the present time; for, as I say, the manufacturers of magnesite brick and magnesite grain in the East who supply the steel mills are not buying the domestic article, because they feel that the product from Austria will soon arrive in abundance and will be sold so much cheaper than the domestic article can possibly be sold for that they do not want to take a chance of loading up on the native American magnesite. They are not buying magnesite at present, and all plants in the West have had to close.

This industry is an important one. This country ought never again to allow itself to be caught in the position it was in when this war broke out. We were entirely dependent upon the foreign market for this commodity. If perchance by any circumstance the supply from abroad were shut off, unless the Congress will give a sufficient encouragement to the domestic article you will never again find capital willing to go into the industry on a mere chance. Those owners of magnesite mines who have invested their capital have not been able to get a return on their investment. Much of their money is and will be a dead loss unless this legislation is passed, so that the domestic industry can continue in competition with the cheaper foreign article.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman from North Carolina use some of his time now?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, bidden by that impulse of hospitality which is proverbial among the people of my State and section, I have come to ask each and every one of my colleagues in Congress to pay us a neighborly visit. October 7–10 the great Confederate Reunion will meet in Atlanta, Ga. Some have thought that it may be the last meeting ever held because of the fact that the veterans are growing so old and feeble, and that the remnant of the "fast-thinning lines of gray" grows smaller with every setting sun. Speaking for my whole State, and especially for my own great capital city—an invitation in which all of my Georgia colleagues heartily join—I lay at the feet—may I say at the door of the heart—of every Congressman a cordial invitation to attend this reunion and find out personally, if you are so poor as not to know, just what an old-time southern welcome is like.

One of our honored colleagues, Mr. COLLIER, of Mississippi, is to respond to the address of welcome for the Sons of Confederate Veterans; for the gallant sons are to meet and mingle during this festal week amid the inspiring fellowship of their gallant sires.

We want you to come because we want you to come. [Laughter.] We want you to come for our sakes in order that we may have the blessing and inspiration that would come from your splendid presence; and then, very frankly, we want you to come for your own sakes, for we want you to know what it means to look at the heroic forms and tottering steps of our hero fathers who never trembled when carrying burdens and facing hardships for the States that they honored and the people that they loved; we want you to look into the faces—before they so soon pass away; faces that are "grizzled, grand, and gray," and dearer even than when they dashed, like the charge of the Light Brigade, into the battle's blazing hell. We find ourselves wondering with what a shower of devotion the South will throw its clinging arms of love about the last survivor of the cause for which Robert E. Lee fought and Stonewall Jackson fell—the last Confederate soldier whose wrinkled brow, fanned by the breezes of Beulah Land, waits for the summons to "cross over the river and rest under the shade of the trees." But before they all hear the call to the eternal camping ground we want you to see eye to eye and face to face these brave old patriots, but yesterday the knightly soldiers of the Stars and Bars, game losers in a tournament nobler far than ever shattered lance at Camelot or Stirling, and now, thank God, soldiers in spirit and defenders in fact of all the rippling beauty and glory of the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.] We want you to see these patriots and patriarchs who were true enough to stand for convictions of government dearer than life, and who were brave enough and wise enough in the aftermath of a providential defeat to teach their sons around their family altars to love the flag of their reunited country. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. UPSHAW. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. If by going to Atlanta we could sidetrack some of these tungsten ore bills, chemical, glass, and surgical instrument bills, pearl-button bills, magnesite bills, and other bills, the sidetracking of which would be a benefit to the people of the United States, it would pay Congress to take a recess of a week and go down there to your city. [Laughter.]

Mr. UPSHAW. May I say to the gentleman from Texas that, appreciating the very keen and pertinent suggestion he has made, I have come to bring a message of general good fellowship, purely a message of invitation, and I hope he will excuse me if I do not turn aside now to discuss the tariff.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UPSHAW. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BARBOUR. In the gentleman's opinion ought not the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to include in his list a few useless roll calls? [Laughter.]

Mr. UPSHAW. If the gentleman will allow me, I will bring you the message of invitation from my home city. God willing—and I want you all to hear this—I would love to be living when the last survivor of the gray and the last survivor of the blue shall be brought here within these sacred walls, and clasping hands in a beautiful fellowship which only true soldiers on both sides can understand, let them cement with their latest word and their latest deed the once sundered sections in a glorious spirit of national love that would put the last partisan to a stammering hush and crown within this temple of patriotism "a national glory and grandeur without a parallel in the annals of ages." [Applause.]

Come to Atlanta, my colleagues, and see there the statue of Henry W. Grady, the great seer, statesman, and pacificator, who died "literally loving a Nation into peace." Come to Atlanta and see revolving about that statue the activities of a great city amid whose bricks and mortar, as Grady declared in his New England dinner speech that so mightily touched and stirred the Nation's heart, "There is not buried one single bitter prejudice—not one ignoble memory." [Applause.] Come to Atlanta for your own sakes as well as ours, for you do not want to go to heaven, you do not want to walk the streets of the New Jerusalem, until you have walked the streets of Atlanta, the most famous city of a quarter of a million people on the American continent; a city whose very curbstones are surcharged with the electricity of progress, and beneath the ambient blue of whose arching skies there grow surely the bravest men and the fairest women on whom the sun ever shone, for we believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is almost as near to heaven from Atlanta as it is from Washington or even from Boston herself. [Laughter and applause.] Come to Atlanta, my colleagues, and see a city whose enthusiasms have always gathered around the things that are highest and best, a city whose temples of learning and whose temples of worship are the inspiration of the South and a bulwark of strength and hope to our threatened civilization.

Come to Atlanta, the progressive home of Emory University, Oglethorpe University, Lanier University, Cox College, Georgia Military Academy, Agnes Scott College, Washington Seminary, Spellman Seminary, Gammon Seminary, Clark University, and a half dozen progressive commercial colleges, together with famous Georgia "Tech," the greatest technological school in all the South. Come and see the city of splendid auditoriums, the great city auditorium—the meeting place of the reunion—seating 9,000 people—Washington ought to have one like it—the Baptist Tabernacle, seating 3,000; Wesley Memorial, seating 2,500; and a dozen superb theaters that would be the pride of any metropolis. Come and see our mayor, the forward-looking friend of upward-reaching humanity; our governor, young in years but keen and clean, bright, and brave; our sheriff, as handsome as he is fearless and efficient; and our far-famed chief of police, who proved in a campaign for civic righteousness that he is "not afraid of povery, the poorhouse, death, nor the devil." Come to Atlanta and find a chamber of commerce, positively wild on the subject of spreading the famous "Atlanta spirit" to the four corners of the earth—a chamber of commerce that will stay up until midnight working for your happiness, then stay awake until daybreak planning for your joys of the morrow, and then get up with the early streakings of the morning's light to put into execution its dreams for your diurnal bliss and your nocturnal felicity! [Applause.] Come and see the great military posts—Fort McPherson, Camp Jesup, and that marvel of mobilization, Camp Gordon, from whose hurried but wonderful training countless thousands of the flower of America's young manhood went forth to frighten the Huns into subjection far earlier than the most sanguine patriot dreamed. [Applause.] Come and see the homes of the three great metropolitan papers—the Atlanta Journal, the Atlanta Constitution, and the Atlanta Georgian-American—the breeziest bunch of boosting dailies that any metropolis ever had since Columbus discovered America! [Laughter.] Come and see Kenesaw Mountain, where brave men on both sides, in the sixties, found how brave Americans could be; come and see Stone Mountain, the biggest solid rock in the world.

Come to the heart of "Dixie" where the white snows of billowing fields of cotton melt into the music of millions of spindles that sing the jubilant song of Southern prosperity as they clothe the sons and daughters of the habitable globe. Come and see how a "city fair," of a quarter of a million, has added 100,000 of that aggregate since barrooms were banished a dozen years ago. Come to this great industrial center and see the largest bank in all the South, with resources of $50,000,000! Come and see your own Federal reserve bank that has so stabilized our finances that panic is "rare as a day in June or a Chinaman with whiskers." [Laughter.] Come to Atlanta and we will fan you with southern breezes, bathe you in southern sunshine, and if it were only the "good old summer time" we would feed you on Georgia peaches and feast you on that delectable edible known as the "Georgia watermillion"! And this bit of plantation vernacular reminds me that one of the chief attractions in Atlanta for the real lover of humanity, especially children, will be the "Wren's Nest," the home where Joel Chandler Harris—Uncle Remus—dreamed his quaint dreams and wrote his inimitable stories for the fascination and delight of the children of the world.

And, ah, come and see where Frank L. Stanton, the beloved James Whitcomb Riley of the South, has for 25 years sung himself into national fame and his minstrel music into the hearts of reading millions. Hear Stanton teach a great city its basic philosophy—

If you's hear the Bells of Hope,
Fellers, you must pull the rope.

Hear Charles W. Hubner, our poet philosopher and patriarch, teach that wholesome, beautiful truth—

They lose life's sweetest zest
Who long for stagnant rest.

Come and see where Georgia's brilliant orator-historian, Lucian L. Knight, has written the scholarly works that have enriched the libraries of thousands of thoughtful Americans, and, ah, my fair-minded colleagues, come and see where the man who taught this Georgian genius at Princeton, Woodrow Wilson, first swung his shingle to the breeze as he began that masterful career that made him the far-famed President of the greatest Nation on earth! [Applause.]

Come on to Atlanta, my colleagues, and take anything you see, and ask for anything you do not see, for Atlanta has plenty of glorious things that are simply "out of sight." Come to my home city, my colleagues, and you will find amid all her smiling plentitude of joys and her princely dower of blessings, her progress, her culture, and her consecration, a homogenous and a patriotic people, where wealth, for the most part, gratefully acknowledges its membership with labor, and labor, for the most part, is more concerned about the reign of righteousness in the heart than the coin of gold in the pocket.

But, first of all and last of all, my colleagues, come to Atlanta for the priceless fellowship and the sacred inspiration of the great Confederate reunion—compatriots all in spirit of our own gallant colleague and Confederate hero, Maj. STEDMAN [applause], catching there in the full-orbed splendor of the love and loyalty of these old battle-scarred veterans for the Stars and Stripes a new vision of the forces that have made an indispensable contribution to the building of this Republic, a new cause for singing a national doxology, a new reason for thanking God for our new-bought heritage as a Nation and our newborn fellowship of a once divided people. [Applause.]

Verily, my colleagues, the southern sun is rising high to warm the Nation's heart, the glory of this beautiful truth has broken fast and far on land and sea; and every service star that turned to gold in the radiant sunburst of the South's devotion to our common flag tells anew, thank God, of the measureless triumph of our civilization. [Applause.]

Colleagues and comrades of Congress, come to Atlanta! [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, at this time there are many strange and radical doctrines abroad in the land and which are being preached and propagandered from one end of our country to the other. Some of these doctrines challenge the very foundation and citadel of our Government, and the boldness with which they are uttered and the systematic vigor with which they are preached will not permit of their being ignored. We must prepare to combat them, to demonstrate their absurdity, and point out their destructiveness. The influx of certain foreign immigration to our shores during the last 20 years or more has brought to us many of the unwholesome and vicious doctrines of the Old World, which have grown up there in an atmosphere of poverty, ignorance, and oppression, and these have received an added impetus by the present Russian experiment in communism, an experiment which promises to be the greatest tragedy in history, not excepting the French Revolution. These agitators who are variously named, such as the I. W. W.'s, communists, socialists of the left, syndicalists, and so forth, are all going in the same direction, and their end is destruction. They freely talk about the dictatorship of the proletariat and the establishment of their system of communist control of all property, which the experience of the world has discredited over and over again through the period of a thousand years. Failing to convince us of the merits of their vagaries by argument, some of them are foolish enough to think they can force them upon us by a reign of violence and terrorism. But in this they sadly mistake the temper of the American people. Our people are patient and long suffering in their indulgence, but when aroused they are swift and certain in the execution of their judgment. Some of these agitators have mistaken the quiet reserve of the people for indifference and cowardice, but they will find out their mistake to their own sorrow and discomfiture. [Applause.]

NO PLACE FOR MEN WHO ADVOCATE DICTATORSHIP.

This country has no place for any man or set of men who advocate the overthrow of our Government and the establishment of a dictatorship, whether that dictatorship is to be of the proletariat or whether it is to be of the plutocracy. [Applause.] Dictatorship? No; this country will never tolerate a dictatorship of any kind. Our ideal is that of a representative democracy, where every citizen is a sovereign and where the man of humble circumstances and the man of large means meet at the ballot box on terms of equality and the voice of one is as potent as the other. Yes, but says some one, "Elections have not always been clean and the voice of wealth and privilege has often been heard in the corruption of the electorate and the vote of the honest man has been stifled by the ballot of the vicious and dishonest." Quite true; that has sometimes happened, but it does not follow in the least that the principle of our representative democracy is unsound. Slowly but surely we are weeding out the corrupt element in American politics, and there are but few places now in this great American Commonwealth where tho ballot does not have a free and unfettered expression. And we will not stop until every corrupt element, high or low, is driven out of politics, so that the expression of the ballot will be clean and free from fraud and corruption, and, equally as important, from intimidation and coercion, whether that intimidation and coercion is sought to be exerted by organizations of capital or whether it is sought to be exerted by organizations of labor. And let all be assured that America, the cradle of liberty, the world's best example of representative democracy, will have none of the dictatorship of the proletariat or any other kind of despotism by a particular class or group. [Applause.]

The United States Government simply can not afford to have any group of its citizens, I do not care who they are and how large their number, undertake to dictate legislation by methods of intimidation and coercion. Whenever that day comes, if it should ever come in the history of this country, then there is bound to be an end of popular government, because it could not live in an atmosphere of that sort. [Applause.]

IMPROVEMENT OF OUR INSTITUTIONS WILL NOT COME AT THE HANDS OF THE MAN WHO HURLS THE CYNIC'S BAN, BUT BY OUR BEST AND MOST ENLIGHTENED CITIZENS.

In this country, where the freedom of the press and freedom of speech has been indulged almost to the point of license, attacks are being freely made upon our most sacred institutions—the home, the church, and the State. There has never been a time in our history when so many radical and revolutionary publications were handing about and circulating their inflammatory doctrine as now and never a time when there were such insidious and determined assaults being made upon our Government and its civil institutions.

It will be interesting to note what evil and pernicious doctrines are advocated by some of these organizations, such as the I. W. W. and the radical Socialists, who style themselves the Socialists of the Left, and the new radical party recently organized at Chicago, the Communist Party. I read for your information a paragraph taken from one of their publications, Revolutionary, I. W. W., page 7. It says:

The Industrial Workers of the World is an international movement, not merely an American movement. We are "patriotic" for our class, the working class. We realize that as workers we have no country. The flags and symbols that once meant great things to us have been seized by our employers. To-day they mean naught to us but oppression and tyranny. As long as we quarrel among ourselves over differences of nationality we weaken our cause, we defeat our own purpose.

Think of it; an organization right here in our own country, perpetually agitating about the freedom of speech and the press, yet boldly declaring that they have no country and yield allegiance to no flag, except the red flag. Beware of the man without a country. Sir Walter Scott had him in mind when he wrote those immortal lines:

Breathes there the man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said
This is my own, my native land.

[Applause.]

And then Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, the noted I. W. W. agitator, describes sabotage, which they openly urge and advocate, under several heads, the principal of them being:

(1) Adulteration of foods.
(2) The slowing down of work.
(3) A general reduction of efficiency.
(4) Intimidation, coercion, and any means necessary to gain the end.

In other words, the doctrine of rule or ruin, and with an utter and heartless disregard of the rights of all others who do not belong to their particular class, or to the proletariat, as they love to style themselves.

An investigation conducted recently by a committee of the New York State Senate made some rather startling disclosures of radical activities carried on in this country, and among some of the radical literature unearthed was a form letter sent out by the correspondence department of the Socialist Rand School, of which David P. Berenberg is director. This letter declared:

What are you going to do when the State robs you and your union and so makes you helpless to strike? There is only one thing to do. Take over the State. Are the members of your local prepared to take over and conduct wisely and well the affairs of your town and country? Are you ready to meet the militia when the powers of the State and courts are against you?

And let me read you a few paragraphs from the platform of the Communist Party, recently organized in the city of Chicago:

The Communist Party is the conscious expression of the class struggle of the workers against capitalism. Its aim is to direct this struggle to the conquest of political power, the overthrow of capitalism by means of the proletarian revolution and destruction of the bourgeoise state.

The Communist Party prepares itself for the revolution in the measure that it develops an immediate program of action, expressing the mass struggle of the proletariat. These struggles must be inspired with revolutionary spirit and purposes.

Under the guise of freedom of speech and freedom of the press, are we to have seditious, radical, destructive literature like that? I am as firm a believer in the freedom of speech and freedom of the press as any man, and I yield to no one in my veneration for the Constitution, but I do not believe that it was ever intended to guarantee any man the right to libel the character of a private citizen or utter treasonable assaults upon the Government. In fact, I know it was not, for the highest courts of our land have decided again and again that the freedom of speech and the press, like every other right, must be limited to be enjoyed, and, like every human advantage, may be defeated by its abuse.

I could continue to read you a great deal more of such vicious and inflammatory literature, because I have a large file of it which I have accumulated from time to time in my study of the subject, but what I have read gives you a fair idea of the wickedness and hate which is behind it, and I will not multiply the instances further in that regard.

There is absolutely no difference in the creed and practice of the Bolsheviki in Russia, under the leadership of Lenin and Trotski, and the I. W. W. and so-called socialists of the left and communists in this country, under the leadership of Haywood, John Reed, and other radicals of their kind. They all advocate the abolition of private property rights, development of government by soviet committees, and communal control of industry and trade.

Recently the Dutch minister to Petrograd returned to Holland and made an illuminating statement concerning conditions in Russia. He characterized Bolshevism as "the end of civilization." Translated into practice, he declared, "the Bolsheviki principles are high wages for no work, the taking of other people's property without punishment, and no taxation." "The Russian workers," he declared, "are far worse off than ever before. The future to me seems hopeless. One thing is certain, and that is if she is left as she is now Russia will be completely and utterly ruined."

Our own ambassador to Russia, Mr. David R. Francis, recently returned from Archangel and brings back the same dark picture of conditions there. Also we have learned it from other innumerable reliable sources.

For instance, Madam Catherine Breshkovsky, known the world over as the grandmother of the Russian Revolution, recently said, on leaving America for France:

To a person that has spent half of her 75 years in prisons and Siberia snows, it seems a miracle to have come a second time from Russia to America; to have a chance to make an extensive tour of the United States. The first time it was the despotism of the Czar's régime that forced me to call the attention of American people to the suffering of my good people. This time I come here to say that Russia delivered from the old slavery suffers under the despotism and cruelty of thousands of criminals called Bolsheviki. I came to say that not only the War with Germany, but also the terrible anarchy thrust upon Russia by the united forces of her enemies have cast Russia into a hell of disorder, bloodshed, and ruin. This evil has increased the loss of human life to such a degree that now Russia has no less than 4,000,000 orphans who are doomed to perish under terrible circumstances if nobody comes to offer them the succoring hand.

Thus we have a living, concrete example of what results will follow the putting into practice of these pernicious doctrines advocated by such hostile enemies of our Government as the destructive organizations which I have named. We should always bear in mind that it takes ability and genius to construct, but that any fool can tear down and destroy. It took the genius of a Raphael to paint the Sistine Madonna and of a Michaelangelo to create with his wonderful imagination the scenes of "The Last Judgment." It took the ability of Phidias to adorn the city of Athens with his sculptures and the matchless oratory of Demosthenes to charm the people with his eloquence, but a man of very ordinary ability or with no ability at all, as for that matter, can tear down and destroy what it took them a lifetime to build and construct. It took ability of the very highest order to write our Constitution and frame our system of laws, and we had better be mighty careful how we allow some of these high-brow socialists and parlor Bolsheviks to experiment with it.

Of course, I know our Government and the civilization which has grown up under it are not perfect. The home can no doubt much improve the sacredness of its altars. The church can no doubt increase its usefulness a thousandfold, and our Government itself can extend its sphere of influence in many helpful ways, but these improvements will not come at the hands of the man who hurls the cynic's ban and who arrays himself in hostile attitude against our Constitution and system of laws, but will be the product of those who are in thorough sympathy and accord with the best American history and tradition.

WE MUST EDUCATE OUR YOUTH IN THE FUNDAMENTALS OF DEMOCRACY.

To keep our Americanism 100 per cent pure, and to see to it that our children preserve our civilization free from this dangerous stream of anarchy and disorder, is one of the responsibilities that is now upon the present generation. In the discharge of this responsibility we can do no better thing than to educate our youth in the fundamentals of democracy, so that they may learn allegiance to the faith of our fathers, a holy faith which they translated by blood and sacrifice into liberty and justice under the dominion of law and order.

I believe in party government. I believe that in a Republic where the people rule by the power of the ballot it is necessary to have political parties in order that the will of the people may have avenues of expression, but while I believe that, I also believe that before a man is a Democrat, before he is a Republican, before he is a Socialist, he should first of all be an American, standing for the preservation of the Constitution and the majesty of law. If he is not that kind of a Democrat, or Republican, or Socialist, then I put small appraisement on his worth as a citizen, regardless of what party he belongs to.

Gentlemen, we are facing great questions within the immediate future, questions that will test the mettle of the Republic, questions which are too big, which are too important, to be solved along narrow and bigoted partisan lines. Political parties we, of course, must have, but intolerant and narrow partisanship we do not need, and God forbid that we shall have.

THE PALLADIUM OF OUR LIBERTIES IS THE CONSTITUTION.

All real Americans have always believed that the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States are the rock and foundation of our Republic, and that upon them rest the permanence and security of our liberties. Can any man who embraces the doctrine of these parties of destruction, which hold the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution in derision and contempt, be a true American? No; he can not be. He is no more a true American than an atheist or infidel who denounces the Apostles' Creed is a Christian.

There is no substitute for that creed and leave us a Christian, and so it is with our Government. We want none of this Bolshevism and syndicalism and socialism and I. W. W.ism as a substitute for Americanism. Lenin and Trotski are enslaving Russia with their new theory of the soviet government. Haywood and his crowd are preaching their I. W. W. doctrines of direct action; socialists like John Reed and Eugene V. Debs are proclaiming their radical ideas of revolution, but, so far as I am concerned, the Constitution of Washington and Hamilton and Madison and Jefferson, with such amendments as are necessary from time to time to meet changed conditions, is good enough for me. Remembering the force of such an example as Russia, now in the grasp of anarchy and chaos, it will be well that we be not too easily dazzled by some of these new and modern isms with which the world is flooded to-day. In the midst of these it will be profitable for us to assume the serious contemplation of rugged, lasting qualities of government in whatever age or garb they have appeared.

THE GUARANTY OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The whole essence of the Constitution, it seems to me, is involved in that part of it which says that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." That is within itself the highest and best purpose of government, and when that beneficent end is lost sight of then the whole end and purpose of government is destroyed. Any government which does not guarantee and secure to its citizens protection of their lives, liberties, and property is a tyranny and is intolerable to freemen. Of course, of these three natural rights the right of property is less sacred, and if either had to be surrendered it would naturally come first, and yet if the property of the citizen be not protected from unlawful seizure and confiscation there is no incentive to accumulate and one of the greatest of all civilizing influences is lost. The protection of the citizen in the enjoyment of his property rights is one of the oldest and most highly prized rights of the Anglo-Saxon race. Edmund Burke, in his great speech on the excise bill, said:

> The poorest man may in his cottage bid defiance to all the forces of the Crown. It may be frail; its roof may shake; the wind may blow through it; the storms may enter; the rains may enter; but the King of England can not enter. All his forces dare not cross the threshold of the ruined tenement.

[Applause.]

I am glad that we live in a country where there is security of investment, where the ownership of private property is protected, and where every citizen has the stimulus to produce because of the knowledge that he will be permitted to accumulate the fruits of his labor. I would be sorry to live in a country where the citizen could not have that assurance. I have no sympathy with that point of view which would penalize a man because he has been economical and thrifty and has saved up something to meet the needs of a rainy day. Savings of capital are for the most part the savings of the wages of yesterday, and the wages of yesterday should be as safe from confiscation and destruction as the wages of to-day and the wages of to-morrow. You can not deny fair earnings to capital without ultimately impoverishing labor, and by fair earnings I mean only those which are reasonable and just. Poverty can not be abolished by destroying wealth. If the citizen has no assurance that his accumulations made through thrift and self-denial will be protected by the authority and energy of government, then he will not accumulate and chaos and industrial anarchy is the inevitable result. [Applause.[

These radical agitators, with their alluring promises, come to the laborer and say to him: "You have created all this wealth; rise up and seize it; it is yours"; and, although the particular individual to whom he speaks may have been employed in the industry but for a short while and has had little to do with the establishment of the business, he sometimes readily seizes upon the poisoned arrow and becomes a convert to such doctrine. The miner, for instance, who allows himself to think along these distorted lines does not stop to think that the iron ore which he brings to the top of the mine would be worth nothing if it were not carried on to the furnace and there melted into pig iron by other workers, and then the pig iron would be of no value except it be carried to the steel mills, where other workers press it into plates and mould it into bars of steel, and then these plates and bars of steel would be worth nothing except they be transported to the factories and made into plows and thrashing machines and axes and saws and hammers and a thousand other implements of husbandry and commerce, and then none of these articles would have any value except for the fact that the farmer and the mechanic and the laborer buys them to use in producing the real wealth of the world, and each exchanges his product for the product of the other, and uses as the medium of exchange the system of finance, the value and integrity of which is guaranteed and safeguarded by the Government. And for one class or group to pretend that it creates the wealth of the country is the limit of folly, and can only find lodgment in a disordered mind. I regret that some of the labor unions of the country have within their ranks at least a limited number of men who hold to that point of view. I am sincerely hoping that those who do not hold such views will have the good sense and wise judgment to repudiate such leadership and stand four square for orderly progress under our Constitution and Government. My point of view on this labor question is this:

Union labor has all the rights of any other organization; its members all the rights of an American citizen. Neither can have any more and preserve a government of law for all the people. To do otherwise is to degenerate into a class or group government, and God forgid that we should ever be so foolish as to do that. As illustrating what labor can do alone and what capital and labor can do working together, I read the following illustration a few days ago:

The Chinese coolie, equipped with a carrying pole, the most efficient method of man carrying known, totes 100 pounds 20 miles in a day. A ton-mile a day for a compensation of 10 cents. The coolie is worked so hard that he wears out in four years. A James J. Hill conceived the idea of a transcontinental, unsubsidized railroad from the head of the Great Lakes to a Pacific harbor. The lands were there, but not yet farmed; mines were there, but not yet opened; lumber was there, as yet uncut. China and Japan needed American wheat, so Mr. Hill borrowed the savings of the economical Hollanders, $10,000 for every man he was to employ, and he created and directed a great transcontinental road, combining into one functionary whole the materials, equipment, and workers. Instead of earning 10 cents a day, like the Chinaman, these employees of his, in shorter hours and in far easier occupation, earned daily thirty times as much. The cost of transportation was reduced from the Chinese standard of 10 cents a ton-mile to the American standard of 1 cent a ton-mile; the distance per day was increased from 20 miles to 100 miles.

Do you suppose that the work of a James J. Hill would ever be produced by a committee of soviet agitators under the dictatorship of the proletariat? Of course it would not be; and yet, to my amazement, the idea is advocated here in this country in the so-called nationalization of basic industries. I do not believe that these radical and revolutionary schemes will ever receive the indorsement of the American people. [Applause.]

LIBERTY UNDER LAW.

The great jurist, Chief Justice John Marshall, who did more to develop and vitalize the Constitution by interpreting it and expounding it than any other man in the history of our Republic, and who, on account of his great constructive decisions during a long judicial career, deserves to rank with such immortal few as Washington, Hamilton, and Jefferson, never in all of his great career said a wiser thing than this:

Real liberty can only be preserved by preserving the authority of the laws and maintaining the energy of government.

The most simple-minded man must know that liberty which is not protected by law is of no value. For under such conditions the man who walks the streets to-day without restraint may be on his way to the guillotine to-morrow, without a hearing or a trial. During the Reign of Terror in France in 1794 as many as 15,000 persons were executed in a month and as high as 200,000 were crowded together at one time in the republican bastiles. It was one of the most awful orgies of blood and terror that the world has ever seen. Danton and Robespierre killed Hebert, and then in a short while Robespierre sent Danton to the guillotine, and finally Robespierre himself was forced to pay the penalty which he had exacted from thousands of others, and in a short while after that France had awakened from a ghastly dream of the Reign of Terror.

The student of history sees a remarkable parallel in Russia to-day to this Reign of Terror of the French Revolution. Lenin and Trotski have set out to reconstruct society by the overthrow of all existing order and to set up an entirely new structure according to their own fantastic notions, and on the communistic plan, the same as that advocated by Hebert, Danton, and Robespierre. Of course, they will fail in their impossible theories, just as Hebert, Danton, and Robespierre failed, but not until they have prostrated Russia and have impoverished her people to such an extent that it will take years for them to recover from the dreadful orgies which have been set in motion; but, undoubtedly, the day of her delivery will come, as it always comes in the processes of civilization, for—

Though the mills of God grind slowly,
Yet they grind exceeding small.
Though with patience He stands waiting,
With exactness grinds He all.

[Applause.]

THE VALUE OF A GOOD GOVERNMENT.

The trouble with a host of these agitators is that they do not appreciate how good a Government we do have. Often we can best have the proper appreciation of a thing if we pause to think what our condition would be if we had to do without it. Take the air that we breathe. We take but little thought of that, and yet deprive it of its life-giving oxygen and we would all soon sicken and die. Take the sparkling water that we drink. We take but little thought of that; yet pollute it with the germs of disease and decay and it will sow the seeds of death in every man that drinks of it. Take the brilliant sunshine, which drives away the darkness of the night and envelops a sleeping world in glorious light. We take but little thought of that. We get up, rub our sleepy eyes and go on our way; and yet shut us up in a darkened cell, where its rays can not penetrate, and we would all soon sicken and die. And just as it would be impossible for the physical man to live without the pure air and the clear water and the bright sunshine, just so would it be impossible for the citizen to enjoy life, liberty, and property, and the pursuit of happiness without the protecting arm of a strong, well-organized government.

These misguided fanatics who denounce and abuse our Constitution and form of government, and who would, if they could, overthrow it and set up a reign of tyranny and disorder, little realize that they would be the worst victims of their own insane folly. No one in Russia to-day is suffering more than the poor peasants who but a few months ago proclaimed Lenin and Trotski as their deliverers and fell eagerly into their scheme of property looting and class exploitation.

The poet, Robert Southey, wrote a poem about the Inch Cape Rock, which I read when I was a boy, in which he tells the story of a bell placed on a buoy which the good abbot of Aberbreathok had placed on the Inch Cape Rock so that in time of storm it would ring its warning to the mariners who came near the perilous rock, and tells how one day Sir Rolph the rover, idly pacing his deck, sees in the distance this Inch Cape float and in his merry, wicked mood decides to plague the good abbot by cutting the bell from the buoy. At his command his men row him to the rock and he cuts the bell in great humor and glee, and then sails away. After scouring the sea for many days and growing rich in his ill-gotten gain he turns his craft homeward to Scotland. Night comes on and darkness and a fearful storm. The vessel drifts and rolls and tosses before the angry waves and wind, and, amid the confusion and turmoil, Sir Rolph says:

Cans't hear, said one, the breakers roar?
For me thinks we should be near the shore.
Now, where we are I can not tell,
But I wish we could hear the Inch Cape Bell.

They hear no sound, the swell is strong.
Though the wind hath fallen, they drift along
Till the vessel strikes with a shivering shock;
O, Christ, it is the Inch Cape Rock.

Sir Rolph the rover tore his hair,
He cursed himself in his despair.
The waves rushed in on every side,
The ship is sinking beneath the tide.

But even in his dying fear,
One dreadful sound could the rover hear,
A sound as if, with the Inch Cape Bell
The devil below was ringing his bell.

The men who would cut away and destroy the Constitution as a protecting shield to the people of the United States would be the worst victims of their own folly. For more than a hundred years it has rung true in every storm and crisis, and has protected us from the despotism of the autocrat as well as the tyranny of the mob; and faded will be the glory of the country and dim the majesty of its laws whenever the humblest citizen of the land will not be able to retire to his citadel and say: This is my castle, and my family and I are safe. I am an American citizen and I invoke the protection of its Constitution and its law. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. HULINGS.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that I can improve at all upon anything said by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] in his splendid presentation of matters about which I propose to speak. As he says, there is an element at work in this country that challenges Americanism.

We sit here busying ourselves about matters of comparative unimportance when violent assault is being made upon the very foundations of the Republic.

Discontent and unrest are abroad, pervading great masses of our citizens.

The workingmen upon whom the life of the country depends are striking. Policemen, firemen, miners, workingmen everywhere by voluntary idleness seek to compel concessions. Concessions of what? Will the coal mines be closed on the approach of winter? Will the railroads be tied up? Will the fires of industry be banked? Will the country be desolated and starved if these concessions are not granted? Class rule, mob rule, threatens that they will be.

The high cost of living and the insufficiency of wages do not fully account for the situation.

The high cost of living is largely due to rascally profiteering and the spirit of "grab what you can" is practically universal, partly to the inflation of the currency, partly to waste and extravagance, partly to idleness and underproduction, and partly to the big prices that foreigners are paying for our staples.

Some of our citizens, especially postal employees, the army of clerks and bookkeepers and salaried men, people who live on fixed incomes, and some classes of railroad employees, do not get half the income of some of the strikers and are actually in distress because of the high cost of living, and their demands must be met.

To remedy these causes of the high cost of living Congress can do little beyond an effort to stop profiteering, and to stop its own wild extravagance. The real remedy is industry, production, economy, which lie with the people themselves. [Applause.]

After the Civil War the necessaries of life were far higher in price and wages were far lower than they are to-day, but the standards of living were far lower, and we never ought and we never will go back to them. High standards of living have developed the power and splendor of the Republic.

Yet, by and large, there never was a time in the history of the world when the average citizen lived as well as he does to-day in this country, notwithstanding the high cost of living.

When the First Division made its triumphal march on Pennsylvania Avenue several hundred thousand citizens lined the sidewalks. In passing through those crowds, composed of citizens of all walks of life, I saw no signs of privation or misery, or distress. It was a well-dressed, happy, well-to-do populace.

I had witnessed the great outpouring of citizens at New York to greet the return of the Twenty-seventh Division of New York National Guardsmen. There were millions of citizens there, many of them from the humbler parts of the city. There again I saw a happy, well-fed, well-dressed people.

I recognize the right of the workingman to strike whenever he chooses and for whatever reason that suits him; but as a good citizen he will always consider the effect the exercise of his right to strike may have upon the innocent public and only use it in extreme cases.

I recognize "collective bargaining" as absolutely the workman's only defense against the tendency of wages toward the lowest point of subsistence under the competitive system. This system controls the employer as well as the employee. For instance, two employers with an equally large number of employees are engaged in the same business as competitors.

One of them, less scrupulous than the other, cuts wages. The unmarried man or the man with a wife can get along on the cut, and they accept the cut, but the man with a wife and four or five children can barely subsist, yet he, too, must accept the cut. Now, the other employer must cut all his employees or be driven out of the business.

Collective bargaining relieves the employers of such risks, labor costs are rendered certain during the term of the bargain, and the workingman secures better wages than he singly could secure.

Collective bargaining can only be effective through the labor union.

As I have had occasion to say heretofore, formerly the relations of labor and capital were found in all our law books under the chapter of "Master and servant." But a profound change has come in these relations.

Thoughtful men are beginning to realize that every human element entering into production has a right to a voice in the division of the joint product of labor and capital, and that labor has as much right to say what share of the joint product capital shall have as capital has to say what share labor shall have, and if they can not agree there is the "lockout" or the "strike," and production stops, while the general public, that is a thousand times more interested in the operation of that railroad or coal mine or industry than either the employer or employee, suffers financial wreck or starvation. So the general public is interested not only that labor shall have an equitable share of the joint product, but on the score of its own financial interests.

The history of strikes has been that the "hot-heads" resort to intimidation and violence. The employers hire armed bands of Pinkertons and strike breakers to protect their property. Collisions occur. Criminations and recriminations are hurled back and forth. Glib-tongued orators fire the passions of the crowd. The local police, usually in sympathy with the crowd, are helpless to preserve order. The sheriff appeals to the governor. No government worthy of the name can permit the violation of law and order, and it sends its military forces to restore the public peace.

Now, what are the rights in this matter?

First, a man's right to strike is incontestable, and he need give no reason; but the other man's right to work is equally incontestable, and interference with either should not be permitted.

On the other hand, in all the public utilities, in which "strikes" so vitally concern the general public, and especially in the case of policemen, men voluntarily entering such service should contract to serve for specified wages during a specified time without the right to strike or to be discharged so long as the contract is complied with.

Second, the right of free speech and orderly public assemblage is the constitutional right of every American citizen. But the right of free speech, as well said by the gentleman from Texas, gives no man the right to slander or excite violence against any other man, nor to slander the Government or incite others to violence against the Government. The Constitution provides that any changes in the Government that the deliberate judgment of the majority of the citizens deems necessary may be made.

Third, the right of employers to hire armed bands should be strictly confined to guards employed within the premises to protect the property or, perhaps, be altogether prohibited, leaving all liability for losses upon the county whose duty it is to protect his property.

Fourth, the recognition that labor is entitled to a voice in the division of the joint product of labor and capital not only entitles it to a living wage, but to a real partnership in the business.

But, Mr. Speaker, strikes for higher wages we have seen before without anxiety. My sympathy is always with the workingman when he makes a just demand for better wages and better conditions. But if union labor means to take society by the throat to enforce "class rule," if it means to run the Government for the benefit of its own particular class, if union labor is going over to the "Reds," instead of a beneficence it becomes a deadly menace to American institutions. Ignorant men, thoughtless men, evil men, are advocating "class rule."

The Roman Senate confidently laid its taxes upon the lands outside the walls of Rome when Hannibal and his army were encamped thereon, and though the end came not yet, Rome, imperial in power, rolling in wealth, smothered in luxury, vice gilded, greed enthroned, public spirit dead, the masses in servitude under class rule, and Rome, that sat on her seven hills and from her throne of beauty ruled the world, toppled into helpless and colossal ruin.

I am not an alarmist. This is no country for "class rule." Our forefathers fought to destroy "class rule." The stratification of society into "classes" will destroy the Republic. An honest ballot is the only ruler the Republic will tolerate. No man has greater confidence in the ultimate good sense of the American people than I. I have confidence in the patriotism of the American-bred workingman. No man has greater faith than I that the American people will work out their destiny to the most commanding place in all God's green earth, but "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." [Applause.]

Behind this strike designing men are preaching the hideous doctrines of hate and spoliation, the I. W. W., "syndicalism," "Bolshevism," "direct action." The revolutionary doctrines that permeate France, that have tied up the industries of England and brought her to her knees, doctrines that have destroyed Russia and swilled that unhappy land in misery and blood, have found a footing in this country. In this land of liberty, dedicated to the equality of all men before the law, renegade Americans are found who advocate the destruction of all government by violence. The honest American workingman, hundreds of thousands of them, in the labor unions are not ready to Russianize America. Are they ready, then, to follow leaders who cloak evil design under the strike? Of course this brand of leaders want to win the strike. That will give them popularity, leadership. The honest, conservative leaders will be shelved, and they will take control. Then they can "regard the workers as pawns or putty to be manipulated as they choose," as they boast they have done.

These doctrines have been covertly and stealthily preached for years in this country by wild-eyed fanatics of foreign importation who know nothing of our people or institutions. Ignorant foreigners who came here to escape oppression were a fertile field for this murderous propaganda. It grew in the dark. Now it has been brought into the open and advocated by American leaders of great labor unions, and the doctrines of the "revolution" are widespread.

Hear what one of the leaders of the steel workers' strike says, not in the heat of passion, but in the deliberate pages of a book which he has published.

He declares himself a syndicalist and says:

The syndicalist ignores all laws so far as he is able and it suits his purpose.

He proposes to wrest from the capitalists by force the industries they have stolen.

The workers will seize control of the social means of production and operate them in their own interest.

The workers wring from their employers whatever concessions they can. They don't remain content with these concessions, and as soon as they are able they proceed to win more. They are insatiable, and when the general strike proves their ability to do so they will have no scruples against expropriating the capitalist. The capitalists are thieves and have no right to their property.

The syndicalist is unscrupulous in his choice of weapons. He allows no considerations of loyalty, patriotism, religion, honor, duty, to stand in the way of his adoption of effective tactics.

The syndicalist is a radical opponent of law and order. He is going to strip the capitalists of their property, law or no law.

Along with the slave ideal of a fair day's pay for a fair day's work must go the idiotic doctrine of the harmony of interests of capital and labor which many labor leaders are so fond of enunciating.

The workers must give up their present rapid rate of work and by systematically saboting their work turn out as little as possible of it.

The syndicalists are the most potent force in the labor movement.

Speaking of the great French railroad strike—

They were the life of the strike. The rest of the workers were little better than pawns or putty to be manipulated as the militants chose.

I have been grieved and surprised to learn that Mr. Gompers has publicly become the apologist for the man who could advocate such doctrines, on the ground that he had abandoned them.

I do not think the brain that could conceive such hellish doctrines ever could return to the ways of sanity. [Applause.]

Just such men are loudly proclaiming the constitutional right of "free speech" under a Constitution they are striving to destroy. What consummate impudence for "radical opponents of law and order," who have "no considerations for patriotism, religion, honor, duty, or loyalty," to bleat about the right of free speech or free assembly in this or any other country.

These doctrines are absolutely opposed to American ideals. They are of foreign importation. They come from lands that have no conception of American institutions. Those peoples do not know anything but class rule. The only argument they recognize is force and the bludgeon. As President Wilson has well said, "They do not understand us, they do not look in the same direction as the American people do," and I can not, for the life of me, understand why the President now wants to hook us up with them in a league of nations without amendments.

Mr. Chairman, the genius of our institutions is Americanism. Americanism means freedom of speech, of press, of opportunity. It means government by the consent of the governed. It means liberty regulated by law.

It is devotion to a great social ideal founded on the equality of all men before the law. [Applause.]

It is a passion for freedom, for justice.

It is hatred of tyranny and oppression, of special privilege, and of class rule. [Applause.]

Americanism is challenged. Every Democrat, every Republican, every loyal citizen, who believes in the principles the fathers handed down to us, all men who love the American flag, should stand together to repel these hideous doctrines of foreign importation. Whatever you may think about the labor union or the "closed" or the "open" shop, men who love the concepts of American liberty must stand together and with open minds establish justice to all citizens after the American fashion of fair dealing.

Whatever you may say, whatever faults you may find, whatever imperfections may exist, Americanism has done more for the human race, more to make men free, happier, better fed, better clothed, larger minded, broader visioned than any other Government ever devised by man. [Applause.]

It is the bounden duty of every man who loves American freedom to take up the challenge and root out these pernicious doctrines.

The American Congress should lead in a campaign of education. From these Halls should go out a propaganda of the truth. Men, as a rule, are fair-minded; they can be reached by a candid dispassionate presentation of the facts. The mass of foreigners in our midst and the foreign-tainted Americans, deceived by cunning leaders, are plain men acting according to their light, but they are standing in darkness. The truth will be a lamp to their feet. Every newspaper, every foreign-language newspaper, should be flooded with plain statements of what Americanism is, and what syndicalism is, appealing to common sense, showing that Americanism is the hope of the common man. [Applause.]

The only way to make the propaganda of Americanism effective is by organizations; and I shall at the proper time introduce a resolution providing for a joint committee of the House and the Senate whose duty it shall be, by practical, systematic methods, to inculcate a love for the American system of government.

The Great Republic is the Empire of the commonalty. Her flag is the only banner in the world that represents a land where man may be free; free with such abilities and capacities as God has given him to work out his own fortunes, unbuttressed and undeterred by class, rank, or privilege. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS]. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches which have just been made. I believe that it would do a great deal of good if every man in the United States could listen to the speeches which have been made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS]. There is no question in the world that Americanism is sound at the core, and I am not one of those who take a gloomy view of the future. I am rather of the opinion that as this country and this people have met and overcome all trials of government that have preceded this day, that we and those who come after us will be able to do as much for this country and for the world at large as did those who preceded us. There are to-day two classes of people in America, whether knowingly or unknowingly it matters not, who are doing all that they can to undermine the confidence of the people in this Government. The I. W. W., for instance, who proclaim the fact that they owe no allegiance to this or any other Government and that they believe in internationalism, are frankly and openly fighting our system of government. Then there is another class of men who take advantage of situations, men who take advantage of the law, to get the best of their fellow citizens. For instance, we have heard a great deal in recent months of the profiteer. Now, the man, in my opinion, gentlemen, who takes advantage of a situation or takes advantage of a law to make money out of the sufferings and the needs of the people is as great an enemy to American institutions as the ignorant I. W. W. [Applause.]

I introduced a resolution just the other day asking the Federal Trade Commission to look into and report at once upon the spread that has come between crude cotton oil and refined cotton oil. My excuse, if I may have one, for bringing that into this discussion, is this: Every man knows the conditions existing in his own locality. I know the situation in mine; you know the situation in yours. August of last year there was a meeting held here in this city in which it was agreed that the differential between crude cotton oil and refined cotton oil would be 15 cents a gallon. Now, you gentlemen must remember that we people of the South who grow cotton seed sell the seed to the mills upon the basis of the price of crude cotton oil, and that crude cotton oil is sold by the oil mill to the refinery and refined and made a wholesome and palatable food for human consumption. The basis of what the mass of the people have to pay for the food is based upon the price of refined cottonseed oil.

We, in other words, sell our cotton seed based upon the price of crude. You buy the food product based upon the price of refined. Now, at a meeting held in my State not long since, it has been stated—and this information is from a letter that has been written to me by the commissioner of agriculture of my State—that instead of the differential to-day between crude cotton oil and refined cotton oil being 15 cents, it is, in a number of cases, 60 cents. In other words, the spread between the crude and refined has gone in one year from 15 cents a gallon to 60 cents a gallon.

Now, mark you, in all that spread not one cotton farmer in the South has benefited a copper cent. In that spread not one man who crushes the cotton seed into the crude oil has benefited one cent. The men who have been made to suffer by that tremendous spread are the mass of the people who have had to buy this product in order to keep body and soul together.

You and I may argue about the high cost of living as long as we will; Congress can do a certain amount of good, it can pass certain legislation; the State legislatures can supplement that legislation with other legislation; but it does seem to me that one of the most effective ways of reducing the cost of living is that, whenever it comes to the knowledge of an individual Member of Congress that conditions are abnormal as to the food and feed raised in his district, he ought to make it known to the American people, so that the profiteers and those who are taking advantage of the people's wants will have the pitiless light of publicity turned upon them.

In the final analysis, gentlemen, this is a Government of public opinion, and beyond every other consideration and above every law of the land, the great mass of public opinion is, at last, what determines the action of this people. [Applause.]

I hope the resolution I offered will be promptly reported by the committee and adopted, and I hope that the Federal Trade Commission will investigate this matter—and it can do it in at least two or three days—and that they will make such recommendations as will show up the conscienceless profiteering of those who buy the crude oil, refine it for human consumption, and then sell it to the people at such an enormous differential. These things, in my opinion, will cure themselves if given publicity.

These two classes that I spoke of a minute ago are the two that undermine the confidence of the great mass of the people in this Government—the man at the top and the man at the bottom. The saying of the old French writer, whose name escapes me, is truer of America than it is of any other country in the world—that "society is like a pie; there is an upper crust and a lower crust, but the real meat is in between." [Applause.] That is the saving grace of the situation to-day. No permanent soviet, Bolshevistic theories can gain ground in America. The good sense of our people will prevent it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. This American country of ours is at last the land of opportunity. We can assimilate and have assimilated the foreigner in the past. The foreigner that is against our Government is the foreigner that does not understand the genius of our institutions. If he does not become assimilated, my experience is that his children do become Americans, and they realize this outstanding fact about our Government, that here the door of opportunity opens alike to the touch of every man, no matter what his condition may be; here in this land of America the poor man and the rich man stand upon an equality, and every boy beginning his career here starts with an equal chance in the race of life.

The glory of it is that here in America the child of a millionaire may be, and often is, the pauper of to-morrow, and the pauper's son often is the leader of to-morrow. In other words, I believe that the great, sober, sane people of this country realize that, imperfect as our Government is—because it is the work of man and not the work of the Infinite—imperfect as it is, it is yet the most perfect form of government that the heart of man has conceived or the mind of man has reduced to writing. [Applause.]

I believe in America and Americanism with every drop of blood in my body. I know, as everybody else in this land knows, that here a man works out his own salvation, and in the end gets out of this life and out of this Government just about what he puts into this life and into this Government. And I know that whatever imperfections there are in our Government, whatever things there may be that have not been reduced down to a fine point—and we see the rough edges here and there—it is the American people that will cure every defect that exists, soberly, cleanly, and sanely, and make of this country a better land for their children, just as our fathers made it a better land for us. [Applause.]

So far as I am concerned, I have no doubt of the future. I have no patience with those who go abroad and seek to tear down and destroy this Government and its Constitution. I believe it is the best Government on the face of the earth, and I believe, when it comes to a written Constitution, that there never has been one in all the world that in any way approaches ours.

Destruction is the easiest thing in the world. Anybody on earth can destroy, but it takes labor and brains and perseverance and ability to build up. Take the meanest mule there is in my parish, and that mule can kick a $500 piano to pieces in 10 minutes; but that same mule could not build a hencoop in 10 years. Anybody on earth can destroy, but it takes labor and brains and ability and confidence to build. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, on Tuesday, the 16th, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in his able presentation of the serious problems confronting this Congress, showing the absolute necessity of reducing expenditures as much as possible, and pointing out the large deficit which at best we are certain to be compelled to find means to meet, referred incidentally to the high cost of living, and stated that it is generally admitted that the high cost of living is due primarily to four principal causes. With three of the causes, as stated by him, I have no dissent. I think his statement was substantially correct, but I think it is a mistake to say that the "first and foremost" cause for high prices is "the increase in our circulating medium."

I have studied the subject a great deal, and I am thoroughly convinced that the Federal Reserve Board is right in declaring that the increase in our currency and in bank deposits is an effect and not a cause. You can not increase taxes so tremendously and sell such enormous amounts of Government bonds without increasing both currency and credit. One of our single bond issues—the fourth Liberty loan—sold in a campaign of a few weeks, called for more money than there is in existence even now, inside and outside of the Treasury and the Federal reserve banks. How was it possible for the people to pay for those bonds and to pay at the same time taxes greater in the aggregate than all the money of all kinds in the country? They paid by an expansion of credit, which inevitably led to some increase of currency. There was no other way it could be done, and I want to say that in my opinion the whole operation of financing the war—of finding the enormous sums that were spent—was very skillfully and ably handled by the Treasury Department, by the Federal Reserve Board, and by the bankers of the country.

When you reflect that we have sold bonds amounting to more than $24,500,000,000 since April, 1917, and have paid in taxes something like $9,000,000,000 more, the feat seems almost incredible. Five years ago no one would have believed it possible. Of course, while the Government has received and has used the purchasing power from those enormous taxes and stupendous bond sales, they are not really all paid for yet, not by a good deal. The banks are still carrying several billions of them only partly paid for, and the Federal reserve banks are still carrying war paper amounting to a billion five hundred and seventy-two millions, and that is in large measure the trouble to-day. The bonds are still, too many of them, "undigested," in financial slang. The people have not yet been able to save enough money to pay for them and put them away in their strong boxes. They are making progress at it, however, and if production could keep on uninterrupted, without strikes and curtailments of one kind and another, the steady payments made at the banks by the thrifty would very soon begin to make themselves felt.

In spite of the tremendous bond sales and taxes, the amount of money of all kinds, outside of the Treasury, increased only about $1,042,000,000 between the end of April, 1917, and the end of July, 1919, while national bank deposits increased less than a billion and a half, and deposits in all banks not over three billions. Of course, there was a considerable increase of currency and credit before we entered the war—an increase of the total stock of money outside of the Treasury of $1,282,962,000 between July 1, 1914, and April, 1917, nearly all of which, however, was gold. That increase was due to the great purchases of war material and foodstuffs here by the nations that afterwards became our associates in the war. Their purchases, made under stress of overwhelming necessity and at prices which our manufacturers and dealers fixed to suit themselves on a basis of big profits, were the chief cause of the high prices—prices which naturally continued to advance considerably after we entered the war, but which were in the main made before we entered. The prices were made, of course, before the payments, and preceded the increase of our gold stock, generally speaking.

It is true that most of our issues of Federal reserve notes were put out since April, 1917. At the end of April in that year there were but $403,296,000 of them in circulation, while in December last, when they reached their peak, up to last week, there were $2,634,512,000 in circulation. After that time there was a pretty steady reduction until June, when they began to increase again, due doubtless to the floating of the big Victory loan. They are now again above $2,600,000,000, and, in fact, the statement published on Saturday last shows that they have passed December's figures, making a new peak, $2,655,354,000. There should soon set in a steady permanent decrease, but whether there shall be such a decrease or not will depend largely on what this Congress does.

The tremendous increase in Federal reserve notes, however, must not be taken as indication that most of them represent inflation. As I have already shown, there has been an increase of the total stock of money, outside of the Treasury, of only a little more than a billion dollars. What many people overlook is that Federal reserve notes can be issued dollar for dollar in exchange for gold or gold certificates, and for some time most of them were so issued, and were practically gold certificates. You will find that for a number of months in 1917 the amount of gold held as cover for Federal reserve notes was actually greater than the outstanding amount of notes, more than 100 per cent. Then, as our bond issues mounted up and war paper began to flow into the Federal reserve banks as collateral for rediscounts from the member banks, the amount of Federal reserve notes began to increase and the gold reserve to decrease, but it was not until the second Liberty loan was floated, in October, 1917, that the movement became very marked and until the third Liberty loan had been floated, in the spring of 1918, the gold reserves, against both deposits and notes in the Federal reserve banks, were steadily above 60 per cent, and they did not go below 60 per cent until July of that year. In October, at about the time the fourth Liberty loan was put out, the reserves went a little below 50 per cent, and, I believe have once or twice been down to about that figure since then, though the ending of the war naturally steadied things considerably by cutting down the great expenditures. On September 26 the gold reserves, against both deposits and Federal reserve notes, were reported as 51 per cent, and with 35 per cent charged off against deposits there was 60.8 per cent against outstanding notes. Just what has occasioned the recent increase of war paper in the Federal reserve banks and the increase of Federal reserve notes to a new peak, a little higher than that of December, I am not sure, but I presume that it was due to recent final payments on Victory notes and to present issue of Treasury certificates taken by the banks.

At the close of a great war expenditures never decrease as fast as people seem to expect that they should. Many claims remain to be settled and relaxation from enforced war sacrifices and economies produces for a time a certain extravagance of expenditure that hinders the payment of debt. Federal reserve notes issued against the collateral of war paper, or bonds, appear to me to come pretty fairly under the definition of inflation, and until the people who have bought the bonds which form that collateral, save enough to pay for them and take them out of the banks that inflation will continue. War obligations held by the Federal reserve banks have been declining, with some ups and downs, until last week, and if it can be accepted as true that the Government has reached the peak of its borrowing will soon again continue to decline, unless this Congress should adopt some wildly extravagant policy which would require us to raise a billion or two billion dollars more, piled on top of the tremendous debt and responsibilities we already have.

If we should adopt such a policy, whether to pay a so-called bonus to the splendid young men who have survived the Great War and are now nearly all back at their former occupations in civil life or in pursuance of some of the other extravagant ideas of governmental activities that have their advocates, we would put back the wheels of progress a year or more. Another great bond issue would be necessary, just when the Treasury Department is making every effort—and with apparent success—to avoid another bond issue, and to obtain necessary funds to take care of the deficits existing between tax collections at a slightly lower rate of interest. Further increases in the tax burdens of the Nation would doubtless also be necessary. There would be a further inevitable inflation of credit and of currency, and instead of reducing the cost of living, in which we have reason to believe we have made some start, we would send prices kiting up again, and start again the whole train of evils which we are so earnestly seeking to amend and to find a cure for. For my part, I do not believe that any considerable number of returned soldiers would want us to do that if they understood the situation, and I think that a great many of them do understand it, because comparatively few have been influenced by the propaganda which has been so persistently carried on among them by those who have been advocating this so-called bonus. I am sure that they do not want any effort made to measure the value of their great services to the country in dollars and cents, or to have anything done that would injure the country or prevent its recovery from the effects of the war. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In making an estimate of the amount of inflation that would be expressed in currency, is it proper to say that the difference between the increase in the business transactions and the increase in Federal issues would measure that inflation? The increase of the business transactions since the war, according to the committee that was appointed—the committee of 12, representing 12 great universities of the country—the increase was from 13 per cent to 20 per cent, while the increase of the Federal reserve notes was something like 60 per cent, I think.

Mr. PLATT. Well, offhand and without studying the question, I think that might be a fair measure of inflation, or give some idea of it, provided you take the whole stock of money outside of the Treasury and Federal reserve banks. You can not measure inflation by increase of Federal reserve notes alone when other kinds of money may be decreasing in volume.

Mr. FESS. The whole stock of money increased even more than that.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman is mistaken about that, I think. The whole stock of money has been decreasing. I have here a September bulletin of the Federal Reserve Board, and there are some rather interesting things in it—page 838. The peak of our gold, the highest point of the gold stock in the country, was reached in April, 1917. Then it was a little bit over $3,121,000,000. It has been below that since. At the end of July last it was down below $3,000,000,000, or $2,989,000,000. The peak of all kinds of money outside of the Treasury was reached in November last, when it was $5,993,000,000. The peak of the Federal reserve notes, until last week, was reached in December last, $2,634,000,000. The stock of money outside of the Treasury has been going down ever since last November. It has gone down from $5,993,000,000 to $5,777,000,000 August 1 and to $5,743,000,000 September 1. That is from the September Treasury statement. The October 1 statement is not out yet.

Mr. FESS. The measure of gold in quantity would be increased by our receiving gold from Europe in payment of balances. But that was stopped before the war, or about the middle of the first year of the war, by our loaning immense amounts of money or credits to Europe to take the place of their sending gold. We sent both the credit and munitions, the stocks of goods, and no money really went over there. It is simply a book transaction?

Mr. PLATT. Yes. Our loans were simply credit for goods bought here.

Mr. FESS. And no gold came over here to pay for the balance?

Mr. PLATT. Not after April, 1917.

Mr. FESS. That is what I mean. Consequently the stock of gold decreasing does not mean that the stock of money has decreased. The stock of money would increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, may I have a few minutes more to answer these questions?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. FESS. My point was that it is easy to understand why the stock of gold did not increase after a certain time, because that was answered by our immense credits to Europe to take the place of credit balances.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; but the total stock of all kinds of money outside of the Treasury has not increased since November, 1918.

Mr. FESS. No. There is no chance for it to increase unless we would bring it from Europe.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman has just mentioned the great increase in the Federal reserve notes. My point is that there has been a certain decrease in gold and some decrease in national bank notes, and that the total volume of money outside of the Treasury has not increased since last November, so that any increase in prices since last November can not be laid to the total increase in the stock of money in circulation. I might add that most of the gold is in the vaults of the Federal reserve agents as part of the collateral for Federal reserve notes.

Mr. FESS. My point is that business transactions since the war have increased something like 20 per cent; the amount of money in circulation has increased something like 60 per cent.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think that is true.

Mr. FESS. I think it is true. That is the report of the commission which was appointed especially to look into this thing, and the commission made its report, and the report was that the business transactions of the Government were increased less than 20 per cent, while the money increase was more than 60 per cent.

Mr. PLATT. They took the Federal reserve notes alone, and did not look at the rest of the situation, or they did not eliminate the gold with Federal reserve agents.

Mr. FESS. No. I am speaking of the money at large. I think that there is a distinctive inflation, and it is not because the price of articles is so high, but because the value of money is cheap. It is an increase of price without an increase of value.

Mr. PLATT. I think there is a certain amount of what may be called inflation, due to the Federal reserve notes issued with war paper as part of the collateral, but it was inevitable that this should happen with such tremendous bond issues and taxes. If we can escape another bond issue, it should automatically reduce itself. Federal reserve notes will not stay out unless there is a demand for them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, in the time granted me I desire to send up and have read at the Clerk's desk a communication received this morning from the Hon. Frank Abbey, of Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A COMMUNICATION FROM A "TIRED BUSINESS MAN."

I have been held up, held down, sandbagged, walked on, sat on, flattened out, and squeezed. First by the United States Government for Federal war tax, Liberty loan bonds, thrift stamps, war-savings stamps; for State, county, and other taxes, capital stock tax, and auto tax; and by every society and organization that inventive mind can invest and extract whatever I may or may not possess.

The Government has so governed my business that I do not know who owns it.

I am inspected, suspected, examined, reexamined, informed, required, restrained, and commanded, so that I don't know who I am, where I am, or why I am here.

All that I know is that I am supposed to be an inexhaustible supply of money for every human need, desire, or hope of the human race, and because I will not sell all I have and go out and beg, borrow, or steal money to give away, I have been cussed, discussed, boycotted, talked to, talked about, lied to, lied about, held up, hung up, robbed, and nearly ruined; and the only reason I am clinging to life is to see what is coming off next.

[Applause and laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further debate, the Clerk will read.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, at this time I want to say just a few words more about the effort to put a tariff on potash. Regardless of what may be said in defense of other tariff measures, this one is without a valid defense.

When I was speaking along this line a few days ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] asked whether or not I favored a tariff on wheat. I replied, "That is another question." And so it is. A tariff that would help the cotton producer or wheat producer, or both, to be paid by everybody who eats bread and wears clothes would be a fairer protective tariff than is ordinarily passed or suggested by the Republicans.

This by no means argues that it is right to collect a tariff from the millions of farmers and their families for a half dozen rich potash corporations.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] said on this floor recently that the potash tariff would cost the farmers practically nothing. He is much in error about this.

What are the facts? I quote from a letter written to Hon. CHARLES R. CRISP, of the Ways and Means Committee, and the other members of the Georgia delegation by the Hon. Lem B. Jackon, director of the bureau of markets of the department of agriculture of Georgia:

Nineteen hundred and fourteen was the biggest year, so far as the consumption of fertilizers is concerned, that Georgia ever had. In that year this State consumed 1,282,088 tons. Normally 10 per cent to 15 per cent of the tonnage is in straight acid phosphate; about 20 per cent in what is known as alkaline goods; that is, acid phosphate and potash (in this grade the potash averages about 3 units to the ton); 65 per cent in ammoniated goods, which will average 2½ units to the ton.

In round numbers we will say that 1,000,000 tons of fertilizer consumed in the State of Georgia contains potash. Two hundred thousand tons of alkaline goods would require 3 units to the ton—600,000 units. Six hundred and fifty thousand tons of ammoniated goods at 2½ units would require 1,625,000 units of potash, making the total consumption in the State around 2,225,000 units during the peak season of 1914.

The cost of this potash to the farmers that season averaged about $1 per unit, and the proposed increase to $2.50 per unit would necessarily under normal use of potash cost our farmers $3,337,500.

In other words, this proposed potash legislation would take from the farmers of Georgia alone each year enough money to build a $22,000 courthouse in each county in the State. This bill would take from the farmers of Georgia each year enough money to pay all the salaries of the 435 Congressmen of this House for more than a year, or enough money to pay the salary of one Congressman for 445 years, which is a period of time longer than has elapsed from the time of the discovery of America by Columbus to the present time. [Applause.]

It will be seen at once why I oppose so bitterly this potash tariff bill and why I feel that every friend of the farmers and of the Nation should fight it to the limit.

If the bill passes the farmers will not feel like buying the guano that they need. There will be a falling off of production, and the cost of living will continue to go skyward. If we would solve the problem of the high cost of living we must help the farmer to produce more and he will solve it.

The farmer is entitled to better treatment than we are about to accord him. Can we forget so soon the noble service which he rendered our country in her dire need? [Applause.]

The farmers did nobly their part in the Great War. They gave their sons to bare their breast to the enemy and to build a living wall to hold back the German hordes and save civilization. The farmers bought Liberty bonds to the last penny, and ofttimes deprived their families of the necessary food and raiment in order to furnish funds for the Government. They speeded up production in spite of the fact that their help and their children had been taken from them and produced an abundant harvest, which they heaped into the lap of the Nation for the prosecution of the war. They put their time, their substance, their children, their lives, their all, on the altar of their country.

They won the war. They deserve a pension instead of a punishment. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Post Office appropriation bill passed by the last Congress, which became a law on the 29th of February, contained an appropriation of $200,000,000 for roads. It also carried an order that the War Department should turn over to the Agricultural Department, to be distributed among the several States, all its surplus road machinery. This road machinery consisted of automobile trucks, rollers, cement mixers, and all the equipment for first-class road building. After a good deal of formality and red tape and the making of inventories lasting several months, the War Department started in to apportion the surplus road-building machinery. The total allotment to the Agricultural Department was 20,519 motor trucks and other motor vehicles, making in all a total assignment for road making of 27,825 motor vehicles. Sixty-seven hundred motor trucks were actually delivered. There were 14,950 motor vehicles assigned to the Bureau of Roads, but which had not been delivered on August 22. The reason assigned by the War Department for not delivering any more motor trucks or road machinery was that Congress had repealed the law providing for the distribution of road-building machinery. It seems that the Judge Advocate General made a technical ruling that section 5 of the sundry civil bill passed by Congress, which became a law on the 19th of July, repealed this provision in the Post Office bill providing for the distribution of these trucks. Now, I am not going to discuss the ruling of the Judge Advocate General, but I am going to put into the RECORD the two provisions. They are as follows:

Section 7 of the Post Office appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, reads as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture all available war material, equipment, and supplies not needed for the purposes of the War Department, but suitable for use in the improvement of highways, and that the same be distributed among the highway departments of the several States to be used on roads constructed in whole or in part by Federal aid, such distribution to be made upon a value basis of distribution the same as provided by the Federal aid road act, approved July 11, 1916: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, at his discretion, may reserve from such distribution not to exceed 10 per cent of such material, equipment, and supplies for use in the construction of national forest roads or other roads constructed under his direct supervision.

Section 5 of the sundry civil act making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, reads as follows:

SEC. 5. The Secretary of War is authorized to transfer any unused and surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment of any kind, the payment for same to be made as provided herein, to any branch of the Government service having appropriations available for the purchase of said vehicles and equipment: Provided, That in case of the transfers herein authorized a reasonable price not to exceed actual cost, and if the same have been used, at a reasonable price based upon length of usage, shall be determined upon and an equivalent amount of each appropriation available for said purchase shall be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt, and the appropriation in each case reduced accordingly: Provided further, That it shall be the duty of each official of the Government having such purchases in charge to procure the same from any such unused or surplus stock if possible: Provided further, That hereafter no transfer of motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment, unless specifically authorized by law, shall be made free of charge to any branch of the Government service.

I think it will be apparent to anyone who carefully examines these two provisions that the Judge Advocate General is entirely wrong, and that no lawyer of any great reputation would want to stake his reputation upon such an interpretation. It was certain that Congress did not intend to repeal this specific appropriation, and a general act never repeals a special act by inference or in uncertain language. The War Department did not itself question the law for over a month after the law they claimed repealing it was passed.

At the time the sundry civil bill was passed there were 14,950 motor trucks that the War Department had assigned to the highway department of the Agricultural Department to be distributed among the several States. Those 14,950 trucks had not been delivered to the Agricultural Department and have not yet been delivered. Now, certainly the sundry civil bill could not have applied to those trucks that had already been assigned, and I do not think it applied to even the trucks that had not been assigned. The time is running, valuable time. Six weeks have already gone by and no trucks have been delivered in that time. The War Department is not using these trucks. They are growing older. I have been informed by the War Department that there are something like 130,000 motor vehicles in the War Department. Probably 100,000 of those are in good shape, but they are growing old. The War Department can not house them and they ought to be turned over immediately to the different State road departments to be used in the construction of highways. Take, for instance, the 15,000 automobile trucks that have already been assigned. Those 15,000 automobile trucks that have already been assigned are worth from $2,000 to $3,000 per truck. That represents from $30,000,000 to $45,000,000 right there. The different highway departments of the United States are unable to buy trucks, and this provision in the Post Office bill, I believe, was the most important provision in it, more important than the appropriation of $200,000,000. Why? Because money can not buy motor trucks and road machinery at the present time. Every motor-truck manufacturing establishment in the United States has orders for a year or a year and a half ahead on motor trucks, and State highway departments can not procure them for many months. The same is true of other highway machinery. Now-

I say it is wrong for the War Department to hold these trucks that by an act of Congress have been ordered to be turned over to the highway department. The Judge Advocate General quibbles over the interpretation of this law which was plain and simple, while thousands of motor trucks and other road machinery are not being used and are rusting and growing old, and when the highway departments of the several States are in such great need of them for a great public use, road building. I think it is something that this Congress ought to take cognizance of, and that we ought to have legislation, and have it right away, to the effect that the War Department should turn over forthwith the trucks and road machinery which we directed it to turn over in the act of Congress.

I can not conceive of any reason for the War Department holding these trucks and road machinery that it has no further use for, unless, as the law they cite would indicate, that the War Department be paid for the trucks and machinery by the Agricultural Department. In other words, the War Department wanted the Government to put its hands in one pocket and take money out and put it in another pocket, the pocket of the War Department. In the meantime the work on national highways, the most important public work undertaken for years, is being crippled for lack of motor trucks and other valuable road machinery.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. Is it not a fact that a great deal of highway construction is being held back by the various States because of this ruling of the Judge Advocate General?

Mr. BROWNE. There is no doubt of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BROWNE. I should like to have two minutes more.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. ROSE. I have a communication from the highway commissioner of the State of Pennsylvania complaining about this ruling of the Judge Advocate General.

Mr. BROWNE. Almost every highway department in the United States is clomoring for these motor trucks that they can not get. Think of it; 15,000 motor trucks would mean at least 3 or 4 trucks, besides the other road equipment that I have mentioned, for every county in the United States. And just as quickly as a county got these trucks it would see that they were taken care of and housed every night instead of going to waste the way a great many of them necessarily are, because the War Department can not take proper care of the immense number of automobile trucks and other equipment that it has.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE. Certainly.

Mr. BARBOUR. Were these trucks and other things assigned to county highway commissioners or to the States?

Mr. BROWNE. They were assigned to the Agricultural Department, and the Agricultural Department was to distribute them among the several States the same as road money is distributed—one-third according to population, one-third according to area, and one-third according to the number of rural routes.

Mr. BARBOUR. But is it intended that the counties shall have these trucks to use in the construction of their highways?

Mr. BROWNE. That depends upon their own State highway laws. They will be turned over to the various State highway commissions, to be used according to their State laws on Federal-aid highways.

Mr. KING. And if they do as they did in Illinois they will lease them out to a contractor for construction work and collect the money. That is the way they have been doing it there.

Mr. BROWNE. But trucks can not be bought, and they are not being used here. They should be working on the roads, not lying idle and rusting.

I introduced a joint resolution yesterday to have these trucks and this other road machinery turned over. There is another bill introduced——

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Is the gentleman addressing himself to the bill which is pending to clear up this legal question?

Mr. BROWNE. I am addressing myself to the resolution I introduced yesterday.

Mr. KINKAID. The gentleman is aware that there is a bill pending, introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]?

Mr. BROWNE. I am.

Mr. KINKAID. Why can not we get consideration of that bill?

Mr. BROWNE. That is what I want to know.

Mr. KINKAID. And relieve this situation.

Mr. BROWNE. That bill was introduced on September 22, has the approval of every department affected—the War Department, Navy Department, the Secretary of Agriculture, Department of Good Roads, the Post Office Department—and I can not for my part see why that bill is not brought up at once and these automobile trucks distributed among the several States as Congress desired and provided in explicit language in the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. KINKAID. We ought to ask for a rule to have the bill brought up and passed.

Mr. BROWNE. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is it not a fact that the use of the trucks by the highway commission would make possible a more careful expenditure of the Government aid in highway construction and enable the State to carry out the program of the department of highways, without which it can not be done and is retarded?

Mr. BROWNE. I think the gentleman is correct. On many of the highways of the United States they are using horses and wagons and carrying only 1 yard of dirt, when an automobile will carry 5 or 6 yards, or five or six times as much as a team, and the truck, with an arrangement for loading, will go so much faster that one man can with a good motor truck do as much work as six or eight men with teams of horses.

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 221) providing for the distribution of motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment.

Whereas Congress has passed an act, approved February 28, 1919, known as an act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, and section 7 of said act provides as follows:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture all available war material, equipment, and supplies not needed for the purposes of the War Department, but suitable for the use in the improvement of highways, and that the same be distributed among the highway departments of the several States to be used on roads constructed in whole or in part by Federal aid, such distribution to be made upon a value basis of distribution the same as provided by the Federal aid road act, approved July 11, 1916: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture at his discretion may reserve from such distribution not to exceed 10 per cent of such material, equipment, and supplies for use in the construction of national-forest roads or other roads constructed under his direct supervision";

And

Whereas there are 14,950 motor trucks now available that have been assigned to the Bureau of Public Roads, Department of Agriculture, which have not been transferred to said bureau; and

Whereas the Bureau of Public Roads has demands from the various State highway commissions for said trucks for the building and improvement of highways constructed in whole or in part by Federal aid: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture all motor trucks, war material, equipment, and supplies not needed for the purpose of the War Department but suitable for use in the improvement of highways, and that the same be distributed among the highway departments of the several States to be used on roads constructed in whole or in part by Federal aid, such distribution to be made upon a value basis of distribution the same as provided by the Federal aid road act approved July 11, 1916: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture at his discretion may reserve from such distribution not to exceed 10 per cent of said trucks, material, equipment, and supplies for use in the construction of national-forest roads or other roads constructed under his direct supervision: Provided further, That any State receiving any of said property for use in the improvement of public highways shall, as to the property it receives, reimburse the Department of Agriculture for all amounts paid by that department to the War Department for reimbursement of loading charges upon said property: Provided, however, That no more motor-propelled vehicles, motor equipment, or other war material shall be transferred to the Agricultural Department for the purpose herein mentioned than said Department of Agriculture shall certify can be efficiently used for such purposes within a reasonable time after such transfer.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, BUREAU OF PUBLIC ROADS,
Washington, D. C., September 26, 1919.

Hon. EDWARD E. BROWNE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your letter of September 25 making inquiry as to the transfer of motor trucks from surplus war equipment to the State highway departments under the provisions of section 7 of the Post Office appropriation act of February 28, 1919. Answering your questions in the order they are given, I have to state as follows:

1. The War Department is not at present and has not for the past four weeks made any transfers of motor-propelled vehicles or motor equipment under the provisions of the above act.

2. There have been actually shipped by the War Department approximately 6,700 trucks to the various State highway departments.

3. Trucks have been received by all the States. The allotment of 20,519 trucks was made on the same basis that Federal aid money is apportioned to the various States. On August 22 this department was notified by the War Department that no further transfers would be made until Congress had passed additional legislation. The Judge Advocate General of the Army ruled that section 5 of the sundry civil bill approved July 19, 1919, repealed that part of section 7 of the Post Office appropriation act in so far as it related to the transfer, without funds, of motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment. Both the House and Senate Military Affairs Committees are now considering legislation to insure the continuance of the transfer of surplus war materials, equipment, and supplies as originally planned by Congress.

4. We believe that the War Department now has on hand approximately 18,000 or 20,000 motor trucks for which they have not issued shipping instructions. These should be available for transfer to the States if Congress passes the required legislation.

5. The War Department is refusing to turn over trucks at the present time. The reason is that given in my answer to your third query.

Should requisite legislation not be passed the State of Wisconsin will lose at least 217 motor trucks, and these of the better makes, such as Packards and Pierce-Arrows.

Very truly, yours,

THOS. H. MACDONALD,
Chief of Bureau.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PURCHASE, STORAGE, AND TRAFFIC DIVISION,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF SALES,
Washington, September 27, 1919.

Hon. EDWARD E. BROWNE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BROWNE: The Assistant Secretary of War has referred to this office your letter to him of September 25, requesting information on motor vehicles.

The chief of the Motor Transport Corps advises that the total number of motor vehicles, including passenger cars, trucks, motorcycles, trailers, and bicycles, purchased by the War Department for use in the United States, is approximately 130,000.

There should be deducted first of all from this figure the machines which have become unserviceable and which have been sold in the past and are now being sold at various storage depots, camps, etc., at public auction. This office has already approved for sale over 5,000 machines of this type, and the Motor Transport Corps estimate that there will be several thousand similar vehicles to be disposed of.

There have been transferred to all Government departments to date approximately 22,000 vehicles. There was transferred to the Agricultural Department, Bureau of Public Roads, 12,875 vehicles out of a total assignment to that department of 27,825. The remaining 14,950 vehicles assigned to the Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Public Roads, but not transferred, are being held temporarily by the War Department pending action by Congress on legislation now pending authorizing this further transfer without an appropriate transfer of funds. The remaining Government departments have requisitioned their approximate total requirements. Any further surplus of motor vehicles, therefore, that may be declared will be available for disposal outside of the Federal Government.

If I can give you any further information on this matter do not hesitate to call on me.

Respectfully,

GUY HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Director of Sales.

MADISON, WIS., September 30, 1919.

Hon. EDWARD E. BROWNE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have yours of the 25th instant relative to surplus equipment to be received by the several States from the War Department for use in highway construction.

* * * * * * *

The road work is reviving to such a tremendous extent that this surplus equipment is worth to the States many times the money which the Government would probably get for it at forced sale, and I believe that the War Department should be made to make good on its original promises, especially as to motor trucks.

With kindest regards, I am,

Yours, very sincerely,

WISCONSIN HIGHWAY COMMISSION,
By A. R. HIRST,
State Highway Engineer.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PURCHASE, STORAGE, AND TRAFFIC DIVISION,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF SALES,
Washington, March 18, 1919.

Hon. EDWARD E. BROWNE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Your letter of February 27 to the Secretary of War has been referred to the office of the Director of Sales for reply. Relative to the disposition of surplus war supplies conforming with the provisions of highway bill, Col. A. O. Seaman, executive officer, Motor Transport Corps, is handling the disposal of all surplus motor-vehicle equipment to be sold or transferred to other Government agencies in accordance with acts of Congress.

In regard to road machinery, the bulk of this class of machinery was used by the Construction Division and was generally rented from various contractors. It is practically impossible at this time to locate Government-owned machinery not in use. The Construction Division is asking for a new inventory, specializing in road and other contractor's equipment, as of April 1. This inventory should be compiled in the office of the Construction Division some time between April 15 and 25.

It is suggested that you get in touch with Col. Seaman immediately in reference to motor vehicles, and about April 20 if you would communicate with Maj. W. M. Crunden, Chief Building Materials Division, office of the Director of Sales, Munitions Building, probably he would then be able to give you definite information concerning contractor's equipment and road-building machinery.

Respectfully,

C. W. HARE,
Director of Sales.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this Congress had made arrangements to adjourn from the 2d of August to the 19th of September. The President of the United States requested them to continue in session. The people of the United States having just come through the war and laboring under the difficulties of what has been characterized as reconstruction, but really which ought to be denominated restoration of the normal functions of the Government, have been looking anxiously to Congress and to the Executive.

Out of a very proper consideration for the President of the United States, Congress consented to remain in session. He read to them on the 8th of August a message in which there was pointed out some remedies for the conditions that exist. From what has been said on the floor of this House, I am convinced that no Member here believes that the high cost of living can be essentially reduced by legislative action. There has been those who are willing to say that the President himself was fully conscious of that fact.

The high cost of living follows the law of supply and demand. If there is a man in the House or in the Senate who knows how to draft a bill that will control the high cost of the necessaries of life, he would do the country a great service if he were willing to introduce such a bill. I would not presume to say that every Member of the House believes that an explanation or solution of the difficulty is specious.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Is it the opinion of the gentleman from Indiana that the farmer producers of foodstuffs are receiving an undue profit at this time?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. It is not, sir. I do not care to go into that particular except to say that the conditions under which wheat is produced in this country to-day are such that the farmer is not receiving an undue profit.

This campaign for the reduction of the high cost of living was begun first a number of years ago by our Democratic friends. They went before the country and heralded it everywhere that it was possible to reduce, by legislative action, the high cost of living. I remember, after the campaign of 1914, a gentleman who was a very active man in that campaign on the Democratic side, said to me, "Well, I never made any speeches in a farming community during this campaign." I said, "Why?" He said, "I do not understand how any farmer could vote the Democratic ticket when we were telling the laboring men in the cities that we intended, by legislative action, to reduce the high cost of living."

There has been no attempt to do that, so far as I know, since the Democrats came into control of the Government. Only through the war period, by granting unusual powers to the Executive, did we undertake to fix prices in any way by legislative action and to determine the cost of living. How inefficient that legislation has been is patent to every man in this country. It was voiced by thoughtful men again and again on the floor of this House that price fixing, as such, was vicious in principle and ineffective in practical results. I do not know, it may be that there are men here who yet believe that by some mode of legislation this Congress could reduce the high cost of living, but I doubt if any man who has studied the subject carefully will be willing to say to the American people, "I can solve this problem by this specific bill which I am willing to father."

I speak of it, gentlemen of the committee, because I think that after all the great American public are wiser, keener, more thoughtful, understand better than we imagine sometimes in this House what are our economic laws, and I am wondering if it is not about time to state in simple, direct language our own convictions as to the possibility by legislative action of reducing the cost of the necessaries of life.

I grant you that so far as legislation about hoarding is concerned, that so far as legislation about monopoly is concerned, all possible legislation of that kind is already on the statute books. It was there when the President made his speech before this Congress; and I am wondering, after all, if whether, on the part of the Executive or on the part of Congress, it is not about time to quit playing politics in connection with sending our views out to the country about these matters.

There were great apprehensions as to what might occur when the war was over. The peak of the men in the Army reached 2,883,000. That has been reduced to about 400,000 men. Much anxiety was expressed as to how these men would find work when they returned. The truth is that that Army has been demobilized and distributed, and the country is doing tolerably well. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the heart and the brain of the American people are sound, and much of this discussion of fear that somehow the foundations will drop out from under the Government because of upheaval and unrest is not well founded. I grant you that continuously we ought to call attention to the basic things that underlie the Government. I am not so fearful of trouble coming up from below as I am of suggestions coming down from above that may undermine, and among these suggestions is the tendency now to underestimate the character and the wisdom and the power of the men who laid the foundations of this Government. This summer, in conversation with a gentleman who assumed to be wise, he said to me, "George Washington was provincial. Why, he never was outside of his own country but once in his life." That is true; and sometimes it seems to me that in the effort to minimize the power, the knowledge, the wonderful wisdom with which those men founded this Government we are doing more to tear down by suggestion from above than we can ever do by unrest that comes from below. [Applause.]

A gentleman a few days ago on this floor delivered an address upon the Constitution of the United States, calling attention to its application to some of the difficult problems that are facing us to-day. I want to call attention to what you all know, that Washington and Hamilton and Jefferson and Madison and Monroe and Marshall were men who first as boys fought for their freedom, and then, having behind them nearly 150 years of experiment in self-government on this continent, took thought for five or six years under the Articles of Confederation, and then for six more years studied to know the best form of government that could be organized, and when the Constitution was finally up for adoption they took two more years, and it was put before every legislature in the United States before it was adopted, and every phrase and every clause was scanned carefully. These men not only created a free Government but they organized it and made it efficient. They had known of the inefficiency of the Articles of Confederation. Marshall and Washington and Hamilton had felt the inadequacy of the Articles of Confederation and had determined that while the right of all the people should be preserved, yet the Government should be strong enough to hold together.

Talk about experienced men! No men on the continent to-day can compare in knowledge and experience with Washington and Hamilton and Jefferson and Madison and Monroe and Marshall in matters governmental. Sometimes we think that the problems of to-day are new problems. Not at all; for in the days of the French Revolution every vagary that the human mind had conceived for the sudden uplift of human society was pamphleteered all over Europe and sent across the ocean, and those men faced socialism and anarchy and all these terrible influences that are spoken of to-day. Men who have studied history know that this is only one of the many situations in the history of the past; and so I think it would be well, if ever again on the floor of this House a man should utter what a man did less than two years ago when he said, "Washington was well enough in his day. I am not looking into the grave; I am looking toward the future," it would be well to suggest to him that it was with just such men as he, born of the basic influences of anarchy and socialism, that the fathers of the Republic had to contend. Get back, get back to an appreciation of the dignity and the power and the majesty of this Government! That is what we want to do.

Men talk about the new freedom and the new day; they talk of reconstruction of the world. If we only knew it, for nearly 150 years we have lived under not only the best Government that ever was created, but I doubt if ever we shall see anything better. It is not reconstruction that we want, but restoration of the normal activities of this Government. These fathers of whom I speak were so jealous of centralized power that they were willing to limit themselves. They who began the formation of this Government were aristocrats—Jefferson and Washington and Madison and Monroe were aristocrats. They owned large landed estates; no menial labor was ever done by them. They had the private tutor in their homes. They had a colored boy to wait upon their every whim. Yet the glory of those men is that they wanted liberty not only for themselves but for all the people of America. That is the distinction, basic, fundamental, between any other form of government on this continent and the Government of the great Republic. In many of the governments there is no middle class. There is the peon, the poor, the despised; there is the wealthy and the educated; and too frequently the men who talk glibly of liberty, speak in rounded measures of the glory of self-determination, have no thought or heart for the poor, the despised, and the downtrodden. We have heard much about self-determination. There is a difference between self-determination and self-government. The wise man and the fool both determine themselves. The fool follows his impulses, the wise man follows his judgment and his reason. The fool goes where he wants to, the wise man goes where he ought to. And so a people may be self-determining without being self-governing. You have heard of Mexico, you folks. Mexico has men who are self-determining, but she is not self-governing, and while it sounds so good that every little people, no matter where they are, should have a right to determine their own form of government without let or hindrance; yet not only in Europe, but here on the American continent, we have found that it does not work and that it will not work. It was my good fortune, with some of my friends, to stop at the island of Haiti. We went into the harbor in the night and the next morning there lay the city, sicklelike by the sea, with the most beautiful curtain of blue through which we could look at the mountains behind. A man said to himself, "What a glorious place in which to live!"

Then, I thought of the history of the case. A hundred years ago the black hero rebelled against the French and destroyed an army of 30,000 Frenchmen and set up a black Republic. They have a constitution, like the United States. They have a Senate and a House and a President, and yet for 100 years they have been trying experiments, with a rebellion every six months, and those fellows conceived this idea down there, that the way to insure peace was to kill off the other fellows, and so when the "outs" would get in they would murder the previous looters unless they had the wisdom to retire to a neighboring island, and they kept it up until in 1915 it became so intolerable that, after 270 of those who had been in when the outs got in were taken out and shot, Uncle Sam one morning in 1915 landed the marines in Haiti and took charge of the country. They have a paper constitution; they have a Senate and a House that sit, and that is about all they do. They have a President who draws a salary, and he is content with that. In the hold of the ship on which we came back was borne the body of a boy who had been shot while leading the gendarmerie of the Haitian Army, and they were shipping him back to this country in a wooden box to his father and mother. Am I criticizing the administration for that? True, they took over the custom-houses; true, they took over the post offices; true, they took charge of all the receipts of Government and organized a gendarmerie and officered it; but they ought to have done so. They did exactly right. I have no criticism upon the administration for that course. But, men, when that little country quoted that every little country should have the right to determine itself without let or hindrance from every other country, and it is recognized as one of the signatories to the league of nations, then I began to wonder how much longer will we be content in this country hypocritically to proclaim a doctrine like that when the exigencies and circumstances compel, and rightly compel, us to do something else. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I asked for the five minutes after I became stirred by the eloquent address of the Member from Indiana in his fervent appeal for a proper respect for the memory and principles of the fathers who builded the Nation. I was in college with the gentleman who has just left the floor. I know his merit and ability, and I know his versatility in history. I want just briefly to state that at the beginning of our national history, to which our colleague referred, there were drafted two widely important instruments that became world wide in their significance, offered as the foundation pillars upon which the Nation was builded. The one was given to the country by Thomas Jefferson, and I think the Declaration of Independence is easily the greatest charter of human liberty that has ever been given to any people by an individual or group of individuals. [Applause.] There is nothing in English history, when you consider it from the standpoint of documents, that will approach that famous charter. I did not ask for time to analyze the charter. It is a mere announcement of the fundamental principle upon which self-government was later builded. That, you all recall, was announced in 1776. Then in 1787, after a period of a few years, called the critical period of American history under the famous Articles of Confederation, we received from Philadelphia, the same city which has given us the Declaration of Independence, that second famous charter, the Constitution of the United States. These two instruments required two classes of ability. Every student of political science will easily recognize that. In other words, the men who framed the Declaration of Independence undoubtedly could not have framed the Constitution. The men who framed the Constitution could not have written the Declaration of Independence. The one represented the liberty of the individual under government and the rights of a State in the confederation, while the other represented the power and authority of Government over the liberty of the individual and supremacy over the State, and both of them clearly express the principle that there is no liberty without authority or government, and there is no authority without liberty, for liberty without authority will be the anarchy that sweeps in certain sections of the world to-day, and authority without liberty of the individual would be the despotism that sometimes in the past swept the world.

Now, members of the committee, this is what I desired to call to your attention. A group of men framed an instrument of 7 short articles, 24 short sections, 84 brief paragraphs couched in about 4,400 words. That is the Constitution of the United States, written at a time when men had never seen a steamboat or a steam car or an electric appliance of any sort, written at a time when we were but 13 States, three millions of people, no complicated society, but quite simple; written at a time when while it is true there was one nationality in New York, another nationality down on the extreme south land to Florida, although that was not a member of the 13 States—another nationality in Delaware, and then throughout the colonies still a fourth nationality—this instrument, written for these nationalities, constituting three millions of people, has lasted up to to-day when we have over 100,000,000 people, and the 13 States skirting the seaboard have now encompassed the continent, covering a territory so wide in extent and so diversified in character of resource as to present a problem from that standpoint alone of national importance. These empire States, each enjoying self-government, in interest seem to be totally antagonistic, yet this instrument has been the organic law under which this marvelous growth, the wonder of the world, has taken place within the hundred years of our existence as a Nation, yet in all that time we have only modified it in six fundamental items. [Applause.]

First, the 11 amendments ought to be considered as but one, and ought not to be regarded as an amendment to the Constitution for this reason: There was a variety of opinion in the convention as to whether we ought to have a bill of rights written into the Constitution or whether it ought to be a separate instrument like the civil rights bill of Virginia, which was not associated with the Constitution. They finally decided the proper thing would be to let the Bill of Rights be appended to the Constitution, not as a part of it, except in effect, but let it be added in the form of amendment and let the amendments be suggested by the various States who were asked to ratify the Constitution. And when they examined these various recommendations, most of them already agreed to by members of the Constitutional Convention, and returned to Congress, it was found in analyzing them that there were 12 different amendments proposed. They were submitted to the States and 10 of them were immediately ratified. Those are not amendments to the Constitution. Those were agreed to as the Bill of Rights by the members of the Constitutional Convention, and it is wrong to say that the first 10 amendments, or even 11, were amendments to the Constitution, which was working a difference from what the fathers in the convention expected to write. So just omit those. Or call them one; but you ought not even to do that, for they do not represent changes not favored by the members of the convention.

The twelfth amendment, which changed the method of the election of the President and Vice President, is a real amendment. That is the first. The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments all pertain to the slavery question and all grew out of the Civil War, and, so far as the modification of the organic law is concerned, the three would mean simply one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. May I have just two minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I beg the pardon of the gentleman. I did not know that it was going to take so much time.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am very much interested.

Mr. FESS. The three slavery amendments, which ought more properly to be called the "war amendments," are really but one modification of the organic law. The sixteenth amendment is a real modification, which is the income-tax amendment. The seventeeth amendment is quite a distinctive modification, which relates to the election of the Senators by the people. That is quite different from what was urged in the Constitutional Convention. And the other amendment is the prohibition amendment, and pertains to the manufacture and sale of liquor. Here are 18 amendments, which represent but a half dozen modifications.

I do not believe that the first 10 amendments ought to be regarded as modifications. The eleventh ought not to be, because Judge Marshall said that under the Constitution a State could not be sued by a citizen, and when Griswold, down in Georgia, sued the State of Georgia—the fact was that while they said he could not do it, he did—then it was asked that the Constitution be modified in accordance with the opinion already expressed, which was done. But the twelfth amendment is one. The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth will make a second; the sixteenth a third; the seventeenth a fourth; and the eighteenth a fifth. When the nineteenth amendment shall have been ratified it will make a half dozen modifications in this organic law. Members will be interested to know that up to 1889 there had been proposed 1,736 amendments, but only 18 ratified, which represent but a half dozen real changes.

I challenge the world to show in all history a similar instance of such record for genuine stability as displayed by this history of a young Republic, the first Republic of the world, that has grown to the mightiest Republic at this hour, under an instrument that has had but half a dozen changes in over 100 years. [Applause.]

I beg for that respect due to the fathers and the instrument that they gave to the world, which up to date has been the sheet anchor of our liberties and which must operate against all the wild mouthings of the un-American elements in our midst. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. DALE].

Mr. DALE. Mr. Speaker, Belgium is sending her chief citizens to visit our country. The first to come, a messenger of good will and appreciation, is the only man of public power who persisted in his opposition to German aggression and stayed in the occupied territory of Belgium through the war, Désiré Joseph, Cardinal Mercier. His coming is an event of international consequence; he is an eminent person who has met an heroic duty; he expresses the spirit of a faithful people; he represents an element of patriotism in the World War. Because of this and much more, he deserves and will receive most cordial welcome throughout the country.

Cardinal Mercier was 67 years old the 22d day of last November. The place of his nativity is near Waterloo and of his earliest recollections are the veterans of that historic field. He is of Walloon ancestry, a descendant of the ancient Belgae. He made a profound study of the sciences and philosophy as related to theology, and as professor of philosophy and psychology at Malines, and later at the celebrated University of Louvain, he was years since known as a leader among educators. When the Catholic University was established in Washington repeated efforts were made to obtain him as one of the faculty, but he was too deeply and usefully settled at Louvain to be removed.

Through 14 years of the reign of Leopold I, the 44 years of Leopold II, and these 10 years of Albert I Cardinal Mercier has lived, and his interests have been interwoven with those of the three men who have been at the head of the Government since Belgium became an independent State. He was designated as archbishop and primate of Belgium in 1906 and succeeded to the exalted position which he now holds in 1907; Albert became King of the Belgians in 1909, so that for 10 years, and through its well-nigh overwhelming experience, the little State of Belgium has had the rare fortune to have in positions of sovereign responsibility these two incomparable men, each a genius and a marvel in his place. In great measure because of this fact the Government, swept to the sand dunes of Flanders and to foreign shores, cathedrals leveled, and Louvain University destroyed, have become as incidents, and with renewed power and inspiration the Government abides and faith prevails in Belgium.

Cardinal Mercier in the world crisis is the only man who could have done what he did. Among the many ways of helpfulness opened by the war, his line of service stands out distinct. Therefore what he did can not be measured by comparison. The service he rendered was impossible of performance save by one in a high place of influence. That position he held, but it was only his opportunity. It is the character of the man as he met the opportunity which attracts attention. His sympathy, courage, and wisdom, directed by his great intellect, made effective his efforts to both impel good and check evil, and brought results of the highest benefit to civilization. Such a man meeting such a crisis with such results becomes preeminent. It is a slow process by which eminent men are brought to just estimate. When history has measured what Cardinal Mercier did to sustain the morale of soldiers, to stimulate the endurance of civilians, to counteract propagandism through channels open only to him and reaching to its source in Germany, to enthuse the sense of equity in other nations until the effect was felt by our own long indifferent Government—when history has measured his influence with his own people and thence out into international affairs, it will be known that his character was proportioned to be strong for highest service in a righteous cause. When the record is made of the utterances of men who approved the abandonment of honor to necessity, of men who advocated a patriotism which had lain dormant in themselves, of men who announced the need for a faith they lacked the spirit to inspire, of men who voiced conflicting principles because of many reasons—when it is made plain what need there was for strong, consistent men to go straight forward in forming public opinion, Cardinal Mercier will be recognized as one who did with just and sane and firm power a great public service none other could have done, and so well that his name will stand as a white light in history.

One day, on invitation of his eminence, we went to Malines. Our course was through the territory across which the Belgian troops were forced in 1914. At Louvain the walls of the University Library, within which had been gathered through 500 years books and manuscripts priceless and beyond duplication until it had become a treasury to the world, stood scorched and broken in the mist, like forms within a veil of sorrow. Slowly we traversed the streets of the city in which more than 200 civilians had been killed. Along the way, hidden by the mist, more than 600 men, women, and children were deported to Germany, and we took the road out which 10,000 inhabitants, their right divine of helplessness denied, were driven like cattle toward Malines and beyond it to the sea.

I am glad that many persons in our country will meet Cardinal Mercier and behold what manner of man he is, for I realize how much of the substance of his nature can not be described.

When he received us at his residence I felt that element in him which is spiritual and beyond description reach out to welcome me. It was in the forward inclination of his tall form, the clasp of his strong hand, and the expression of his blue eyes. I felt that he could dispel doubt and inspire faith and help his fellow men. The benevolence of his nature, grown abundant by ministering to the needs of others, seemed to bestow itself and become a consciousness not to be put into words. Of that we think.

Our going to the ecclesiastical palace was an event which for me, among many of interest and emotion, stands out intense and by itself. After we had been received we were summoned to seats around a long table. In the ceiling of the room, torn by the shells of the invaders, were ragged holes through which one could look to the roof, hastily and roughly replaced to meet the necessity. A plain repast had been prepared in perfect keeping with the day and the conditions. About the table sat a company assembled from distant places, of different nationalities, and of sundry opinions; but a common interest had brought us there, compassion had made us kin, and all our thoughts played forth and back like chords in unison. We had come thinking our host would be an austere man, a solemn dignitary. We found him stately, as becomes his high position, but a man in whose glance sweet humor shone, and in telling something so tenderly you must brush away a tear, his fine wit would bring you to a smile. Priests and some Belgian soldiers were there, lately released from prison and the trench and escaped from death, and in whose faces was the look of unutterable thoughts. It was a singular company of men, one-half the number of whom could speak or understand but little of the language of the others. Those who spoke English were seated alternately with those who spoke French, and the attempts to convey and comprehend thoughts soon banished restraint and set free good fellowship. Cardinal Mercier is a linguist. His address to us was, as we expected, scholarly in diction, style, and sentiment, and with fine courtliness he spoke, as we had not anticipated, in correct, modern English. Fortunately there was one among our number who made it possible to respond with due courtesy. The gentleman from Louisiana, Dr. LAZARO, rose to the occasion and, in the vernacular of the locality, expressed our compliments with most gratifying deference and felicity.

When it became evident to Germany that Belgium would stand in defense of its honor, that which the imperial chancellor was pleased to call necessity demanded the gaining of two results: First, that the Belgian State might be conquered; its army must be crushed; second, that its people might be subjugated, their spirit must be broken. That the first necessity would be quickly met was apparent at the outset. Incredible as it seemed to German thought that Belgian soldiers would stay in their crumbling forts till defeat and death closed in, glorious as it seemed to every heart responsive to dauntless impulse that Belgian soldiers did do this to gain a few days' time for their allies and thereby save their honor, heroic as this quick, armed resistance was known to be, it had soon to yield before the irresistible force of the invader. This short scene, supreme of its kind in history, was known and sensed by the world at the time, but through the after scenes of that deep tragedy there was a resistance to invasion in Belgium of another nature, made by the civilian population, which long study and reflection will bring more and more to the world's comprehension. The first so-called necessity past, the second confronted the imperial command. What the Belgian people suffered from the attempt to break their spirit can never be written. And yet in time to come generations will read recorded facts and exclaim, "Can it be possible? It seems incredible!" Places that were sacred were destroyed, civilians who were without offense were shot, and persons who were pure were violated. Men lost their reason, women went mad, and children lapsed into idiocy. And yet something kept the people of Belgium from despair and surrender. What was it? You may explain it by whatever theory seems to you most reasonable, and you may call it by what name you please, but there is one word in our language which gives it best expression, and that is "faith." What did the people of that nation, with their traditions and aspirations and inherent sensibilities, need more than all else to lead them through this dark valley and save them from despair? There can be no doubt about it. A great-souled man, of them and yet above them, who could suffer with them in common and yet keep his poise superior. And the incarnation of that need, faithful and fearless, they had in Désiré Joseph, Cardinal Mercier.

The residence of the Cardinal to which we had come stood all through the war as a great rock in a weary land. There were times when the Cardinal was forbidden to go among his people and forced to stay within the walls of his domicile; there were times when the military authorities contemplated putting him in restraint—but he stayed. He stayed and defended and insofar as possible protected the civil population. He knew that he could do this best by going directly and openly to his purpose. He publicly indicted the oppressor and never once showed weakness or retracted a statement that he published. Ultimately the conduct of men is governed by forces intangible. Each of these forces is a concentration of ideas and feelings slowly accumulated until it becomes a masterful conception of rights and responsibilities. Frightfulness and kultur are names, filled with new and terrible significance, of two of these conceptions. There is another which you may call by what name you please which is the antithesis of these, and within the impregnable fortress of which dwelt Cardinal Mercier. The German military command held the Belgian people completely within its iron grasp; its conception of frightfulness was let loose; its conception of kultur was unrestrained; they were imperious and seemed to be resistless; and yet, where dwelt Belgium's primate, sustained by ideas and feelings centuries old, within that protection invisible but which cased him in like adamant, this savage authority had the sense to stop. The King was with his troops on the frontier; both branches of parliament were beyond the border. An enemy governor ruled at the capitol, and his military courts sat in the senate chamber. For the Belgian people there was in their own land no place of reliance nor center of stability—save one. The Cardinal's domicile was there. The roof was torn away, but through it came the light and shone the stars. Within that one refuge, counseling through ghastly days and dreadful nights his troubled people, calmly stating the wrongs Germany was committing, and fearlessly admonishing the soldiers and civilians to stand fast, remained Cardinal Mercier. There in the midst of frightfulness he stayed and turned public opinion against the invader. There imperial authority balked, angered, desperate, paused, and within those gray old walls, to lay a hand upon him, dared not go.

During the war the most appalling policy was followed in Belgium by German command. This policy, as reviewed, takes on distinct and successive phases, or you may say it is advanced by elements of cruelty, each organized and executed with a purpose to make it more inexorable than that before it, until the accumulation shall have become fatal to Belgian endurance. It is the manner in which Cardinal Mercier met, one after another, these separate and awful energies which brings out his superb character. One must find the conditions resulting from the elements of this policy and the manner in which Cardinal Mercier checked, one by one, their efficacy, to understand why they did not, when amassed, break the spirit of his people.

First the code of morals was set aside and civilians were falsely accused of acts of hostility, and with this for excuse the solemn covenants of nations were repudiated and collective penalties, expressly prohibited by the laws of war even when acts of hostility have been committed by individuals, were imposed upon the Belgian population. Go with me for just a glance at the condition created by this element of German policy. One day last spring we motored through a pleasant valley which brought us abruptly to the River Meuse and to Dinant. You have come to places in your travels which stay in recollection and to which you can turn as to a picture on a wall. Like that I think of Dinant. Straight ahead a temporary bridge on the wreckage of the one which had been knocked down; on the other side the river, a precipitous cliff extending each way beyond sight and rising by the bridge some 200 feet higher than the basic wall, a huge rock formation with front and sides almost perpendicular. At the base of this great height an old gothic church built of blocks cut out of it and with central tower nearly finished since destruction, reaching high, but only part way up the cliff; at the top the citadel, also of stone, for defense of the city. Far up and down the Meuse the lesser cliff is still precipitous and the city lies between it and the river, crowded on one side out over the water and on the other pushed part way up the cliff on terraces. Before the war one might have followed a long and narrow street to the suburbs and beyond to the picturesque chateaux among the cliffs and thought how peaceful the city looked and how contented its people were. Oh, yes; it had known desolation; many times war had swept over it, and once in the struggles between savage dukes it had been destroyed, but that was long ago and no man living could recall an hour of danger in the quiet streets of Dinant. All was peace and pleasant anticipation until a few days before the awful tragedy. August 15, 1914, the French troops had come up to the west bank of the River Meuse and the German troops to the heights on the opposite side, and all that day an artillery battle prevailed over the city. At night, although the German flag flew from the citadel, the French had held them on the heights and checked the advance. During the following week, from the near-by villages under German occupation, messengers who risked the penalty of death to do it brought to Dinant information that the destruction of the city and the massacre of its inhabitants had been decreed. German prisoners taken later gave the names of the officers who issued the order to burn the houses and shoot the civil population.

On Friday night a party of German cavalrymen accompanied by armored motor cars rode into the city and spent the night in bestial carousal. While the horror-stricken civilians crouched in hiding, the invaders beat down doors, threw grenades into windows, and shot helpless victims. We saw the ruins of an apartment house which was set on fire that night, and in which two men, a woman, and two children were compelled to remain and burn. We talked with M. Petit, whose wife had been fatally wounded at her own fireside, and with his little daughter, who came out to us on crutches, having had her leg amputated because of gunshot wounds inflicted at the same time. I speak from observation in this and not at all from hearsay. It is said that nearly half the population of the city were taken by the French across the river the following day. By Saturday the German Army headquarters had been established in the outskirts of Dinant and the French troops had received orders to retire. Capt. Jacques Guillard was ordered to cover the French retreat with his regiment of artillery. By afternoon the ammunition of the French had given out, their horses were dead, and the gallant captain had been killed by a shell. It has been found by indisputable evidence of German documents that the supreme command of the German Army ordered that the city of Dinant be sacked on the following Sunday, in line with the warning which the messengers had brought days before and which the incredulous people could not believe. The brutal massacre of that Sunday is a record to which the darkest page in the history of barbarous acts can scarcely show a parallel. It commenced down the river from the gray old church at a sawmill, where more than 50 were killed outright. Then from out their homes, from cellars, and all places of concealment defenseless victims were drawn by this horde of mailed soldiers and driven along the highway—where? To the very place in which dwelt men whose high deeds stood out in contrast to the low acts committed in their presence. They drove their victims to a peaceful valley in the rugged landscape where stands the Abbaye des Premontres—the Abbey of the Premonstratensians—that ancient order of canons who are always robed in white. In that place, designed for refuge, in the gardens of the white-robed canons, they committed their black acts.

'Oh! Judgment thou art fled to brutish beasts,
And men have lost their reason.

Men were struck down while little children clung to them; women were brained who flung themselves as a shield to their husbands. More than forty were stood up by the abbey wall and shot amid the shrieks of their wives and children. When they had come to the woolen mills of Monsieur Himmer, consul of the Argentine Republic, and he stood pleading and offering his life and fortune for his employees, he and 43 others were stricken down to death.

I might go on telling you of individual cases—of how women, one 83 years old, and girls and infants died; of infirm old men and little boys shot at the wall. We read the recorded names and ages—647 of them. We were taken to the Tschoffen wall and the Laurent wall, spattered with bullet marks—the walls against which men and boys were placed and shot at the signal of the whistle. We talked with men and women who saw it all, and with M. Van Heden Fraikin, who fell, when shot, under the mass of dead and dying, and, being conscious, laid quiet, and by miracle escaped the stab of the bayonet, crawled out at night, and survived. As he told us the experience, he pulled open his blouse and disclosed the bullet scars on his breast. An aged matron took us to the place where her garden had been dug up to bury every relative she had—husband, sons, and others killed that day. All day and on into Monday the killing and the burning went on. Did anyone escape? you may ask. Oh, yes; some swam the river without being shot, others got away in strange ways, and some found concealment and came forth again half starved. And 417 ablebodied men did not die. These were assembled into a mournful procession and driven—where? Oh, the unnatural—and yet, perhaps, better—the supernatural association of sacred places and names with the most cruel scenes in this Belgian land of tragedy. They drove them up the Montagne De la Croix—the Mountain of the Cross—up to that high place from whence they could take one last look into the valley of flame and sorrow where once were their homes and families, and then they were deported—sent to Cassell beyond the Rhine.

The crimes done at Dinant had been committed earlier and were repeated later in from sixty to a hundred places. They mark the route of each of the five German armies, a trail of fire and blood; five trails they are, uniform, premeditated, bestial. But I did not come to accuse the German military policy; the verdict is rendered by civilization, and by it Germany bears upon its face the mark of the primal curse forever. I would have you think of those who suffered from the crime. At Liege they told me that the first shots in the war killed two inoffensive Belgians who were standing by the bridge at Vise—Vise that used to be, for it is all gone, and whole families died in the flames of their homes. This was the beginning, and the like of it went on through all the territory which the invaders swept. I might review the horrors of places through which the Belgian lieutenant, Van Goethem, took us, from Liege to Brussels; of the killing and the burning at Namur and Andenne; of the destruction of the great iron and steel foundries at Charleroi, through the ruins of which we walked for hours. One could talk of the depredations of Tamine and Aershot and Louvain; of the awful splendor of description of the burning of magnificent buildings; of men and women who told of their efforts to keep a mental poise amid the loss of all for which they cared to live; of the curé passing with reverent step between the rows of hundreds of little wooden crosses, each bearing the same date; of the throng of citizens, homeless and bereaved, who came out when Emile Tibbaut, vice president of the chamber of representatives, took us to the desolated village of Termonde, which was his home. And then I would have to stop, having only touched the fringe of the enormity of it all.

Month after month this went on and with it the flight of the people before the hideous terrorization. Men and women of all stations brought by catastrophe to a common level scarcely less than death creates, plodding their weary way through rain and mud, going somewhere because on earth there was no place in which they could abide. Cold and hungry, they staggered on, their ranks lessened by those who fell exhausted—perchance to die. Some stumbled on alone with none to render so much as the help of a gentle touch; others kept together drawn by that power, whatever it may be called, which accompanies faith and hope, and is the greatest of these. In this manner the Belgian people are driven on to the winter in which, for lack of fuel, they will be cold; for lack of food, they will be hungry and maybe starve. In this dire strait they have come to the world's one season when cheer sends out its loving gifts and every little candle throws its helpful beams. The Belgians have come to the Christmas time and when the sweet bells of memory are rung, to them—

A sorrow's crown of sorrow is remembering happier things.

What then and there was needed to bring quickest and surest relief to this condition? More than all else some way was needed to bring the facts to the attention of the world. I have said that ultimately the conduct of men is governed by the intangible force which is the concentration of ideas and feelings into a masterful conception of rights and responsibilities. The common and inadequate term for this is public opinion.

What was needed then and there was some influence to shape quickly into masterful power this conception we call public opinion. On the one side was the Prussian conception, absolute, inhuman, implacable, concentrated, completely energized and enormous in bulk to crush the Belgian people. On the other side was the opposite conception so widely scattered that you seek in vain for a word within which it may be included, and everywhere that it exists are sympathy and benovelence and justice and all righteous qualities which once ensembled would make it great and strong to lay the mightiest opponent at its feet. Germany understood that the struggle was not only between engines of war in which it was then strong, but it knew full well that over and above this the conflict was between opposing opinions, conceptions, and in that conflict Germany knew that its antagonist, once roused, would be the victor. Therefore it checked the source of every stream which might turn the flood of public opinion against it. It censored the mails and suppressed the newspapers and fixed by military law the severest penalties against the publication and utterance within its occupied territory of any word or sentiment which did not bear the stamp of its censor's approval. Apparently the German authorities had control of every means of publicity which could be at all potential, and no one, even though he dared, could find an instrument with which to check the false impression of the conditions which was going broadcast. Then appeared the only man in all the world who, speaking from his place of influence, could give his word effect and create an opposing force; and then began the remarkable contention between the German system on the one side and Cardinal Mercier alone on the other, and that he could stand the antagonist of this enormous system through four years, and until it went down, is of itself sufficient proof that Cardinal Mercier is a man of consummate ability.

It was the German will, then in complete control, that no man should question the methods employed in the operation of its system. In line with its general policy to condone its atrocities by accusing its victims of acts still more atrocious first committed, German propagandists had sent imputations worldwide of fiendish cruelties perpetrated by the Belgian civil population, such as sniping and horrible mutilations, even to the gouging out of the eyes of living German soldiers. To these inhuman practices, it was asserted, the Belgians had been incited by their burgomasters and their clergy. In many parts of the world this propaganda of falsehood was having its effect, for no one in Belgium could contradict it. The youthful Father Dupiereux had been shot for writing in his diary that after the burning of Louvain Library the barbarians can no longer utter a word of condemnation against Khalif Omar for the burning of the library at Alexandria; and more than 50 priests had been killed, and not one of them for a greater offense. Particular vigilance was used to prevent correct information from reaching the United States. We were sending from our abundance food to the Belgians, but our benevolence must not be allowed to grow into sympathy for them as the oppressed of German oppressors. Therefore facts were concealed from us and confusing questions were perpetually suggested: Are conditions really desperate in Belgium? Is not there some justification for Germany? Will we not get involved ourselves? The whole frightful condition went on for lack of one word which would become a thing to check the huge bulk of German diplomacy and cut the tangle of negotiations and inflame public opinion to save a dying nation. The German Emperor telegraphed to President Wilson about the Belgians: "The cruelties committed in the course of this guerilla warfare by women and even by priests on doctors and nurses have been such that my generals have been obliged at last to have recourse to the severest measures to punish the guilty and to hinder the bloodthirsty population from continuing to commit these abominable crimes." Another telegram, which was heralded all over the United States, was one sent to Cardinal Mercier by the German abbot, Dom Ildefons Herwegen, begging the cardinal, for the love of God, to protect the German soldiers from the infliction of such tortures. This propaganda was accomplishing the purpose for which it was sent out, and anyone responsible for an effectual check to it would anger the imperial command beyond measure. Therefore I say it is a fact remarkable, aye, sublime, that right in the center of German occupation there dwelt a man who from his exalted place and out of his high character could speak the word to smite the very head and front of this offense and stagger this monstrous thing of Prussian kultur and by the light he turned upon conditions reform the world opinion of the Belgians.

After what sights and thoughts came the decision of the great-souled man to write his New Year's pastoral! Through what days of sad experience and nights of deep reflection was formed the argument to save his beloved people! How many hours he paced his quiet study seeking to poise his mind for the great effort, as an aviator adjusts his plane for a perilous flight! How many times his conscious being went out through the blue mists and beyond the silent bells in the broken tower to find the infinite wisdom essential to his service! In this manner Belgium's primate came to his convictions of duty. It was a vast requirement which he faced. Against the order of a military command in absolute control and without compassion, he determined upon a supreme effort to inspire his people with the spirit of endurance and to check with all his might the will of the German to break that spirit. Against the order which months of carnage had proven to be without limit in its penalties, he calmly decided to publish the wrongs done to the civil population of Belgium, and the crimes committed by German soldiers, and, if possible, create, among neutral nations for his people, a potent public opinion. Knowing full well that his action might mean imprisonment or death, he heard only the clear call to a great duty which he alone could meet, and he went straight to it with that holy purpose which lifts man's soul above all dread of physical violence.

In his pastoral he reviewed the calamities of four months which he said had been age-long to him; paid tribute to the soldiers and the King; and urged his people to endurance, that Belgium "after the vicissitudes of battle might rise nobler, purer, more erect, and glorious than before," and he proclaimed the fine assurance to the world, "as long as we are required to give proof of endurance, so long we shall endure." He outlined his philosophy of man's duty to the State, the very opposite and most condemnatory of the Prussian theory, and contradicted the rule laid down by the military command, by proclaiming that "occupied provinces are not conquered provinces"; and then he stated what no other man in Belgium could have said and escaped severe, if not capital, penalty of military law. With a clear statement which drives home its force, he says: "The sole lawful authority in Belgium is that of our King, of our Government, of the elected representatives of the nation. This authority alone has a right to our affection, our submission." I would not attempt a synopsis of this document, and have only drawn attention to a few elements in it which indicate the direct and fearless spirit in which it was issued. Its force is made evident by the attempts of the German kommandants to overcome it and by the results they were unable to prevent. Cardinal Mercier directed that it be read from every pulpit on New Year's Day and on the Sunday after its receipt, for by the uncertain means of distribution it might meet delays. You know how the faithful clergy read it and how the German military officers heard it with consternation. From headquarters the order was issued to quickly and completely suppress it. It was demanded of priests at the point of the bayonet, and churches and rectories were broken open to obtain it. New Year's night five closely muffled men, accompanied by a squad of soldiers, went to Malines; not to arrest the cardinal; oh, no. He was there, and they knew he did not fear them; oh no. He was there, and they feared him. They knew that to touch this venerable man would ruin all their calculations. Not for him had they come, but for Francis Dessain, acting burgomaster of Malines, who had printed the pastoral in his brother's shop. This man, a graduate of Oxford, England, sat with us at the cardinal's table and related his experience. Quietly these five muffled men stole up and wakened him by tossing gravel against his window, and as he looked out one of them asked him in French to come to the door. When he had come down he was suddenly seized, and a voice muttered, "Say a word and you will be shot." He went to prison. Many priests, some of whom we met, were imprisoned for reading the pastoral. But it went out a mighty influence. The wide and closely woven system of censorship, vigilant and merciless, could not suppress it. Like the shot fired by our own ancestors at Concord Bridge, it was Heard 'round the world.

It outstripped the winds over lands and seas and became a vital thing in many tongues to make thousands, aye, millions, think. And the man who wrote it and whom they could not compel to retract a word of it walked calmly in the midst of their desperation and they dared not touch him.

We are told that history repeats itself, and so it does in general. But there are times which recur at long intervals when events centering and culminating create a condition quite unlike anything in recollection or on record. Such a condition existed in Belgium during the war. The Government was driven out, the State was completely under military rule, and the German Emperor controlled its 7,000,000 of people through his governor general, whose place of authority was in Belgium's capital. And yet quietly, almost like a spectral figure, there appeared in the midst of this people, who, unconquered, yet were imprisoned, one man who was the personification of their emotions and convictions, their ideas political and ethical, and in whom they could repose their every confidence as the one defense against a pitiless oppression. He comes without political authority, without selection of the electorate, against the will of the military governor, and seems put there by the act of God. And there he stays, the counsellor, the defender, the advocate, the guardian of that people all through the war, alone, unmoved and immovable. He is shorn of civic authority and without so much as a military guard, and yet the most brutal and stupendous military creation known to man fell back before his invincible power. I say it is a condition new to history.

One after another Cardinal Mercier had to meet the successive elements of the struggle he had assumed. He had to defend his people against an assault which must have cut him to the heart. He, to whom the weary and heavy laden had brought their burdens for years and found rest through his sacred offices, now had to defend these, his children, in direst need against the most cruel imputations of his brother cardinals and bishops of the Central Powers. For months, by correspondence and conference with the kommandants and military governors, Cardinal Mercier had labored for the establishment of a commission, whose chairman would be the representative of a neutral Government, to find the facts as to the cruelties imputed to the civilians of Belgium. He had suggested as the presiding officer of this commission Brand Whitlock, the American minister at Brussels. And now, following his practice to state clearly and logically his case, as in a lawyer's brief, he prepares his statement and appeal, in which the five bishops of Belgium unite, to the cardinals and bishops of the Central Powers. In this he first reviews forcefully, but with no expression of hate, the charges that have been brought against his people and concludes, "We know that these shameless accusations of the Imperial Government are calumnies from end to end. We know it and we swear it." Then he pleads with them to grant the court of arbitration, which the occupying power has refused. He states that under the shelter of its moral authority witnesses will feel secure in relating what they have seen and the world will have faith in its reports. He recites the conduct of the invaders, quotes the German chancellor and the German bishops and brings his argument to the one issue, "The proof of the facts by a commission whose impartiality is and appears to all unimpeachable."

Then he reviews the violations of The Hague convention and of international law and appeals to the moral sense of "something more profoundly sad than political divisions and material disasters. It is the hatred which injustice, real or supposed, stores up in so many hearts created to love one another." He closes by invoking the consecration vows of those on both sides of the contention and the obligations they impose to respond to the desire of the highest authority for the "truth on which must rest justice, the honor of nations, and at length peace." To my mind this is a powerful instrument. It meets a condition so unlike that confronting the first pastoral that the two documents can not be judged by comparison. The two must stand out unlike, save in the splendor of their individual character. Through all the dreadful experience which must have tried the patience of his eminence to the extreme, he writes no word of bitterness nor ever descends to ridicule, though the German press at times used both these weapons against him. Conscious of this fact, the publisher of La Libre Belgique, unable to restrain his sympathy for his revered cardinal, gives expression to his emotions. It is an interesting and touching incident. The paper had been suppressed, and yet from time to time it issued from its undiscoverable source and gave defiant expression to its loyal sentiments. One day it appeared out of mystery and dropped in Belgium and in Germany with this paragraph addressed to the German cardinals:

> Come, your eminences! Here is a good move! Come to Belgium yourselves; you are in your own home here! The motor cars of the kommandantur will carry you. Our great cardinal shall go afoot. You will have the goodness to wait for him, will you not—this sage, this saint, this scholar, this ardent patriot? He will lead you step by step where crimes have been committed that are nameless, debauches and outrages without precedent; he will give you names and dates; he will give you so many and before so many witnesses. Nevertheless, most eminent lordships, if you should decide to come do not don your red robes. One black robe will suffice. When you shall have walked for a few hours your cassocks will be red, soaked in the blood of our martyrs. But then Cardinal Mercier will not care to walk beside you.

The courageous manner in which Cardinal Mercier met and opposed the charges promulgated by brothers of his own communion again had an effect helpful to his people which no other man could have created. The arraignment of the Belgians by dignitaries of such high authority could be effectually answered only by a person in like authority and in whom the public had faith.

While Cardinal Mercier was defending the Belgians against the attacks made upon them as a nation, he was exerting himself to the utmost to bring relief to them as individuals. Day after day he visited the infirm and sorrow stricken who could not come to him. When the use of a conveyance was prohibited, he walked along the highways. At a time of extreme misery he visited in three days more than 100 homes, and when his strength failed him he called upon his priests to become the missionaries of his thoughts and feelings and to help sustain the fortitude of the afflicted.

Years before Cardinal Mercier with two associates had founded at Louvain the Institute of Philosophy. It had been turned into the Hospital St. Thomas. The small corps of the hospital had arranged a kind of fête day. It could be hardly more than a family gathering. Everything had to be done with the utmost simplicity—a little music, some verses, and some flowers. Cardinal Mercier had been informed of their plans, but they did not look for him. He had not forgotten them, and unexpectedly he came and by his presence brought to this place of grim work in the afflicted city the influence to make of it a cheerful and memorable occasion.

His eminence is a man whose presence is impressive and moves others to response. He comes and goes as just outlined, and the impression and response are quiet and deep. Again he appears on some great occasion. As by cumulative force, he lifts an assemblage to the spirit of his theme, and when he has concluded it answers in a vast surge of response. This occurred on Belgium's national holiday, July 21, 1916.

The military authorities had prohibited all demonstrations of a patriotic nature. Under their order no speeches could be made, no flags could be displayed, and no insignia could be worn in honor of the day. Stores must be kept open as usual and even the placing of flowers in memory of the dead was not permitted. The penalty for violation of this decree was imprisonment for six months or a fine equivalent to $4,000, or both. On this day, under the heaviest cloud of gloom that had ever hung over Belgium, a congregation of thousands had gathered in the ancient church of St. Gudule in Brussels. Again without announcement and in answer to the wish of those who revered him, the cardinal came. This time he appeared in all the stateliness and dignity of his position. To his people assembled on the national holiday and denied a flag, a ribbon, or a flower to do it reverence, he came, the one man whose insignia of office they dared not take away, and he wore the gorgeous colors of the apparel and the golden mitre of his state. His very appearance gave them confidence and lifted them out of their mourning. Then mark you the wisdom of his first utterance, which took their thoughts out of despondency and threw them forward into brightest anticipation: "Our restored cathedrals and our rebuilt churches will be thrown widely open; the crowds will surge in; our King Albert, standing on this throne, will bow his unconquered head before the King of Kings." It was a wonderful discourse and so well adapted to the conditions. One can not give it just review. As it opened, so it closed, with inspiration. This was its concluding sentence: "When we recall the dark years of 1915–16, they will appear to us the brightest, the most majestic, and if from to-day we resolve that they shall be so, the happiest and the most fruitful in our national history. Per crucem ad lucem—from the sacrifice, the light." No one moved until after the absolution, and then the great organ peeled forth the Brabanconne and the congregation rose in a vast surge of response, crying, "Vive le Roi!" "Vive le Cardinal!" They swept out and stood massed along the streets still shouting until the soldiers charged them.

We went to the church of St. Gudule and studied the exquisite, carved pulpit from which the cardinal spoke that day. It nearly fills the space between two stone columns and to the arch above them, and is a masterpiece of wood carving. Human figures and animals and birds and trees with their branches and leaves all carved in oak. In the midst of the more ancient surroundings it has stood for 200 years an expression in allegory of a great faith. It recalled what Ruskin said of the carvings in Amiens: "Fuller of leafage than any forest and fuller of story than any book." But I thought that of all the stories which it suggests there is not one which is fuller of inspiration than the occasion of the cardinal's coming to the help of his depressed people, which no carver's hand has the cunning to portray and which will be told to generations yet to be. Because the populace, recognizing their primate's devotion to the nation, had made this demonstration, the city was fined the equivalent of $200,000. Oh, the irony of it! If it were the measure of their response to his devotion, it were far too small, and if there were sacrifice in the paying of it, so much it heightened the spirit of their patriotism. As we came out of St. Gudule, one who was with me exclaimed quietly: "What would his people have done without him?"

And then the monstrous thing happened. Not satisfied with killing and calumny and burning, the German high command ordered the able-bodied of the Belgian civilians deported. They herded them like cattle into box cars and took them to Germany to relieve men in the fields and factories to fight against the Belgian Army and its allies. They could not drive the cardinal from his people, and while he stayed they could not break the people's spirit; ay, and with all the machinery of their propaganda they could not convict that people in the world's opinion. They could do none of this while the cardinal stayed. But they could take his people from him; and that, I say, was the climax of the tragedy—the monstrous thing. Then Cardinal Mercier rose to the supremacy of his power, and, as ever, with civility and never the show of rancor, with keen intellect and argument from facts, the evidence of which he had assembled through months of foresight, he took his place in masterful argument and appeal. Through a long period he maintained his position by correspondence with chiefs of military departments and the governor general. The documents in this controversy, set side by side, express the two great conceptions—right and might—in their vital conflict. Again the case went to the world jury and stirred this time a universal remonstrance. The President of the United States and the King of Spain made protest. Then—mark you this, for it indicates who then was the master mind of all—the German Emperor sent his envoy with announcement that he would rescind the order of deportation on appeal to him of—with least thought of its significance, His Imperial Majesty named who was to be, who even then was, over him in Belgium, the victor—the invincible Cardinal Mercier.

And here begins that, the end of which you know. Now, over against the monstrous thing you see the marvelous thing, for you will search the records of history and not find one thing of its kind. You see the most stupendous combination of material forces since time began. You see it without restraint of conscience, intent with its steel to bleed white. Behind it the Central Empires, with 40 years of preparation, with a philosophy brought to finest edge by the cold logic of Bernhardi, the selfish theories of Treitschke, and the blasphemous atheism of Nietzsche. All this and much more, developed to keenest cruelty, you see brought against a little State unprepared and despising war except for liberty, but holding sacred its old traditions of patriotism and religion. You see one man alone within that State, without a soldier or a material weapon, hold his place invincible through four long years and keep the opinion of the world in control of the eternal right. You see the marvelous thing, this victory of moral over physical force, spiritual over material power, in the one man whom God put there to do it.

The achievements of this heroic man were tremendous. Think of him not only meeting the duties of his vocation to his people, and by voluntary imprisonment with them in their distress, but battling alone to save them from the calumnies that the largest and most effective and most malicious combination ever known sought to heap upon them. Month after month he sent out his appeals and made his arguments, holding his place in written debates with the best trained advocates and diplomats the Prussian system could produce. Public opinion of the world was the jury, and he could reach it only from the confines of the territory occupied by the enemy. All he said had to find its way through systematic organization to entrap him and to contradict and falsify his every word. Arrayed against him were writers of books and pamphlets, editors of the subsidized press, the chancellor and leaders of the Reichstag, the Emperor of the Imperial Government, and, alas, dignitaries of his beloved church. All these to push the mighty engines of military propaganda against him; and yet he never lost the gleam of the immortal truth for which he stood. His words went out, they scaled walls and slid through barbed-wire entanglements, they crawled through trenches and flew in the air and became free as truth. And he won. Alone against them all, he won. And the world gave of the Belgians its verdict—NOT GUILTY, AND DYING A VICARIOUS SACRIFICE.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR].

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I trust that after listening to the interesting, eloquent, and instructive addresses upon timely subjects here to-day you will bear with me with a certain degree of patience while I direct your attention for a few moments to the subject before the House for consideration, namely, the tariff on magnesite. [Applause.]

I have had some slight personal experience with the inability of American producers of magnesite to compete with the producers of the Austrian product. I was a stockholder in one of the first companies in California which undertook to produce magnesite in this country. Our deposits were discovered by two Austrian chemists who had been prospecting in the foothills of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, and who came down and reported that there were valuable deposits of magnesite to be found there. We organized a company and proceeded to develop these deposits and attempted to market the product. This was before the war, when conditions were normal, and when competition with the Austrian product was open and unrestricted.

And I want to say to you that, as a result of that competition with the Austrian magnesite, the assessments on our stock came so often and with such regularity that a majority of the stockholders allowed their stock to be sold for delinquent assessments. The mines were forced to close for want of a market.

I have been interested in the various tariff arguments that have been made here since I have been a Member of this House, and the one argument made by the opponents of these measures that has impressed me is that the tariffs proposed by these bills, if they should be enacted into law, would raise the prices of the products to the consumer. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], the distinguished opponent of the protective tariff, has rather impressed me, and at times I have been somewhat terrified by his figures and statements as to the possible increase in the cost of these products to the consumer. But here is a bill, I desire to say to you, that merits and warrants the support of even the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina.

I have undertaken to examine this bill briefly, with the idea in mind of finding out just what the increased price of magnesite products to the consumer would be if this measure should become a law.

If we consider the uses to which this product is put it will throw some general light on the subject of increased costs. As was pointed out yesterday by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY], magnesite is used largely in the manufacture of brick, which, together with grain magnesite, is employed in the lining of metallurgical furnaces. There is no adequate substitute for this product for this purpose owing to the fact that it will withstand terrific temperatures of heat. The grain magnesite, which was described to you yesterday, is used in the bottoms of those furnaces because it holds the molten metal. Magnesite is also used with asbestos for the purpose of making the pipe coverings in steam plants and in buildings to prevent the radiation of heat. It is used for flooring in cars and in office buildings and hospitals, because it is a nonconductor of heat and sound. It is also employed in the manufacture of paper. It is used in chemistry and in small quantities in the manufacture of citrate of magnesia.

It enters into the manufacture of what is known as sorrel cement, a very superior grade of cement, used to a considerable extent in building. It sets quickly, and, owing to its texture, resilience, and its capacity to withstand abrasion, it is more desirable and preferable than Portland cement. It was used largely by the Austrians and Germans in the late war for the making of gun emplacements and pill boxes, for the reason that cement made of magnesite would quickly and rapidly set. I have enumerated many of the principal uses of magnesite in this country.

Now, as to the production: We are told by the Bureau of Mines that the production of magnesite in the United States during the war period was something over 240,000 tons per year, and this was ample to meet the requirements of this country during the urgency of war manufacture. We are also told that 90 per cent of the production in the United States is used for the lining of metallurgical furnaces, in the production of steel, copper, and other materials of a like nature. Ninety per cent of our production goes into the manufacture of those products.

This bill proposes a tariff on commercial ore of one-half cent per pound; on calcined, dead-burned, and grain magnesite a duty of three-fourths of a cent per pound is fixed; and upon magnesite brick three-fourths of a cent per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem. According to competent authority, it required in 1917 from 3 to 7 pounds of magnesite, or an average of about 5 pounds, to produce 1 ton of steel. This authority further states that the requirement for 1 ton of steel is approximately the same at the present time. Therefore the additional cost of 1 ton of steel, if the tariff provided in this bill is adopted, namely, three-fourths of a cent per pound on dead-burned and grain magnesite, and magnesite in that form were used, would be only 5 cents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, may I have about three minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. BARBOUR. A recent statement of the Bureau of Mines, which is the authority referred to, sets forth that it requires about 5 pounds of magnesite brick in the manufacture of 1 ton of steel. With a tariff of three-fourths of a cent per pound on magnesite brick and the 10 per cent ad valorem duty added, it would make an additional cost in the manufacture of a ton of steel of only 6 cents. In estimating the ad valorem duty I have taken the value of a ton of magnesite brick at Chester, Pa., in the spring of the year 1919, as given by the Bureau of Mines, which placed it at $90 a ton. Considering the small amount of magnesite that is used in the manufacture of steel and other similar products, the small amount that is required in those processes, and the very few cents that will be added to the cost of the production of steel by reason of these proposed duties, it seems to me that the increased cost to the consumer would not be in any way reflected in the retail price—in fact, it would be practically negligible.

And yet I want to say to you that by the adoption or passage of this act you will maintain and keep alive in this country a comparatively new industry, in which from $3,500,000 to $4,000,000 is invested in two States on the Pacific coast, and which gives employment in normal times to between 1,000 and 1,500 men who are drawing a daily wage of from $4.50 and $5 up.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Are some of those concerns small?

Mr. BARBOUR. They vary in size. Some of them are small. They vary in size from the small ones up to the big magnesite producing company in Washington, which is the largest. Some of those in California, I am informed, produce almost as much as the company in Washington, but the Washington company is, I understand, the largest of them all.

In this connection I desire to say that the Bureau of Mines has reported that the present supply of magnesite is ample to last for another generation, and there is a prospect of additional discoveries being made. Therefore it seems to me that under these circumstances there is absolutely no argument against the bill which is under consideration here to-day, and no reason whatsoever why it should not pass. [Applause.]

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: What would become of the corporation in the United States which has a capital of $2,500,000 invested in such a venture in Austria?

Mr. BARBOUR. They would simply take the consequences. If they have invested their money in Austria, they would simply take the consequences if this bill were passed, whatever those consequence might be. But in that connection I want to say that my sympathies are entirely with the men who have invested their money in America. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS] 15 minutes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I expect to support this bill, although I do not wish to discuss it. I have another matter that I want to bring to the attention of the membership of this House, that I think is highly important to each and every one of us.

On the 6th day of April, 1917, the Congress of the United States, on the recommendation of the President, passed a declaration of war against the Imperial German Government. It was necessary, of course, to raise an army and to raise it quickly. At that time we had an army of about 226,000 soldiers, and it was the intention of this Government to increase that army so that it would be effective on the fields of battle across the sea. I regret to say that at that time patriotism had rather cooled in the hearts and minds of the American people, and it was necessary through the press and through platform addresses to arouse the people to such an extent that they might clearly comprehend and fully realize the enormity of the great crisis that then confronted us. The press and the orators of the country addressed the people, and assured the boys that the thing to do was to uphold American institutions and to enlist in the Army, and to see to it that our rights were protected upon the high seas and in foreign lands, as well as upon our own coasts and in our own country. We raised an army of 4,000,000 men during the progress of that war. From the hilltops, from the housetops, and from the platform all of us proclaimed to the American boys that we would stand by them and furnish them everything that they needed in order to succeed in the war.

I want to say that the American people did their full duty in that regard. In the five Liberty loans that we floated the people of this Nation responded most generously in the subscriptions for bonds, and we did everything that we were required to do in the way of creating war chests and protecting the Red Cross and other like organizations, and our boys were fairly well provided for while in the ranks in foreign lands. But, my friends, that war is now over, except that the President has not as yet issued a proclamation of peace. I want to call your attention to the fact that the casualty list was 262,693 men, of which number 28,363 were killed in battle; died of wounds, 12,101; died of disease, 16,034; died from other causes, 1,980; wounded, 189,955; missing in action, 14,290.

What I want to-day to bring specifically to your attention, gentlemen of the House, is the number of wounded soldiers, 189,955. These soldiers are distributed in hospitals throughout this country. I want especially to call your attention to those who were shell shocked.

Some time in June of this year the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] asserted upon the floor of this House that our shell-shocked soldiers were housed in hospitals with the criminal insane. I am quite convinced that each Member of this House at that time was very much astonished at that statement, and we were assured by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that such was not the case; that while they were housed in the same hospitals with the criminal insane, yet they were segregated and cared for separate and apart from the criminal insane.

On the 27th of July of this year I received a letter from Mr. A. E. Faine, of New Straitsville, Perry County, Ohio, accompanied by a petition of 500 of the citizens of that city, requesting me to investigate the treatment accorded our shell-shocked and insane soldiers by the War Department since the World War began, and advising me also that it was the policy of the War Department to house the shell-shocked and insane soldiers in hospitals with the criminal insane, and further advising me that Mrs. Martha E. Abt, of 1420 Bryn Mawr Avenue, Chicago, Ill., in addressing the New Straitsville Chautauqua Assembly on the afternoon of July 24, 1919, among other things, said:

> Uncle Sam is sending our shell-shocked soldier boys, who have passed through a veritable hell on the battle fields of France in defense of your home and mine and of our common country, to the various insane asylums in our different States.

Mrs. Abt said that she had seen with her own eyes shell-shocked soldiers, in their soldier uniforms with service stripes on them, lodged with and among the criminal insane.

The citizens of New Straitsville present at this meeting were shocked and dumfounded when they heard this statement. Coming, as it did, from so high an authority, they did not question its truth.

The people of New Straitsville were among the most patriotic in this country during the Great War. They oversubscribed every Liberty loan. They oversubscribed to the war chest. In fact, they oversubscribed to every activity of the war, and were always ready, willing, and anxious to do everything within their power to assist this Government and the soldiers of the United States to win the war. Besides, this city and community furnished more than its quota as compared with other cities and communities in making up the Naval and Military Establishment of this country.

Mr. Faine in his letter to me uses this language:

> In the name of justice and humanity we appeal to you to ask Congress to investigate these conditions, and we further urge upon you to use your best efforts to have our Government provide forthwith hospitals in which these boys who have given so much for our country may have a fair chance for their lives.

And the citizens of that city, in that meeting, after hearing the above statement of the lady from Chicago, sent me the following resolution:

> We, the unsigned citizens of New Straitsville, Ohio, to the number of more than 500, assembled in the Lincoln chautauqua tent this Thursday night, July 24, have heard the above letter of A. E. Faine to our Congressman and Senators, the Hon. EDWIN D. RICKETTS, the Hon. ATLEE POMERENE, and the Hon. WARREN G. HARDING, and we do hereby unanimously join in said petition and pray that prompt action be taken as may be best determined.
> NEW STRAITSVILLE CHAUTAUQUA COMMITTEE,
> CHARLES G. WEAVER, President.
> R. P. TAYLOR, Secretary.

On July 28, 1919, after receiving this letter and petition and after due reflection, I introduced in this House the following resolution:

[Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, H. Res. 203. In the House of Representatives, July 28, 1919. Mr. RICKETTS submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.]

RESOLUTION.

Resolved, That the Committe on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives be, and hereby is, directed to investigate and report to the House at once the question of whether or not the shell-shocked soldiers of the United States, who have passed through a veritable hell on the battle fields of France in defense of our country, are now being treated by direction of the War Department in the various insane asylums of the different States of the Union and are required to occupy hospitals with the criminal insane.

Resolved further, That in the event that said Committee on Military Affairs shall find that said shell-shocked soldiers are being kept in hospitals with the criminal insane, that then and in that event the Committee on Appropriations be, and hereby is, directed to immediately take such steps with reference to appropriations as will enable the Committee on Military Affairs to relieve this situation at the earliest possible date.

I have received a number of letters from Mrs. Martha E. Abt in which she confirmed her statement made at New Straitsville and gave me considerable valuable information with reference to this most important subject.

I made it my business to visit St. Elizabeth's Hospital on two different occasions, and I saw with my own eyes just what this good lady had described to my people in her address.

My observations made at St. Elizabeth's can be no more clearly stated than is expressed in an article in Harvey's Weekly on July 26, 1919, written by Col. George D. Harvey, the editor:

FORSAKEN.

Some months ago the Weekly called attention to the fact that troops from France, shell shocked, gassed, and wounded, whose minds had given way in the trenches, had been brought back to America and were herded into St. Elizabeths Insane Asylum along with the degenerate and criminal insane. Denials, that denied nothing we had printed, were followed by excuses and then came promises that conditions would be remedied as soon as it was humanly possible to do so. This was before the armistice was signed in November.

The other day we went over to St. Elizabeths to see some of these boys. For a while we looked over the beautiful grounds and well-kept buildings and then went to some of the wards where casual visitors do not go. We had been told that the soldiers and sailors were segregated from the unfortunates who are picked up in the streets and taken sometimes from the slums, but this was a mistake.

We were taken through many wards, where we saw hundreds of men and boys cooped up in long, poorly lighted corridors. Many of them wore Army and Navy uniforms, or the remnants of them. Others were civilians, dressed as fancy dictated. Some were disheveled and others were naked. Some were quite mad. They shrieked and cursed and galloped about and threatened to fight. Why all the inmates were not reduced to this state by their environment we do not know. Others were huddled under the benches that line the wall and refused to come out or to speak. Some were timid and fearful and would not approach strangers. Some were bruised and cut.

Many of the soldiers stood with folded arms; others sat stolidly upon the benches and stared vacantly at the walls in blank despair; others sat on the window sills and peered through the bars out into the sunshine. Some of them were manifestly in a condition bordering on the hopeless, while others talked coherently and asked that messages of various kinds be delivered for them. Many of them hoped to be released in a few days, while others, ashamed of their condition or environment, covered their faces or slunk away.

In these corridors we saw soldiers who carried scars from the Argonne, Soissons, and Chateau Thierry; a sailor whose mind had failed after 11 months at Dunkirk; another who had collapsed mentally after many months in a Turkish prison camp; and another who had broken down in the sub-chasing service. These men, and many others who had had similar experiences, we talked with in those sunless corridors.

We talked with the guards and asked them what amusement, recreation, or occupation the men had, and were told that nothing was provided except a walk. They were supposed to be taken out for an airing every morning or afternoon, but this did not always happen. One guard said that none of the 51 occupants of his ward had been out in three weeks. The barber came and shaved them twice a week. They were bathed regularly once a week. They were supposed to get a tobacco ration, but each guard told a different version of the amount and frequency of the ration. None had tobacco. Many begged for it and were very grateful for a few cigarettes.

We asked what, if any, attention the individual soldier got in this "hospital" and were told that they got only what we saw. Doctors were scarce, and as each had to watch over several hundred "patients" there was little opportunity to give the individual much attention. We asked if the soldiers were not kept in condition by setting-up exercises, as they had been accustomed to in the Army, and we were told that they were not.

We went to wards where bedridden men were housed. A well-built man of 25 with a tattered nightgown (his only clothing) rolled about his neck cried plaintively for his mother. His nerves were completely shattered and he cried all day. On the bed adjoining him a handsome lad of 20 stared hopelessly. Under the next bed a naked soldier was huddled, and so on through the ward. There were no nurses and no attendants, except a youth who carried the keys, and this was true of the other wards.

We asked if these sick men were ever rolled out in the sunshine, and the answer was "No." Such a thing was never heard of. They rarely, if ever, had a caller. Most of them seemed not to have any people.

We asked if they were ever taken out motoring in Army trucks, as the wounded from the hospitals are, and we were told that the Government provided nothing of the sort.

It is hard to believe that American soldiers are subjected to this treatment.

We would not have believed it if we had not seen it, and now that we have seen it we shall never forget it.

I saw criminal degenerates and soldiers inside the walls of certain wards and inclosures of St. Elizabeths Hospital who were allowed to intermingle and associate, which was a complete surprise to me in the face of the fact that the House of Representatives had been assured that these soldiers and the criminal insane inmates of this institution were segregated; that they were not allowed to intermingle or associate; and that the soldier boys were receiving special treatment, necessary in order to insure the cure of all those who could be cured.

On August 5, 1919, the Wheeling (W. Va.) Register published an article purporting to be an interview from Mr. Littlefield, a prominent business man of Reedyville, W. Va., who said that quite a number of insane World War veterans had been admitted to the State hospital at Spencer, W. Va., and that the Government, under a contract, had agreed to pay $10 per week for every soldier sent to this institution; that it was the purpose of the Government, under the direction of the War Department, to have a large number of insane soldiers, who have lost their minds from various causes, from all parts of the country committed to this institution.

Just why the War Department did not provide special hospitals for these shell-shocked and insane soldiers and other soldiers suffering from nervous disorders when it had at its command all the appropriations necessary to have amply provided for them, is not quite clear to me. It may be clear to the other Members of this House, but I can not understand it. It seems to me that this Government, through the War Department, owed these unfortunate soldiers, who had given up their all for their country, every possible facility for treatment within the power of the Government to furnish. Not only so, but I am convinced that the War Department must have known that just such conditions as these would arise with reference to the service of our soldiers in foreign lands, and, consequently, should have made the necessary arrangements for their care and protection.

It is a disgrace and a shame to this Nation that these boys, helpless as they are, should be forced to occupy quarters in hospitals occupied by the criminal insane. Congress has provided the appropriations and hospital facilities are ample.

In my investigations I took this matter up with the War Department, and on August 19, 1919, I sent the Secretary of War the following questionnaire:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 19, 1919.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BAKER: Will you kindly give me the following information with reference to the shell-shocked and insane soldiers of the late war?

I would like to have:

First. The number of shell-shocked and insane soldiers.

Second. The institutions in which they are being treated and the number in each institution.

Third. The date and number of the first shell-shocked and insane soldiers received in this country and where distributed.

Fourth. How many of them were marked as deserters or as being absent without leave, and what became of this class of soldiers.

Thanking you in advance for the courtesy of an early reply to this request and assuring you of my appreciation, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

EDWIN D. RICKETTS.

On August 21, 1919, the Surgeon General of the Army, at the direction of the Secretary of War, wrote me a letter which explains fully the attitude of the War Department with reference to this matter. I am including this letter in my address to the House so that the membership of Congress and the people of the country may know that the War Department does not seem to be in touch with this situation. The letter which I received is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, August 21, 1919.

Hon. EDWIN D. RICKETTS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of August 19 addressed to the Secretary of War has been forwarded to me for reply, which I will endeavor to do to the best of my ability from the information at hand.

As you know, the final statistics for the war are not yet completed and due to the reduction of clerical help they probably will not be ready for definite publication for some time.

Why a lack of information?

The questions as you have asked them are quite difficult to answer, as they are not in accordance with the method of classifying nervous and mental diseases in the Army. We think that the term "shell shock" is a very unfortunate one and has given rise to a great misinterpretation, especially by the public at large, and our experience has shown that it has been used as a name for most any nervous trouble arising overseas. Really, if the term is used at all, it should apply only to those cases of nervous trouble which resulted directly and solely from shell concussion. However, this rather small group has been overshadowed by applying the term to various other forms of nervous disease which arise in individuals usually of a neuropathic make-up.

A marked distinction has been made between the two large groups of cases; first, those that are insane, and, second, the psychoneuroses. It is in this latter class that the term "shell shock," if used at all, would fall. Among the psychoneuroses is found the large group of functional nervous diseases, some of which are the hysterias, neurasthenias, etc., in all the various forms. Functional neuroses are usually curable, and due to the very satisfactory method of handling these cases, both overseas and in this country, most of these cases have been cured—many before arriving in the United States—and the large majority being rapidly cured soon after the signing of the armistice.

The importance of this distinction was realized at the beginning of the war, and separate hospitals were provided for the insane and for the psychoneuroses. Besides the specially constructed psychopathic departments in practically all our base and general hospitals, under the charge of specialists, with specially trained nurses and attendants, special hospitals for the insane were maintained at General Hospitals No. 4, Fort Porter, N. Y.; No. 13, at Danville, N. Y.; and No. 34, at East Norfolk, Mass. Later, during the present year, realizing the many advantages of concentrating these cases in one large hospital equipped with all modern facilities for the care of mental cases, General Hospital No. 43, at Hampton, Va., formerly the National Soldiers' Home, was devoted to the care of the insane and mentally defective.

The large military post at Plattsburg Barracks was utilized as a special hospital for the treatment of psychoneuroses. Because of the early signing of the armistice, this hospital was never required for its full capacity, and on account of the rapid reduction in the number of cases, this hospital was last spring turned over for the care of general medical and surgical cases and, on the abandonment of the General Hospital No. 4 as a hospital for the insane, it has since been used for the psychoneuroses.

At present, then, we have General Hospital No. 43, Hampton, which is used as a hospital for the insane and mental defectives, and also as a classification hospital for other nervous conditions received from overseas, and General Hospital No. 4, Fort Porter, N. Y., for the care of psychoneuroses. In addition, special neuropsychiatric departments are conducted in our various general hospitals now operating.

So much for introductory remarks.

In answer to your first question: Our latest statistics show that the following cases have been returned from overseas:

	Total.	Hoboken.	Newport News.
Psychoses (insanity)	3,597	2,715	882
Constitutional psychopathic states	504	149	355
Epilepsy	416	302	114
Mental deficiency	762	410	352
Psychoneuroses	2,888	1,675	1,213
Alcoholism	51	51	.....
Drug addiction	6	6	.....
Recovered	95	95	.....
Total	8,319	5,403	2,916

Regarding your second question, the following is a census taken on August 12:

	Total.	Insane.	Psycho-neuroses.	Epilepsy.	Constitutional psycho states.	Mental deficiency.
Walter Reed	123	67	38	6	7	5
Fort Sam Houston	117	58	29	14	12	4
Letterman General	80	53	8	7	9	3
General Hospital No. 1	40	21	15	1	2	1
General Hospital No. 2	47	12	24	.....	9	2
General Hospital No. 4	194	14	131	1	37	11
General Hospital No. 6	132	89	23	12	.....	8
General Hospital No. 25	178	138	15	7	11	7
General Hospital No. 26	95	54	24	5	8	4
General Hospital No. 28	117	73	19	9	2	14
General Hospital No. 43	1,087	868	23	2	59	135
Total	2,210	1,447	349	64	156	194

In addition, there are only 10 officers (5 of whom are on leave) and 25 general prisoners still under the control of the military service as patients at St. Elizabeths Hospital.

Provisions have been made for the care of insane nurses at the Shepard and Enoch Pratt Hospital, Baltimore, one of the best institutions in the country, and we have at present only three nurses at this hospital.

We do not have an absolute record of the date and number of the first nervous and mental cases returned from overseas, but the first insane cases to be admitted to our special hospital for the insane from overseas was in the month of February, 1918, and the first cases of psychoneurosis were admitted to General Hospital No. 30, Plattsburg Barracks, in May, 1918.

This office does not have a record of the number of soldiers suffering from nervous or mental disease who deserted or were absent without leave. An inquiry to The Adjutant General of the Army might give some information along that line. It has been the policy, however, that when the absence of a soldier was found to be due to a mental condition, which made the soldier not responsible for his actions, to treat him as a sick man, and not punish him for the delinquency. Such cases are promptly referred to a board of medical officers for recommendations.

If there is any case of mental disease (insanity) which, after a period of several months' observation and treatment in military hospitals, is found to be chronic or incurable and requires hospital treatment, it is turned over to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, which is charged by law with the after care of these soldiers. This bureau has made various provisions in its own hospitals and otherwise for the continued care of these cases at Government expense as long as may be necessary.

I have gone quite at length into this matter, but I feel that I am very glad to have an opportunity to discuss this subject with you in view of the fact that owing to the general misunderstanding of a number of people ideas are often formed which are unfair to the Medical Department of the Army. The policy pursued in the handling of these cases has been very satisfactory, and especially so when compared with the unusual amount of trouble other countries have experienced with these cases during the present war.

Yours, very truly,

M. W. IRELAND,
Surgeon General, United States Army.

From the above letter of the Surgeon General, the facilities for caring for these unfortunate soldiers are ample, and there is no reason why they should not have the treatment which they deserve.

In next to the last paragraph of the above letter, I observe that the Surgeon General says that after several months' observation and treatment in military hospitals of shell-shocked and nervous soldiers, if it be found that they are incurable and require hospital treatment, they are turned over to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, which is charged by law with the aftercare of these soldiers, and this bureau has made various provisions in its hospitals, and otherwise, for the continued care of these cases at Government expense as long as it may be necessary. He does not say how many soldiers were turned over to the War Risk Insurance. Why? Now, I do not undertake to say whether the War Department or the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is responsible for the number of soldiers housed in St. Elizabeths Hospital, but I know that there are several hundred there, and that they are permitted to associate with the criminal insane.

The Congress has made liberal appropriations to the War Department and to the other departments having to do with the care and treatment of wounded, maimed, and shell-shocked soldiers, and there is no just reason under the heavens why they should be housed in hospitals with the criminal insane. From information at hand, I am convinced that this condition exists not only at St. Elizabeths, but at other hospitals throughout the country, and that the degree of care necessary to their comfort and recovery has not been given to these poor unfortunate boys to date.

I am urging the adoption of the resolution which I introduced because I feel keenly the special duty that the people of this Nation owe to these shell-shocked and insane soldiers. They gave their all to their country and ours. They fought valiantly for America's cause. They turned apparent defeat into victory. They caused the Central armies, marching from Berlin, to face about and march toward Berlin. They did all that was required of them at the hands of this Nation, and I feel that it is the solemn duty of the War Department, and every other department of the Government, and the duty of Congress, and especially the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs, to see to it that these boys are transferred and committed to hospitals provided especially for their comfort and welfare. They deserve and are entitled to the very best treatment that this Government can give them. [Applause.]

That some one is careless in relation to the welfare of these soldiers, and of soldiers generally who served in the late war is emphasized by the facts in connection with the discharge of Sergt. Edward A. Herz, as indicated hereafter:

Sergt. Edward A. Herz was discharged on December 29, 1917, at Camp Sherman, Ohio, on certificate of disability—chronic active tuberculosis of left lung.

Sergt. Herz had an Army service record of 17 years 7 months 25 days at the time of his discharge and was clearly entitled under existing regulations to have been sent to Fort Bayard, N. Mex., or some other sanitarium, for treatment. (See Army Regulations, paragraphs 1439, 1441, 1442, amended by C. R., paragraph 70; Army Regulations, paragraphs 1445, 1446; also Manual of Medical Department, paragraphs 334 to 344, inclusive.)

Sergt. Herz is a married man and has a family of a wife and two children dependent upon him. Since his service had been continuous for almost 10 years there is no question of whether or not the disability originated in line of duty and while in military service.

As a result of this erroneous discharge, Sergt. Herz and his family have been thrown on public charity, and he is in such a state of health as to be unable to work and provide for his family.

An application was made on March 12, 1919, for restoration to his former rank and permitted to reenlist, and that he be sent to Fort Bayard, N. Mex.; and on April 29 Sergt. Herz made a second application. This second application was indorsed and approved by Maj. Gen. Glenn, then in command at Camp Sherman, Ohio. The application was rejected both by the Surgeon General, through Col. S. J. Morris, and by the adjutant, through R. J. Herman, and the following indorsement made: "There is no authority for his reenlistment."

Here is a young man who enlisted seven times in the service of his country, who gave nearly 18 years of the very flower of his life to that service, and who has a wife and two children dependent upon him for support, who was erroneously discharged and turned out in the cold world to die from tubercular trouble which he incurred in the service.

This is just one of hundreds of cases that have been neglected through some branch of the Army under the control of the War Department.

I feel that all of the soldiers of the late war who were in any way disabled should be given the most generous and indulgent consideration; that every comfort which this Government can afford should be given to them; that they should have the benefit of the highest medical talent in this country; and that they should have hospital facilities that would insure to them the very best treatment this country can afford. [Applause.]

Many of these dear, unfortunate boys gave up their mothers, sisters, wives, sweethearts, and friends and placed themselves upon the altar of war, ready to be sacrificed, if necessary, in order to preserve our rights; to make, what we denominate in our parlance, the supreme sacrifice, and to do all within their power to preserve and protect our country and its institutions. Many of them made this sacrifice. Many of them were wounded, maimed, and disfigured. Many of them were overtaken by disease, and it seems to me that we owe our all to those boys whose lives are, in a measure, ruined. Why not help them to the extent of our ability and within our means? Why not see to it that they have the proper medical attention in proper hospitals, with facilities equal to their necessities, and in this way assist them as far as possible to recover from their misfortune? [Applause.]

I am one American whose gratitude is boundless to our American soldier boys, and I want to help all of them to the limit of their needs, and to the limit of our duty to them, but I feel that in giving the relief needed we should first provide for the wounded, shell-shocked, and unfortunate soldiers. [Applause.]

A subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs for some weeks past has been and is still holding hearings on my resolution and other similar resolutions, and will soon report to the House their findings in relation thereto, when I hope the House will take immediate action in this matter. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, in the debate on the dyestuffs bill some allusion was made to proceedings against a former Member of this House, and I made some statements with reference to the matter, based upon the report of the Alien Property Custodian. The name of the ex-Member of this House was subsequently mentioned as Mr. Herman A. Metz. Mr. Metz has since written me a letter, in which he explains his side of the case very differently from the statement contained in the report of the Alien Property Custodian. In justice to Mr. Metz I ask that I may extend my remarks by printing his letter in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

NEW YORK, September 29, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM R. GREEN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have just read in Friday's RECORD your references to me during the debate on the Longworth bill. As I feel sure that you would not willfully do me an injustice, I beg to state briefly the following facts:

In November, 1918, the Alien Property Custodian seized an American company of mine on his determination that the stock, which I had purchased in 1913, did not belong to me, but in reality was German owned. I yielded the stock to him under protest and compulsion, and thereafter brought suit in the United States district court to have such determination and seizure declared unfounded, illegal, and null and void, and said stock restored to me. This suit is now pending, and it is my earnest desire and purpose to have it heard as soon as possible. No court has ever passed upon the claim that, as you say, I have had in my possession German property.

Last week the Alien Property Custodian made demand on me for two other companies of mine, after having made a similar determination that they do not belong to me, but in reality do belong to German alien enemies. These companies are both American in organization and American owned; and the action of the Alien Property Custodian is even more preposterous and false than in the former case, if that could be, since neither of these companies ever did a dollar of business, directly or indirectly, with the foreign concern. I am moving the United States district court for an order to show cause why such demands should not be set aside and for such further relief as will confirm me in my property rights and my rights as an American citizen. This is an exact epitome of the controversies between the Alien Property Custodian and myself. When you say that "this same ex-Congressman had been found guilty of hiding and concealing German property, had been compelled to turn it over, and paid some $40,000 penalty," you say what is absolutely unfounded in fact. From your reference to $40,000 you seem to have misinterpreted certain testimony of Mr. Garvan before the committee. For purposes of his own he brought in certain suits that were started in Philadelphia in 1913 against dye importers under the Sherman Act. Such a suit was also suggested against me, but I convinced the plaintiff that there was no foundation for it. I found, however, that an agent of mine for about five years had been charging more than the price to the average customer. I thereupon voluntarily made a friendly adjustment by paying about $40,000, which we calculated the overcharge to be in a business amounting to several hundred thousand dollars. You will find the matter in more detail in the copy of my recent letter to Chairman FORDNEY, which I inclose.

I am sure you must realize that you have practically charged me in the presence of many of my own colleagues with penal offenses, and that as a former Member of Congress I am entitled to as public a retraction on your finding your statements are not true.

Yours, very truly,

HERMAN A. METZ.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HERSMAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. HERSMAN. Gentlemen, I thank you for the applause. It reminds me of a story I heard not very long ago. A politician was making a public speech. There was quite a crowd when he started, but before he got through there were only a couple of fellows left in the room. He went down to them and said, "I want to thank you gentlemen for staying and listening to me. I appreciate it very much." One of them said, "That is all right. You need not thank us. We are the next two speakers." [Laughter.] So, gentlemen, I want to thank you.

It seems quite popular to digress from the subject under consideration. If I had known it and just how to secure the time there was a matter that I would have liked to have talked about, and that is the soldier-settlement bill.

I am very much interested in this legislation, because I am on the Public Lands Committee and we completed lengthy hearings on this bill some time ago. I have been anxiously waiting, hoping that it would be brought up, so that the men of this Congress would have an opportunity to consider its merits. I believe the character of men sent here, who represent constituents in this great country of ours, will be impressed with the arguments in favor of the soldier-settlement bill. That it will be a real opportunity to those interested and fitted for farm work I can not help but believe. Because it does not reach the whole body of soldiers is no valid reason why we should withhold wholesome legislation from those who are willing and anxious to avail themselves of it. In my judgment this legislation is sound socially, financially, and economically.

The record of the Reclamation Service is a constant inducement to the young man of this land to secure a farm of his own. The opportunity presented under the Mondell bill to the energetic and determined soldier would have been welcomed by many of you in your younger days. The records of the Secretary of the Interior show that the lands under the Government's reclamation projects have in five years increased in value from 100 per cent to 1,000 per cent. The settler got the advantage of that increment of gain, and the soldiers that are returning now would have that same advantage. I hope that at some time you will give me the opportunity to set forth in detail the reasons why I believe that it is a splendid thing for this Congress to pass the Mondell bill. [Applause.]

I am interested also in protecting the industries that are necessary to the life of this Nation. [Applause.] I am interested in protecting the industries that may become necessary to the life of this Nation. I am equally interested in protecting the industries that need a helping hand, not because they are in California or in any other particular State, but because they are necessary for the fuller and more complete upbuilding of our Nation.

I am interested in this magnesite legislation, and this is the first opportunity I have had to speak on these important industries.

I believe first in protecting our farming interests, because they are absolutely vital to the life of our Nation. Able historians point out that the fall of the older nations of the world has come about after they have neglected and lost sight of the importance of their rural population. When Rome was invincible, her army was made up of farmers, and she insisted that every soldier should be a landowner.

The fall of the empire began when her rural population became dissatisfied, when through unwise laws they crowded into the cities.

I am interested first and foremost in protecting the agricultural interests of our Nation. Daniel Webster said that the greatest work of man was the cultivation of the earth. We can not get away from it. We have got to depend on our rural population to furnish these virile streams of energy in order to renew the life of the Nation. The farm must provide a surplus of food products for the cities, and the farm must provide a surplus of healthy and energetic men in order that the industries of the Nation may thrive.

I am interested in the protection of magnesite, because it is a necessary industry. There has come to me a pamphlet issued by the Department of the Interior in which one or two sections are very interesting.

In 1913 there were produced in the United States $77,059 worth of magnesite, and that increased gradually until in 1917 there were $2,899,000 worth produced in this country. Owing to the stimulating effect of high prices this country was able to mine this mineral. When peace is restored, without a sufficient tariff, this mineral could no longer be mined. We would again be dependent on a foreign country. Certainly this would not be wise when our steel industry is dependent upon securing a sufficient amount at all times. The amount of protective tariff that is necessary to safeguard this industry I am not able to state. We will have to depend largely on the committee that brings in the report as to the real protection that this industry must have. I hope our worthy chairman of the Ways and Means Committee will not let his Republican enthusiasm get beyond the bounds of reason so that California Democrats can not follow him. [Laughter and applause.]

Another section of this report of the Interior Department is interesting. It says that the Australian deposits can be delivered at New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore at a much lower price than California and Washington magnesite which has to pay higher wages to produce and higher freight rates.

The domestic material may not long hold the market in eastern United States.

If we expect to produce magnesite in this country, we will have to give it reasonable protection. That it is a vital industry to the life of our Nation I think there is absolutely no question. The testimony that has been given before us in respect to the magnesite industry would plainly indicate that it is absolutely a vital mineral to the production of steel business. Believing as I do, I will give it my support. There are many mines in the West. The fact that there could be no monopoly in this industry is of the highest importance in considering its proper protection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of history that always during wars and after wars the minds of the people are much inflamed and there is great disregard for human life. That perhaps explains what is going on in Arkansas now, while there is a baseball game going on in Ohio.

The employees now on strike of those great steel companies are more than 75 per cent foreigners, brought to this country under laws which must be amended to the point that before an immigrant can be admitted he must pass a rigid mental and physical test, when he will be entered upon a year's probationary course of compulsory education, and will be taught constantly against the misinformation of anarchy and destruction. He will be taught the aims and purposes of this Government, the advantages and protection it affords the citizen for his life and property wherever found; advising education for the American Federation of Labor, teaching them against the false doctrine of violence, cautioning them against delivering their fine organization over to irresponsible destruction, because their order represents the grandest human thought. All men will learn the glory of working for work's sake; the beauty of achievement in the skill of labor; then they will realize and obtain the greatest good in life. They will know that life's ambition is the opportunity and the disposition to work, to create, build, and acquire knowledge that the finished product of their toil is life's success. Education for the employer of labor, teaching him that labor must not be exploited to create monopoly and turned against the worker; that every man who honestly works must be provided a home ahead of dividends; that the big man of the future is one who does unselfish things to benefit mankind, when the man who lives a selfish life will be taught to be ashamed. Then will our Nation enter a new era of light. We must learn that it is easier and more satisfactory to do right than wrong; between labor and capital there must be no conflict but cooperation. A monopoly of necessities is obnoxious to American sense of justice.

After due deliberation this Congress granted a charter to the American Legion, a grand body of men claiming 100 per cent Americanism. At Boston, where men who had sworn to protect the city from lawlessness and disorder had gone on strike, the American Legion were offering their services to the governor of Massachusetts to protect the Nation which they had given so much to save. The part taken by that fine body of representative soldiers makes one feel the security which this Government affords to her citizens, making us confident of the 100 per cent Americanism of the American Legion, which by this action records a perfect score. Within a very few years the well-known faces here will be gone away forever, replaced by now boy faces, who sailed away in ships that men, all men, may be free, free to think, speak, and grow, when we will in passing dedicate our country to 100 per cent Americans. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has been reporting a number of bills, all of them more or less important to the business interests of the country, and some of them rather new and peculiar in their nature. Some of them were brought on by the war; that is, they were made necessary because of the war. The dyestuffs bill, one of these, was passed by the House the other day. The tungsten bill was another. That involved a question very similar to the question involved with regard to magnesite, the subject that is now before us. A bill for a duty on potash is another bill that arises largely by reason of the war. This bill will also involve the licensing feature, which was objected to by some gentlemen in the dyestuffs bill. With respect to several of these bills some differences have arisen that might be regarded as differences of opinion between the believers in the protective-tariff principle. The licensing feature was objectionable to many of us, and I assume will continue to be, because it invades the protective-tariff idea. That has been passed upon by the House in the dyestuffs bill and has now gone to another body.

The magnesite bill which is now under consideration, the potash bill which is to come, the dyestuffs bill which has been passed, all deal with products which originate in Germany or Austria and which are now competitive with those products in the United States. To a certain extent, so far as those three measures are concerned, the question of Americanism is raised. There is a prejudice against German products, against Austrian products, and that prejudice has had its effect in the consideration of legislation at this time.

The truth of the matter is that we were absolutely dependent upon Germany prior to the war for our dyestuffs. It is also true that we were dependent upon Austria prior to the war for our magnesite. It is also true that we were dependent upon Germany prior to the war for our potash. Dyestuffs were used by manufacturers of textiles in the United States, and, of course, constitute a very important and essential raw material. Potash is necessary for our farmers, particularly for those along the Atlantic seaboard and in the Southern States—not so much in the West, where they do not use fertilizer so much as they do in the Eastern and Southern States, where the land is more worked over. Magnesite, which we are now considering, is essential to a number of great industries in the East—foundries and those industries where furnaces are employed, principally in iron and steel production.

In all these respects we have been dependent upon Germany and Austria heretofore, and, thanks to the war, our American producers have been obliged to think about American production in order to meet the demands of American manufacturers and American farmers, because they could not get their foreign supplies in the ordinary way during the war.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman like to have an audience?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, I do not care for an audience. So long as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is here I am satisfied. [Applause.] I notice that my remark elicited applause on both sides of the aisle, and that the audience is now increasing.

I would like to see all of these new American industries protected against unfair foreign competition. Every protectionist, I assume, would take that stand, but it has happened in these three instances of dyestuffs, potash, and magnesite, and it may happen with regard to tungsten, that what Gen. Hancock said about the protective tariff system is susceptible at least of application at this time—that it is "a local issue." It is a great span across the United States from the Atlantic to the Pacific, a very expensive span in the matter of transportation. The distance is about the same as it is to the European ports from the Atlantic seaboard, and the method of transportation across the sea is so much cheaper that the Atlantic coast users of these foreign commodities are compelled to face the question whether they prefer to use a foreign product, which they can get cheaper, or an American product from the Pacific coast, which costs them two or three times as much for a sometimes inferior domestic quality according to statements made with respect to some of these things with which we have to deal.

As to magnesite, the question is this: Americans who were engaged in the business of supplying the magnesite trade in the United States, finding they had to obtain their raw material from Austria, principally, years before the war undertook to control the foreign market. Money went out of Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, and I presume out of Maryland, to obtain certain rights over Austrian magnesite mines, Austria being the center of production of the kind of magnesite we needed in our furnaces for iron and steel production in the United States.

More than $2,000,000 were invested by worthy American business men to take over those Austrian interests. Why? They saw business in it. They thought they could serve the American trade. They preferred that Americans should deliver Austrian magnesite to American manufacturers and dealers rather than have the Austrians do it. They were not thinking of war when they made these investments. They were thinking of the trade necessities of the United States, and they employed their money for the purpose of acquiring property and rights over in Austria so that they might be in control of the situation and might thus serve American business interests. At that time no one would have said that that was not a commendable enterprise. It was what any ordinary business man or business men would do who had the nerve and foresight to venture into foreign fields. It was taking away from another country which might and did become hostile to the United States, vast interests that might have become, and actually were, a monopoly in the hands of foreigners and secured that monopoly, if it might be so called, for American interests. It was American good money invested abroad which took over these Austrian rights. The same thing has been done with respect to tungsten. We did not have tungsten in the United States sufficient to supply American needs during the war. Good Americans went prospecting elsewhere and they found it in Bolivia, and they spent their money trying to get it into the United States. The tariff, of course, may bar them, practically closing the lion's mouth upon the money they have invested in foreign climes. Yet everyone of us wants to be patriotic, everyone of us—except some of our friends on the other side who are gradually coming over—wants to be intensely protective with regard to American industry. But the war broke out, and at once the highest protective tariff wall that could be raised, the seizure of all ships, closed the American mines in Austria. They were shut up, and the use of $2,000,000 worth of capital there invested was at an end.

The $500,000 invested in the United States in plants at Baltimore, western Pennsylvania, and Ohio became dependent upon such supplies of magnesite as were here already or as might be developed in the United States. The Government was urging men to engage in the prospecting for minerals which were thought to be of value during the war, but they did not offer any special inducements for magnesite. So it is to the credit of the men in California and in Washington and of those controlling the Austrian mines that they did invest their money out yonder in Washington, where German chemists found deposits of magnesite, with a view of producing an American supply. Statements differ as to how much money was invested and as to just who invested it. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY], the author of this bill, stated the other day in his address that about $3,500,000 of American capital was invested. The testimony differs as to that. I think Mr. HADLEY's were possibly the highest figures. It is said by some on the other side that there is not more than half million dollars invested in these magnesite mines in Washington and California.

Mr. HADLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman has correctly recalled my statement, but as to whether it is an extreme statement I can state that one of the bureaus, I am not sure which it is until I refer to the bulletin, estimated it at $3,500,000 to $4,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, I have read the testimony to-day hurriedly, and I find that the estimates vary as I have indicated, from $3,500,000 mentioned by the gentleman from Washington, to $400,000, which is stated as a fair estimate by those who are opposed to this bill. It is a difference of opinion. And I want to say there is quite a difference of opinion with regard to the cost of production in the United States. That enters very largely into this question, and that difference even affects certain affidavits which were made and as to the manner of making those affidavits, because it is charged by those opposing the bill before the committee that they had no notice that the tariff was to be taken up and they were hurriedly summoned to the Ways and Means Committee and had no chance to be heard by the authorities in the particular Government bureau that undertook to make the investigation which the opponents of the bill claimed was ex parte.

I think there is something in that statement. The cost of production investigation was made largely by Mr. Riddell, an official of the Tariff Commission, which, of course, had the right to make the investigation if it desired to do so, but he seemed to investigate wholly from the standpoint of the producers of magnesite in Washington and California. I have some of Mr. Riddell's testimony here, I will not take the time to read it, but I suggest to the Members that they take the hearings and examine page 9 on to page 12, and further if they please, with respect to what Mr. Riddell says. However, I want to quote from this representative of the Tariff Board who was largely instrumental in bringing about this inquiry and he had much to do with the consideration of this bill. Some question arose with regard to transportation costs, and Members should know that transportation enters largely into this question. The bill itself, apparently, is an effort to adjust the tariff so that it will pay the transportation across the continent from Washington to points like Pittsburgh and Philadelphia. That is just about all the tariff amounts to. This material can be brought over from Fiume, a port of Italy, the nearest port to the mines, for about $16, all charges paid, and it can be delivered at Philadelphia or New York for that amount.

It can not be brought across the continent at the cost of production credited in these affidavits to the miners out there, and be delivered at those points, for less than $50. You see the difference. In this instance Gen. Hancock might have been vindicated when he suggested that the "tariff was a local issue." It costs so much less to bring it across the sea than it does across the continent that a suggestion is made here that a tariff should be put on practically sufficient to wipe out the transportation cost. The difference between rail and water shows why we want to open up our waterways in this country, and give the producers of the United States a chance to have a competitive system of transportation. [Applause.]

Mr. Riddell was on the stand, and I put to him some questions with respect to these costs, a part of which I think ought to go in the RECORD. I had figures showing the price across the sea and the price across the Continent. Then Mr. Riddell said in answering some of those questions:

Mr. RIDDELL. The quoted price in New York is $32.60, I believe. I may be corrected on that by others present.
Mr. MOORE. I have some figures here and I will state them so they can be used or criticized. My information is that the present price of American magnesite in Washington is $33.50.
Mr. RIDDELL. I should have stated in saying $32.60 that I had in mind Washington. There is a freight rate of over $16 per ton. I intended to say $23.60 was the price in Washington. The freight rate of $16 and some odd cents brings it up to nearly $50 a ton.

Now, here is a commodity coming from the West, and which we want to buy, which costs us $50 a ton in Philadelphia against $16 for the product from the American-Austrian mines.

Mr. Hawley said:

How much?
Mr. RIDDELL. Nearly $50 per ton.
Mr. MOORE. Per net ton?
The CHAIRMAN. A net ton or gross ton?
Mr. RIDDELL. Per ton of 2,000 pounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I have 10 minutes more, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield such time as the gentleman wishes to complete his remarks.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Thank you.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield there? Does not the gentleman think that the rate of $16 per ton is exorbitant and ought not to be so high?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was a war rate and may be above normal, but under existing railroad conditions no one can tell. And I want to say just here that it has been practically impossible to ascertain what the foreign costs are. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY] referred to labor costs the other day. He quoted the statement made by some one that this magnesite was produced in the Austrian mines by men and women, and that they labored for from 20 to 40 cents a day. While in prewar times we were accustomed to quote those figures, to-day, making allowances for the depreciation of Austrian money, the testimony shows, from the last information they had, which was really prewar information, that they were paying $1.10 in the mines to the miners for the crude work.

But I want to emphasize the statement that these American mines in Austria have been closed since they were seized by the officer over there corresponding to our Alien Property Custodian here. Those who heard me discuss the dyestuffs question heard me refer to the fact that our Alien Property Custodian here had seized German patents in the United States and had sold them to the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), and had then undertaken to get a clause in the treaty which forbade any German owner of those patents ever making any claim against the Alien Property Custodian or anybody else in the United States for that seizure.

These American owners of this $2,000,000 worth of mine property in Austria expect to get their property back. They hope to resume operations. They understand that faith is to be kept with them, but they have been unable, except through some agent who recently got over here, to find out anything about the property, because it was under military control in Austria. But it was seized and it was held, and is still being held, and will probably continue to be held, until the President of the United States, who has the power, issues his proclamation declaring that a state of peace exists. Now, these gentlemen who own this American property abroad have been wholly in the dark with respect to their cost of production over there, and while these other gentlemen have been operating their mines in California and Washington and have been supplying the American trade while the American-Austrian trade was cut off, these men who have got their money there, this good American money that went over to capture the Austrian business for the United States, have been completely shut out.

Mr. Riddell gave some further figures, as did others, with respect to the cost of production, and it was clear that the American magnesite could not be delivered to a point like Philadelphia or Pittsburgh, or wherever the great furnaces are, for less than $50, whereas the foreign magnesite could be brought in prior to the war for $16.

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania. Is that price of $50 based on the railroad transportation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is.

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania. And it is practicable, if the gentleman knows, to have it brought by the Panama Canal for less money?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It might be cheaper to bring it through the canal, but I do not have the rates.

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman any information as to what the price of that transportation would be now?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not.

Mr. HADLEY. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say that that question was submitted to one of the witnesses in the hearings. I asked him that question myself. He was well informed on the subject, and he stated that it had not been found practicable, because the mines in the State of Washington, to which the gentleman has referred, are located in the east half of the State, east of the Cascade Range. The product would have to be transported by rail to water and reshipped. It is transported in bulk by rail, and it was not practical in view of the rail cost.

One further statement, if the gentleman will permit: The cost of production was, say, $25.13, and $16.07 added for transportation makes $41.20 at Atlantic ports, instead of $50, whereas the other product is laid down at the same ports at $16.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think probably the gentleman's delivery point was Pittsburgh. I was using Philadelphia as the delievery point.

Mr. HADLEY. I was going to make one other observation. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was referring to delivery at Philadelphia and the gentleman was referring to Pittsburgh.

Mr. HADLEY. The Austrian rate includes profits. The domestic cost stated does not. I think the gentleman was referring to the selling price rather than the selling price of the brick manufacturer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me quote from page 13:

> Mr. MOORE. The figures given me are these. The price of American magnesite is $33.50 a net ton, Washington State. The freight rate from Washington to Philadelphia on that net ton is $15.60, making the present price of American magnesite at Philadelphia, using that now as a point of delivery, $49.10.
> Mr. RIDDELL. It is slightly above that, because there is a war tax of some 40 cents to be added.

Mr. HADLEY. That, however, if the gentleman will pardon me, is based on the selling price, not the production price.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I counted the production cost in the total amount. I was counting that in and adding the transportation cost of the Washington State magnesite; and the transportation cost, I repeat, is the cost which apparently this bill proposes to cover by a protective-tariff duty. We are all good Americans, however, and everyone of us wants to see enacted a protective tariff where necessary. This protective tariff, however, is really a protective tariff for the Pacific coast against the Atlantic coast consumer. That is about what the situation is. While we are all good Americans and love to shake hands across the continent, yet we are just up against one of those peculiar conditions in this bill that we have already had to face in one or two other bills that have been considered here, a situation which will perhaps have to be faced in other bills that are to come before these "war babies" are all disposed of. I want to help the gentleman get to an equitable basis, but I submit that adding the transportation cost as a tariff duty against an article which can be had in my State minus the transportation cost is adding just the transportation cost to the high cost of the product and putting it over on the consumer. That is the way it works out. It may be a little harsh to make this statement, but that is substantially the fact.

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WEBSTER. Can you conceive how a protective tariff can be placed on this article without taking into consideration the question of transportation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will concede that we would probably need little or no protective tariff on Washington State magnesite if Washington State magnesite was sold west of the Rocky Mountains. But if it is to come east of the Rocky Mountains and be sold in Pennsylvania, I can see how we must pay the extra cost from the Rocky Mountains east.

Mr. WEBSTER. Does not that involve the fact that we must take into consideration the question of transportation and fix a protective tariff, or leave out the question of transportation and fix no protective tariff at all?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In other words, if we are to furnish California with steel products, we must add to the price of the products which we sell to the people of California not only the transportation cost of the magnesite coming to us, but the transportation cost of the magnesite going back in the finished product, and adding thereto the duty which equals the transportation cost. It makes it pretty heavy for the consumer out in California under the circumstances. The whole problem could be met, I will say to the gentleman from Washington, if the furnaces that use the magnesite were in the State of Washington, or in the State of Oregon, or anywhere west of the Rocky Mountains; but if the furnaces are all east, and the magnesite must be hauled east, paying heavy freight charges, and then hauled west in the finished product back to California, paying still heavier transportation charges because of the increased weight of the commodity, and then adding to these two the transportation charges the heavy duty that is imposed on foreign products to keep the western magnesite at a higher price, it is going to be expensive to the gentlemen out West.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from California, who has come to the rescue. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. I understand the gentleman's argument, that the object of this tariff on magnesite is to equalize the difference in labor cost in the United States and in Austria, with which we compete. Is not that about the contention of the committee?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No. I think the gentleman came in at a point where we had already covered the labor situation, and he has confused it with the transportation situation—a thing which the gentleman from California is not accustomed to do.

Mr. RAKER. I have listened attentively to what the gentleman said. I want to ask him another question. The gentleman maintains that the difference of labor cost does not hold?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, all good Republicans believe in covering by a tariff duty the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, and if the foreign wage rate was away below the American rate the Republican party would fix the tariff to cover that rate for the benefit of the American workman.

Mr. RAKER. Is not that involved in this magnesite bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the intention was to cover both the transportation cost and the labor cost in this bill, seeing that the bill came from the gentleman's own State.

Mr. RAKER. A further question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman if he is in favor of this bill?

Mr. RAKER. I have not the floor, and so I can not answer that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is a good Democrat, and he has discussed this and several other tariff bills. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he is in favor of a tariff bill providing rates that will cover the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, in the interest of his own State?

Mr. RAKER. That is the purpose of most of your legislation that applies to the Eastern States, when you come to figure it right down—the question of the difference in the rates.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman favors that system, does he not?

Mr. RAKER. I do not say so right now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman be frank and say whether he favors that system?

Mr. RAKER. In some instances. It depends on circumstances.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How long shall I pursue this line of inquiry of the gentleman, seeing that he is on the fence with regard to this bill?

Mr. RAKER. I am not on the fence. I will be right on the ground when the time comes. But the gentleman has stated that there are something over $2,000,000 of American capital invested in Austria in the control of these magnesite mines.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the evidence before the committee, and $500,000 in addition invested in the United States for the purpose of manufacturing the raw material.

Mr. RAKER. That would make no difference, as I understand in the gentleman's theory.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It only shows good faith on the part of Americans who invested their money abroad to get raw material, and who have invested money in factories here under the American wage scale, to provide places to work up this foreign raw material. That in part meets the wage question, so far as these producers are concerned who get their magnesite from abroad. They manufacture it here, and therefore they pay the American wage scale here.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman would make no distinction, would he, between the American who goes to Austria and invests his money there to produce magnesite and an Austrian who produces it there and ships it to this country?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman whether he would resist an American going abroad in 1912 or 1913 to obtain dyestuffs that could not be made in the United States? Would he object to that?

Mr. RAKER. We need them in this country, and wherever we can get anything that we need I believe in getting it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman would go so far with me in his trip across the water and on the way back, I take it, as to put a duty on those foreign dyestuffs if we needed them here, even though they were absolutely essential to manufactures here.

Mr. RAKER. If it was as stated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Catering, of course, to the good faith of the gentleman from California and others——

Mr. RAKER. If it was as presented to the House in these bills, that the article is a necessity during war times and in peace times, and that we have no product of that kind here, and particularly that it is our duty to look after these conditions in peace times, I am going to vote to protect them when it becomes necessary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very good. Does the gentleman believe an American citizen traveling abroad is entitled to the protection of his flag?

Mr. RAKER. I surely do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think an American citizen traveling abroad and investing his money there in an American enterprise is entitled to the protection of his flag?

Mr. RAKER. He is entitled to the protection of his flag, but he is not entitled to any more consideration in the production of his stuff in a foreign country and bringing it to America, whereby he gets the benefit of the cheap labor there, than the foreigner is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman vote for the bills loaning about $10,000,000,000 of good, hard-earned American money to our Allies to spend in various enterprises during the war?

Mr. RAKER. I did, because I believed it was necessary to maintain the war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think we ought to have that money paid back?

Mr. RAKER. I think every single penny of that money ought to be paid back with interest.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then why does not the gentleman stand up for an American investing his money in a legitimate enterprise over there, having the same shelter of his flag?

Mr. RAKER. There can be no difference between an American who goes abroad and invests his money abroad to get the benefit of cheap foreign labor to produce the article and then bring it back to this country and the foreigner who produces the article there, and an American who does that should have no more consideration in the importation of that article than an alien should have. That is my view of the situation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman agrees wholly with the great commoner from Nebraska, slightly removed from California, who almost left the Department of State on the ground that Americans who had money invested in Mexico should get out of Mexico.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. I want to offer a suggestion that if these people who went over before the war and invested $2,000,000 in Austrian mines had patronized the California mines, they would not be closed out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman has made the observation. Nobody knew that magnesite was in California at that time. It would have been a good thing if the prospecting abilities of the gentlemen from California had discovered or developed magnesite in California; we might have been using it when the war broke out, but nobody knew it was there. Not having it, and it being essential, it had to be brought from abroad, and instead of letting the foreigner sell it to us Americans went over and bought the mines over there and brought it here.

Mr. WEBSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WEBSTER. Would not the element of transportation enter into it in getting the material from Austria as it does from Washington?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I presume there would be some competition in business if a reasonable tariff rate were fixed. This bill proposes to prohibit the importation of foreign magnesite. We must close the doors against $2,000,000 invested over there, which means that it shall be confiscated.

Mr. HADLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman states that the committee intends to prohibit the importation of magnesite. I challenge that statement as far as the intention goes. Whether it will do it as a matter of fact is subject to debate. The purpose was to have it compete on equal terms; that was the purpose of the committee, and I submit that when the committee considered the matter in executive session that was the purpose. We undertook to fix the rates in the bill, modify them so as to make the rates such as would affect competition at the Atlantic seaboard on equal terms.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to read to the gentleman from page 90 of the hearings. The witness's name was Thane, called by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY]. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY] was interrogating him in the manner of a good cross-examining lawyer. The chairman of the committee said:

The CHAIRMAN. If you do not get this protection and your factories are closed, where will we get magnesite from?

Mr. THANE. Austria.

The CHAIRMAN. So it is up to the Congress of the United States to sustain your industry or get magnesite from Austria. Is that right?

Mr. THANE. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. How about the Canadian product?

Mr. THANE. It will not make bricks.

Mr. HADLEY. If you go down, we must get the material from Austria?

Mr. THANE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HADLEY. And if Congress gives you the protection you will put the Austrians out of business?

Mr. THANE. Yes.

I am glad the gentleman from Washington has raised the question, because I think I have shown out of the mouth of his own witness that it is proposed to put these Austrian mines out of business. Of course, it is horrible to think of Austrians getting into business in the United States, so the word "Austrian" was very effective—it was pro-German—but the fact was that the mines belonged to Americans, and the question really should have been, "You will put Americans in Austria out of business," and the answer was emphatically "Yes."

Now, my colleagues on the Republican side and revenue-collecting friends on the Democratic side, if you bar out all imports, how are you going to get revenue to run the Government? How are you going to keep prices down in the United States when you insist that only one series of mines in one State shall furnish the product for all the States, and furnish it for States 3,000 miles away, who are obliged to pay excessive freight charges and be prohibited from getting their raw material into competition?

It seems to me a fair case to present to the committee, this matter of competition and revenue raising. I do not want to be for a protective tariff that only breeds monopolies in the United States. I do not believe that we should completely shut ourselves out from the rest of the world. I am as intensely American as anyone. I believe we could put a barrier around the State of Pennsylvania, live upon its raw and finished products, and be happy there against the world, but I do not want to do it. I have been a high protectionist, almost as high as my friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who has been charged at times with wanting to put a barrier around the entire country; but, pray, why did we send 2,000,000 men to Europe and hold 2,000,000 more in reserve?

Why did we lend these Allies of ours $10,000,000,000? Why did we spend these many billions of dollars and tax the people of the United States to death? Why have we encouraged every line of export business and prepared, through bills passed in this House, to induce men to go into the foreign trade if we intended to bar every kind of competition?

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. The testimony of the witness, Thane, to which the gentleman alluded, was directed, was it not, to a bill which carried a $25 rate on dead-burned magnesite? The bill as reported carries a rate of $15. If the statement were true, admitting it was for the sake of argument, though that is not admitted at all, that the $25 rate would put the Austrian people out of business, is it not a fact that the majority of the committee ascertained, in its own judgment, that the $15 rate would not put them out of business, but would put them on equal terms at the Atlantic seaboard?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Washington deny that he was very insistent on the $25 rate?

Mr. HADLEY. I will not, and I am of opinion to-day that that is more nearly the accurate figure which ought to be written into the bill than the rate fixed, but I have acquiesced in the judgment of the majority of the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can understand the earnestness of the gentleman from Washington and of all his distinguished colleagues in presenting this bill for the highest possible rates. If this bill were to go through, it is generally conceded that the Washington product, which is a product encouraged by capital from California principally, somewhere down around San Francisco, would prosper much, and that the market would be open only and exclusively to the American product, that the foreign product would be shut off.

That certainly is the fear of the large interests that use magnesite in my section of the country. I do not want to raise this question of sectionalism. I would not do it for political reasons for a moment, in a matter of this kind, but still there is a geographical condition here which makes it almost necessary to discuss it. The matter can not be thoroughly understood unless it is stated that the difference between the point of production in the United States and the point of consumption is 3,000 miles, and that that is no greater than the difference between the point of consumption on the Atlantic coast and the point of production abroad, and that the difference in the cost to-day in favor of the foreign raw material is two-thirds; that is to say, it costs three times as much to obtain the material for the great consumers, from the Washington mines as it does to obtain it from the Austrian mines.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman had been here, he would have made the same argument on the tungsten-ore bill, as he is making on this proposition, because the same question identically was involved.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I say to the gentleman that the people who went out of this country in good faith prior to the war and during the war to find raw materials for American use, which we did not have in this country, are to be commended.

Mr. BLANTON. Then his position would have been identically the same on the tungsten-ore bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think there should be protection against foreign ores if they compete with ores in the United States. I think there should be protection against foreign manufactures if they compete against manufactures in the United States; that there certainly should be protection against child-labor products, and against the products of men working more than eight hours per day, if that is the daily average of work in the United States; that there should be protection against the products of convict labor in foreign countries if it attempts to come here and compete with the products of free labor in the United States. All those things we should be protected from, and if the men in Austria are working for $1.10 a day and they are obtaining three or five dollars a day in the Washington mines, a tariff should be levied to protect that difference in wage. It should go further, in my judgment, and protect the difference in overhead. There ought to be a fair protection in matters of that kind, where we are dealing with competitive articles. But where the whole Nation is appealing for tungsten or for magnesite, or for potash, and the war is on us, and the War Department or the Nation need material, and we can not get along without these raw materials, then I think the man who is willing to risk his capital—and, of course, he expects to profit by it—going out for those things we need, and without which we could not fight or work, should be commended rather than condemned.

It is not fair after he has made the investment that we should suddenly close down on his enterprise and say that all the money he has put over there is foreign money and all the energy he has displayed was unpatriotic, and that he should lose his all. Nevertheless, gentlemen, I am going to vote for a protective tariff duty on magnesite. [Applause.] But I am going to move to cut down the rate of duty on one of these grades. [Applause.] The reason for that is that I think there is a sufficient protective rate given if these rates be cut down. I am standing for principle and have taken the trouble to explain these geographical differences because they must necessarily enter into the question and can not be thoroughly understood without a frank statement of the whole situation. I want to protect the industries of Washington just as fully and fairly as I seek to have protected the industries of my own State. I stood to protect the farmer against Canadian reciprocity when some of you were trembling on this floor for fear you might offend the President, and I do not subscribe to those statements that sometimes emanate from gentlemen on the floor that we are unfair to the farmer in the matter of protection because we come from industrial centers. I do not want to vote for an omnibus tariff bill that does not include all the industries of this country and give everybody a chance to progress here against unfair foreign competition, but I realize as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means that we can not bar the products of the world and still have that broad influence that we thought we were coming to have by reason of the war. We will not get revenue to run this country if we close up our customhouses. It might be in the matter of magnesite that we need no tariff duty at all; we certainly would not so far as magnesite is concerned out West if they manufactured it in the West, but the manufacturing is done in the East, and that is what makes the trouble.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is aware, of course, that the cost of the necessary magnesite to make a ton of steel is comparatively insignificant?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. About 10 cents a ton.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not a great quantity.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And if the rate is reduced, as proposed by the gentleman, that would never enter into the price of a ton of steel?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it would. Now, to conclude these remarks, I would say that hundreds of letters and telegrams from large business enterprises have come to me protesting against this magnesite bill. They have come from Ohio; they have come from New York; they have come from Maryland; they have come from New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

Those are Atlantic seaboard States, and they are all interested in the quality of the magnesite they obtain. Hitherto they have been preferring that which these American prospectors have brought out of Austria. I will put in the RECORD, with the consent of the committee, a letter from the Crucible Steel Co. of America, Pittsburgh, Pa., protesting very earnestly against this bill.

The letter is as follows:

CRUCIBLE STEEL CO. OF AMERICA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Pittsburgh, Pa., August 12, 1919.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

Magnesite (dead burned).

DEAR SIR: As you are probably aware, a strong effort is being made by certain interests to have a bill passed putting an import duty on this commodity of $15 per ton. Heretofore it has always come in free, and if a bill is passed carrying the proposed duty it will work to the great disadvantage of American steel makers, who can not hope to continue steady employment of labor if important raw materials, like magnesite, that are largely imported from abroad, do not come in free of duty.

While it is true that there is a limited deposit of magnesite in this country, owned largely by California interests, and that these interests would benefit by the passage of such a tariff bill, it would benefit a very limited number of workmen at the expense of thousands of men employed in American mills.

We are told the passage of this bill is likely to occur at an early date, unless prompt action is taken by you and others that are properly informed, to see that it is not passed. We trust, therefore, you will see that this matter, so important to the American steel industry, is given early attention.

Very truly, yours,

O. H. WHARTON,
President.

P. S.—The proposed rate of duty is equal to the price we paid, delivered in New York, on imported magnesite as late as 1915, so you will see what this proposed duty means to domestic steel makers.

O. H. W.

There are a number of furnaces, iron and steel manufacturers, who have written, but the argument is in this letter, and, so not to encumber the RECORD, I shall insert only that one letter. Iron and steel, however, is not the only interest involved here. Magnesite is used largely for composition flooring, flooring on cars, flooring for buildings, used very extensively in the flooring of decks of ships, and was used throughout the war by the Shipping Board. I am going to put in some letters showing the diversified thought on this question. It is not a one-sided proposition. The American Monolith Co., Milwaukee, Wis., manufacturers of composition car flooring, write this letter protesting against the bill:

MILWAUKEE, WIS., July 10, 1919.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Ways and Means Committee, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Referring to proposed bill, H. R. 5218, for proposed tariff on magnesite, will say that our company is 1 of about 50 manufacturers throughout the United States in the business of manufacturing composition flooring, our principal raw material being magnesite.

The proposed tariff of $25 a ton will take away from our business all chances of development and enlargement. We manufacture flooring, and every cent per foot added to the cost decreases our chances at the market; and while we believe in protection of American raw materials, we certainly consider a figure like that mentioned in the bill absolutely unreasonable. A tax of 5 per cent should be amply sufficient.

We are at present absolutely at the mercy of the California producers, who are charging us whatever they please for magnesite, and I am informed by the manufacturers, and from my own experience, that our market at the present war prices has been very much reduced.

If the time is not too short, I believe that your committee should give our industry an opportunity to present its case. We are a new and growing business that can develop a large market for the new American product, but we can not do so if we are up against a trust among the western producers of magnesite or against a prohibitive tariff, which would enable them to maintain war prices.

Very truly, yours,

THE AMERICAN MONOLITH CO.,
BAUMBACH.

I am taking these from various parts of the country. The complaints show that they are not centered along the Atlantic seaboard exclusively. The Williams-Wendt Co., manufacturers and contractors for boat making, hospital flooring, warehouse and factory floor covering, write and say:

CHICAGO, ILL., July 14, 1919.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: We wish to protest against the passage of House bill 5218 presented in the House of Representatives June 7, 1919, by Representative HADLEY.

The bill provides for an excessive tax on the importation of crude and calcined magnesite.

The passage of this bill would be a serious blow to the composition flooring industry, which is but in its infancy in the United States. Manufacturers of composition flooring are compelled to compete with cement and other cheap flooring materials, and are compelled to furnish their product at a price but little higher than cement floors. The industry has been practically at a standstill during the period of the war because of the high prices of raw materials, and each manufacturer has looked forward to the time when the importation of Grecian magnesite would permit him to enter the field against active competition with other floor materials. The suggested tax of $15 per ton on crude rock, or $25 per ton on calcined magnesite, is prohibitive and, in our opinion, only benefits a coterie of California producers, at whose hands the composition-floor business has suffered during the period of the war.

We believe an investigation will show that magnesite may be produced and calcined in California at a price much lower than at present quoted, and the proposed tax would make it possible even for them to further raise their price without interference from the imported product.

We believe that a 5 per cent ad valorem tax would be sufficient to protect the California producer who has a legitimately invested capital in his business, and we ask that you give this matter your serious consideration.

Yours, very truly,

WILLIAMS-WENDT CO.,
H. E. WILLIAMS.

I quote that much to show how these people feel about it. I insert herewith a letter from the Marine Decking & Supply Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., which makes the same kind of an argument:

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Ways and Means Committee, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On July 29, 1919, tariff bill H. R. 5218 was reported out from the committee with a rate of duty of $15 per ton on calcined magnesite and $10 per ton on crude magnesite instead of $25 per ton on calcined and $15 per ton on crude, as requested by the magnesite producers.

We desire to say that we are extensive users of calcined magnesite and that our business is the placing of magnesite ship's decking on the majority of the ships now being built for the United States Shipping Board. We further desire to advise that we feel that this duty as recommended by the House Ways and Means Committee is still excessive and should be reduced to a maximum of not over $10 on the calcined and $5 on the crude.

At the present time it is extremely difficult for us to get magnesite owing to the fact that the producers of crude magnesite in this country are not mining any magnesite, they stating that they are awaiting the outcome of their plea for a larger duty on material of a like nature imported into this country. They are therefore working an additional hardship on us, and as there is very little foreign magnesite being shipped, it is extremely difficult for us to continue to carry on our business. If we were to be cut off from the purchase of foreign magnesite by this exorbitant duty, we feel that we might just as well consider the elimination of the magnesite composition decking from our business, thereby destroying one of the most promising young industries in this country.

We therefore beg of you to use your influence to have this excessive duty reduced.

Thanking you for your attention to this matter, we are,

Yours, very truly,

MARINE DECKING & SUPPLY CO.
W. M. DOBSON, President.

Let me add here that several western letters have been received by me, among which comes one from the very heart and center of the State of the gentlemen who are advocating this measure—the Raecolith Flooring Co., of Seattle. It is as follows:

SEATTLE, July 15, 1919.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: In regard to bill H. R. 5218, designed to maintain production of magnesite ores and manufactures thereof in the United States:

Having been in this line of trade for something more than a dozen years, we respectfully address you to state that in our opinion the duty of 1¼ cents per pound on calcined magnesite will work a great hardship on all manufacturers of magnesite composition flooring. The cost of the floor will thereby be advanced sufficiently to cause its elimination in many new buildings where now it is being generally used.

Magnesite composition flooring in the United States is a comparatively new article, and its introduction to architects, contractors, and owners has been attended with a great amount of labor and little or no profit. In view of this, we wish to protest against the contemplated high rate of 1¼ cents per pound. We believe some protection is due the producer, however, and in our opinion a 5 per cent ad valorem tax is sufficient.

Respectfully submitted.

THE RAECOLITH FLOORING CO.,
By J. C. REIFSNIDER.

Mr. HADLEY. I hesitate to interrupt the gentleman, but I would like to call his attention to the fact that the rate has been modified from $25 to $15.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This refers to the old bill. This communication comes from the point of magnesite production, the city of Seattle, in the State of Washington. It is quite significant.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the bill finally, although I intend to offer an amendment to section 2, "Magnesite, calcined, dead burned, and grain, three-fourths of a cent per pound," cutting the rate from three-fourths of a cent a pound to one-half a cent a pound. I shall do that, I am frank to say, almost in the dark as to whether it will cover the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. But I am informed that three-fourths of a cent per pound is too high. Those who have their money invested abroad contend that there should be an ad valorem duty of 5 per cent on the whole, and that that would be ample protection and enable these American producers to live and prosper. But I am going to offer this amendment, although I may change my mind about it later on as to the exact amount. In the meanwhile the House itself may figure out from the hearings or the bill, if it pleases, whether or not it is a just rate. I am advised it will be ample to give full protection to the American industry.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5218, the magnesite bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. UPSHAW, for two weeks, on account of attending the Confederate Reunion.

FOOD CONTROL.

Mr. HAUGEN, from the Committee on Agriculture, submitted a conference report on the bill (H. R. 8624) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' approved August 10, 1917," for printing under the rules.

OPERATION OF TRANSPORTATION BUSINESS.

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], one of the managers on the part of the House, obtained unanimous consent to withdraw from the files a conference report on the bill S. 641, for the reason that he had inadvertently failed to accompany the report with the usual statement. Since then he has prepared the statement, and I again offer the conference report for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918.

The SPEAKER. The conference report and statement will be printed under the rules.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 1.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19, and agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, beg leave to submit the following:

The Senate conferees accepted amendments Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19, being all of the amendments passed by the House except amendment No. 1. This amendment inserted on page 1, line 13, after the word "control," the words "or with any order of the President consistent with this act."

Section 10 with this amendment reads in part as follows:

"SEC. 10. That carriers, while under Federal control, shall be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under State or Federal laws or at common law, except in so far as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act or any other act applicable to such Federal control, or with any order of the President consistent with this act."

As to this amendment No. 1 the managers on the part of the House receded.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in the form of resolutions of the Society of the Sons of the American Revolution of the State of California, on the subject of foreign invasion of the United States and Bolshevism.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Well, reserving the right to object, I do not think we ought to start printing these resolutions in the RECORD. We would have dozens of them every day. The usual course is to put them in the basket. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed that the gentleman from California had obtained consent. The gentleman objected this morning.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of labor and the coming industrial conference to be held in this city.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are these the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. They are my own remarks, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the magnesite bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill which is under consideration in the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. RICKETTS, and the other gentleman from Ohio, Mr. FESS, may be permitted to revise and extend their remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request, to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the magnesite bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, October 3, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee that we try to find the path of destiny which is God's path for us as a Nation. We pray that this day we may be kept close to Thee; that we may not depart from Thy will or Thy Word, but work out for this Nation a plan and policy that will be pleasing in Thy sight, and that will bring peace and prosperity to the land. For Christ's sake. Amen.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions of the First Baptist Church of Webster, Mass., in regard to the league of nations. The resolutions are very brief, and I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH,
Webster, Mass., September 29, 1919.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE:

The congregation of the First Baptist Church, in meeting assembled September 28, 1919, adopted the following resolution:

"We are profoundly interested in the covenant of the league of nations now pending before the United States Senate.

"We are unalterably opposed to any covenant which gives another high contracting nation in its assembly six votes to our Nation's one.

"We do not favor the surrender of our national sovereignty in any particular to any league of nations.

"We believe that the Monroe doctrine should have a place in any league of nations formed commensurate with its vital importance in the security and development of the Western World, and that its application should be left entirely in the hands of the United States Government.

"We are firmly opposed to any league of nations which would make the United States a party to the oppression of China by Japan."

RICHARD B. ESTEN,
For Congregation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. At the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], who is absent from the Senate on account of illness in his family, I send to the desk certain resolutions adopted at the annual convention of the Lincoln County Sunday School Association in his State in favor of the league of nations, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PIONEER M. E. CHURCH,
Beresford, S. Dak., September 29, 1919.

Hon. E. S. JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR JOHNSON: The following resolutions were unanimously adopted at the afternoon session of the annual convention of the Lincoln County Sunday School Association held at Pioneer Church, of Lincoln County, S. Dak., Sunday, September 28, 1919:

"Be it resolved by those in attendance at the county Sunday School convention of Lincoln County, now assembled at the Pioneer Church, Beresford, S. Dak., That we place ourselves on record as unqualifiedly in favor of the league of nations; not in the sense that we believe the constitution now before the United States Senate is perfect, but that we are convinced the world needs a league of nations to extend world brotherhood, to prevent the horrors of war, and to reduce the awful burdens placed on the people in preparation for war; and for that purpose we believe the constitution now discussed in the United States Senate is a long step in the right direction. And we are opposed to any reservations or amendments of whatever character which would require the readoption of the covenant by the nations which have already accepted it; or which might make it necessary that it be returned to a peace conference for reconsideration, and thus delay peace and prolong the present unsettled conditions of the world.

"It is further resolved, That we urge Senator STERLING and Senator JOHNSON of South Dakota to use all their influence to effect an early ratification of the treaty of peace and the adoption of the league of nations.

"Be it further resolved, That the secretary of the Lincoln County Sunday School Association be instructed to forward a copy of these resolutions to Senator STERLING and Senator JOHNSON, and to have them published in all of the county papers, and in the Sioux Falls Press and Argus-Leader."

Yours, very truly,

W. M. REDFIELD,
Acting Secretary.

Resolutions adopted unanimously at a union meeting of the Presbyterian and Methodist churches, September 28, 1919, at St. Laurence, S. Dak.

Resolved, That we, the congregations of the Presbyterian and Methodist churches in union meeting assembled, declare it to be our firm conviction that the treaty of peace and league of nations now under discussion in the Senate of the United States be adopted as speedily as is consistent with the importance of the document that is before them.

If it should be thought best to amend some of the articles of the league of nations these should not be of such a nature as to necessitate the rejection of the document but should simply be explanations of our understanding of them.

We are confident that any new treaty and league of nations devised would meet with as much criticism and opposition as the present one. We therefore urge upon our Senators that they take speedy action to ratify and that a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Senators of South Dakota and to Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, who is chairman of the Senate committee dealing with the subject.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3125) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer certain surplus machine tools and other equipment to the Federal Board for Vocational Education, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 241) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3126) authorizing the detail of commissioned officers of the Army to take courses of instruction within two years from date of commission, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 242) thereon.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2646) for the relief of Mary E. Bingham, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WATSON, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 413) for the relief of Canadian Car & Foundry Co. (Ltd.), reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 240) thereon.

SETTLERS ON FORT ASSINNIBOINE LANDS, MONTANA.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have a report to submit from the Committee on Public Lands, and I wish to say a few words about it.

A few weeks ago the Senate took up for immediate consideration by unanimous consent and passed a bill introduced by my colleague [Mr. WALSH of Montana] granting an extension of time, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, for as much as two years, in which the homesteaders on the Fort Peck Reservation, in Montana, might pay for their lands. The bill was introduced because that section had suffered a terrific drought for three years and the homesteaders were unable to make their payments. Therefore when the bill was explained it was unanimously passed.

I report back from the Committee on Public Lands favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2964) providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries of lands within the former Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation, in Montana, and I submit a report (No. 239) thereon. The bill gives a similar extension of time to settlers on the former Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation, in Montana, where the same conditions prevailed. The reservation was opened three years ago to sale to homesteaders at $2.50 an acre, but ever since then there has been a severe drought in that section and the settlers have not raised anything of consequence. There are payments now past due.

I ask that the bill may be read for the information of the Senate, and then I shall ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who has made homestead entry under the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 11, 1915 (38 Stat. L., p. 807), entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to survey the lands of the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation and open the same to settlement," may obtain an extension of time for one year from the anniversary of the date of entry last preceding the passage of this act within which to pay all of the installment then due or any part of any preceding installment, where payment has not yet been made and where an extension of time therefor is not authorized by any act of Congress by paying interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on the sums to be extended from the maturity of the unpaid installments to the expiration of the period of extension, the interest to be paid to the receiver of the land office for the district in which the lands are situated, within such time as may be prescribed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That any installment which becomes due within one year from the passage of this act and for which an extension of time for payment is not otherwise authorized, may also be extended for a period of one year by paying interest thereon in advance at the said rate: Provided further, That any payment so extended may thereafter be extended for a further period of one year in like manner: And provided further, That if commutation proof is submitted, all the unpaid payments must be made at that time.

SEC. 2. That the failure of any entryman to make any payment that may be due, unless the same be extended, or to make any payment extended either under the provisions hereof or other act of Congress, at or before the time to which such payment has been extended, shall forfeit the entry and the same shall be canceled, and any and all payments theretofore made shall be forfeited.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR OWEN.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have here a copy of an address delivered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] before the American Bankers' Association. The Senator from Oklahoma is a well-recognized authority on the question therein discussed, and I ask that the address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BEFORE AMERICAN BANKERS' ASSOCIATION BY SENATOR ROBERT L. OWEN ON THE SUBJECT OF STABILITY IN COMMERCE AND GOVERNMENT, SEPTEMBER 30, 1919.

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the American Bankers' Association, stability in industry and commerce and in government is vital to the happiness of mankind.

"To-day we witness some of the evils of instability in production, distribution, and the purchasing power of the dollar, the effects of which appear in the high cost of living, under which the world groans, bitterly complains, and threatens the stability of government throughout the world. When the normal income does not suffice to give food, clothing, and shelter, and the necessities of life and reasonable liberty, men first grow impatient, then indignant, and this indignation may rise by degrees to insensate fury, the destruction of government, of life, and property, and of those productive processes vital to remedy the very evil complained of.

"The Government of the United States is controlled by public opinion in large degree, and the members of your association, touching every business enterprise throughout the United States and every depositor and agency of production and distribution, are capable of directing public opinion along safe lines that will establish stability instead of instability.

"In February, 1908, in discussing the principles which should control the banking system and prevent financial panic, I emphasized then, as I do now, the extreme importance of stability. One of the great causes of instability of the past were periodic panics in the financial world. This evil has been remedied by the combined wisdom of the country, by the Federal reserve act, which I had the honor to engineer through the United States Senate, with the aid of many men. I wish to point out to you certain elements which have contributed to the present high cost of living, a condition of very grave instability and menace, with some suggestions which I trust may prove useful if they meet with the approval of the country and your active support.

"The chief factors entering into the high cost of living are: 1, gold expansion in America; 2, Federal reserve note expansion; 3, credit expansion, United States Government bonds, certificates of indebtedness, Treasury notes, deposits, and loans; 4, extraordinary prices paid for material and labor by munition makers, by the Army, by the Shipping Board, and other governmental agencies, under the urgency of war; 5, the dislocation of peace industry during the war and diminishing production in such industries; 6, destruction of shipping by the submarines and greatly impaired transportation facilities and equipment; 7, extraordinary European demands and cessation of peaceful production; 8, unrest of labor because of the high cost of living, strikes, unproductiveness because of discontent; 9, hesitation of capital because of unstable conditions; 10, interruption of exports because of inadequate support of European exchange and lack of credits to finance European construction; 11, excess-profits tax and heavy war taxes passed by manufacturers and merchants and business men directly on to the products of commerce to the consumer, raising the prices of all products, compelling labor to demand larger wages in order to live, and establishing a vicious circle affecting the great railway properties and all industrials and all merchandise; 12, the exaction of monopolies, restricting production, and restraining trade and fixing unfair profits. These monopolies existed before the war, and have grown worse during the war because of the other factors heretofore recited; 13, and finally local profiteering, under which first necessity and then greed has influenced very many middlemen to take advantage of unstable conditions to charge extortionate prices; 14, violent rising prices have led to enormous waste, extravagance, and recklessness of expenditure by those who have profited, setting a false standard and an impossible standard for those who have not profited but have suffered by these conditions.

"The effect of all these things has caused a feeling of violent unrest with some of those who have suffered, and a false leadership has arisen, advising the overthrow of the existing order, because those charged with the duty of government do not afford adequate relief and offer no satisfactory solution.

"I wish to offer you some suggestions that will tend to give stability, in the hope that some of the suggestions may be found of use and put into actual practice. Words without action are empty and vain.

SEND GOLD ABROAD.

"In exchange for our commodity excess shipments we have gained eleven hundred million dollars of gold. This has expanded our currency and diminished its purchasing power and caused a rise in prices. The metallic gold is lying in our vaults serving no adequate purpose, while European currency, violently inflated, needs deflation and additional gold reserves. We could profitably lend a thousand million dollars of gold to other nations without deflating American currency, because under the Federal reserve act commodity bills based on warehouse receipts and goods in transit can take the place of gold which we hold in excess and which will flow back to our country unavoidably unless we permit the people of Europe to repay us in commodities the ten billions we have loaned them, and on which we will receive over five hundred millions annually in interest. We need have no fear in loaning money to Europe on proper security. Neither Europe nor the world is bankrupt because of the World War. The world has only suffered to the extent of the net destruction of property. The energies of the war have created a very large offset to the destruction of property. The war debits are held as offset credits by citizens of the world, and these war debts must not be regarded as a destruction of the productive powers of mankind. If the United States issued twenty-five billions of bonds, and these bonds are held by citizens of the United States, it is merely a question of distribution, and the values of the United States and its productive power is not diminished; on the contrary, it has been greatly increased by the war. The same is true of France and of Italy and of Belgium.

MAINTAIN FIXED PER CAPITA CIRCULATION.

"The Federal Reserve Board by exercising its powers could stabilize the per capita circulation of the United States at a fixed amount per capita, and this policy ought to be adopted as a means of preventing instability due to a fluctuation in the amount of currency.

"The per capita circulation of money in the United States in 1890 was $22.82; in 1900, $26.93; in 1910, $34.33, due to the inflation of the national bank currency against the 2 per cent bonds offered as a remedy in 1900 to confound the free-silver advocates. In 1914 it was $34.35 per capita. In 1918 it was $50.81, due to an expansion of $11 gold per capita and about $5 of Federal reserve notes issued to accommodate the actual daily demands of commerce. The high cost of living and the doubling of prices required more currency, and the reserve notes accommodated this demand, but being subject to daily liquidation could not be justly regarded as inflation.

"In fact, the Federal Reserve Board points out that the actual per capita circulation outside the United States Treasury and the Federal Reserve System is only $45.56, which corresponds with the circulation of 1914 plus $11 of gold per capita increase. It is of great importance that the per capita circulation should be kept stable. The ruinous effects of inflation are shown in Europe.

EFFECT OF CREDIT EXPANSION ON PRICES.

"Credit expansion and the issuance of Government bonds and certificates was unavoidable during the war, and was required by the tremendous energies created by war. But these credits, while less mobile than currency, are nevertheless transferable and are a means by which currency is more readily accessible, and it has the effect of modifying to some extent the purchasing power of money. The conditions would be more stable if these bonds were issued payable in 50 years with the right of the Government from time to time to take them up, as interest rates will fall when stability is established throughout the world.

"Bank deposits and loans were greatly stimulated by the war because commodities of all kinds were salable at high prices and converted into current credits, and the extraordinary activities of the war resulted in corresponding loans, all of which contributed to making money more readily accessible, and therefore of less purchasing power in relation to commodities and in relation to human labor. These factors should slowly adjust themselves as cost factors by increase of production and improved distributive processes.

PRODUCTION AND DISTRIBUTION.

"Now that the urgency of war has passed, prices should adjust themselves to the processes of reconstruction. Industry can now adjust itself to the conditions of peace and should steadily increase production and improve distribution. The world is rapidly replacing the ships destroyed by war. The millions of European men and women heretofore engaged in war and war activities are now available for peace.

"Increased production and better and more economical distribution and waste avoidance are the chief remedies for the high cost of living, and to accomplish this the banks of the United States should encourage production by extending credits preferentially for productive processes, for improved warehousing, lending against warehouse receipts, and using their good offices and friendly counsel to stimulate production and improved distribution. The encouragement of corn clubs and other agricultural clubs, encouraging boys and girls to make money out of raising pigs, chickens, and so forth; improving gardens, while apparently small matters are of great national consequence, and the country bankers have done fine work along these lines. Developing water power and the use of the current for industrial purposes are productive processes of the highest order. The building of hard-surfaced roads and the use of motor trucks facilitate distribution. There should be organized standard systems of distribution by improved marketing methods under Government charter and supervision.

LABOR, MANAGEMENT, AND CAPITAL.

"Labor is both manual and mental, and is entitled to full consideration.

"The unrest of labor, due to the war condition, to the extraordinary prices during war times, the reports of extraordinary profits during the war by the employers of labor, and the high cost of living should be met by encouraging a frank and free discussion and arranging methods by which labor will participate in what it produces above a bare wage. The employee should not be regarded merely as a money-making machine, but altogether as a human being entitled of right to life, liberty, happiness, and a reasonable participation in the profits arising from his labor. This policy is advisable for the sake both of the employer and the employee. When the workman feels that he is working both for himself and his employer he will not indulge in sabotage, the killing of time, or in waste and neglect. Labor, management, and capital must work together on the principle of service to all mankind, along lines of cooperation in a spirit of friendship, mutual sympathy, and support. It will not do in a democracy to rely merely on the powers of government and to demand brute force to control human unrest. That remedy may become a two-edged sword peculiarly dangerous to capital.

"The doctrine of arbitrary force should not be seriously entertained by thinking men after the lessons of this war. The world is entering into a new era in which humanity and righteousness should walk hand in hand in peace, protected by the powers of the people.

"Humane legislation to safeguard and advance the conditions of human labor should be encouraged in Congress, in State legislation, in municipalities. If labor should be found seeking employment for any reason the Government should not hesitate to expand its activities in road building, improving waterways, building water-power plants and auxiliary enterprises, and employ labor to the extent of absorbing unemployed labor, and protect labor from the forced and destructive competition arising from involuntary unemployment.

"Every productive activity in America should be kept employed, and concrete steps taken to accomplish it. This is the most direct path to overcome the high cost of living.

"There should be put on a campaign in the United States by moving pictures and on the forum, in the press, and in the pulpit to teach men the dignity and need for honest labor and production and the shame of waste, the dishonor of willful extravagance, and the discredit of the vain ostentation of wealth, so that people will come back to the virtues of our fathers and our mothers who regarded labor as honorable and waste as a sin. The enormous disproportion of wealth distribution in America has led to false standards of extravagance and ostentation, going far beyond the reasonable bounds of mere luxury.

"Men who create the values sufficient to sustain it are entitled to luxury, if they choose to have it, and it is a wise policy for the world to encourage acquisition and hold out the rewards of property and the protection of property for those who serve the world by creating values. When acquisition passes far beyond the rewards that encourage effort, it may become a vice and need to be abated by suitable restraints.

EXCESS-PROFIT TAX.

"The excess-profit tax and some other governmental taxes add directly to the high cost of living, because the manufacturer adds his excess-profit tax onto the price of his product plus a manufacturer's profit on the excess tax. The broker passes it along and adds his profit on the excess tax. The wholesaler adds his profit on the excess tax, and the retailer adds his profit on the excess tax, and the poor consumer wonders what is the matter with the world that prices have risen a hundred and twenty-nine per cent since the war began. It is merely a matter of "let George do it," and "George," in the person of the Railway Brotherhood, comes in and demands the right to pass it on to the railroads, and the railroads pass it on to the freight rate and the passenger rate and let another "George"—the people—pay it. It is a vicious circle which can only be cured by human labor, conscientiously performed, by production, by economic distribution, by economy, but since the excess-profits tax is charged on the consumer, it should be repealed, and the war taxes instead of being collected to liquidate the principal of the war debt in a few years should be extended over 50 years. Every governmental waste and extravagance and employment of unproductive labor falls on the consumer and adds to his high cost of living. Therefore, the Government should be economically administered, a fixed amount set apart in a budget beyond which the expenditures should not be permitted to go. A householder who turns his checkbook over to his children need not be surprised if his expenditures exceed his income where there is no check on improvidence. The Government's expenditures should be subjected to a constant supervisory audit, expressly charged with the elimination of waste.

"In lieu of the excess-profits tax a progressive inheritance tax should be employed, first, to meet the cost of Government, and, second, to prevent by inheritance excessive commercial and financial power passing into the hands of a single individual to the injury of his fellow men.

PRIVATE MONOPOLIES.

"One of the most important elements entering into the high cost of living are the private monopolies which have established control over various industries dealing with the necessaries of life. The danger to the public of unrestrained private monopolies has long been recognized, and decades ago an act of Congress was passed to prevent market domination and arbitrary prices by the Sherman antitrust law. The effect of this act was nullified by administrative neglect and failure of public opinion in part. It was never really enforced, and finally the Supreme Court nullified it by holding that Congress only intended to forbid restraints of trade which were "unreasonable." Since there was no standard of what constituted a "reasonable" restraint of trade, this law is now but little more than a smoke screen behind which private monopolies may exercise their powers without restraint of law. It should be frankly repealed and better laws substituted.

"Bankers are not permitted to charge over 6 per cent under the law, some States permitting by contract a higher rate. The banker renders the highest character of service, and yet, with the approval of all of the world, he is limited in his profits. I remind you gentlemen of the banking profession that the value of your private fortunes has been cut in two by the high cost of living, and that if you were worth a hundred thousand dollars before the war that hundred thousand dollars is only worth to-day what fifty thousand was then, so that you are as much concerned in improving the purchasing power of your dollar as any other citizen. Even if you have a private monopoly, it would be better for you that the dollars you receive in future should have an increased purchasing power, and it is to your interest to favor stability and commercial justice.

"Many of the monopolies prevent production, and by making the things desired by men somewhat scarce they get a higher price for it and a larger percentage of profit. They would rather make a hundred per cent on a fixed output than 25 per cent on four times that output. They control the trade and therefore competitors do not enter the field, and, I might add, dare not. This policy of diminished production and high percentage of profit is one of the most harmful forms of monopoly abuse. The southern cotton growers were urged to cut down the production of cotton because 11,000,000 bales are worth more than 15,000,000 bales in a cotton crop. There is no danger whatever of the farmers profiting by monopoly. They are too numerous, and adequate cooperation, therefore, is impossible to prevent the working of the broad law of competition.

"If the high cost of living is to be controlled, the monopolies and interstate commodities will need to be restrained by suitable administrative mechanism authorized to require standard reports and the limitation of profits to a point that is 'reasonable.'

"It will be far better for American monopolies to expand production and limit percentage of profit and lower the cost of living and increase the purchasing power of their own earnings and capital. Four times the production at 25 per cent profit is better than one production at 100 per cent profit. We must compete in the world markets, and lower cost is essential to do this. If the prices are not lowered, foreign countries will take foreign commerce and invade American markets and be welcomed by American consumers. American business men should have some vision and foresight.

"Under the high cost of living labor has become more and more discontented. Unions are being organized to include every governmental agency, even the fire department, the police, and the municipal, State, and Federal employees, and they make demands upon the representatives of the people which are not always consistent with the public interest, or the interest of the great majority of the people. The average farmer does not begin to receive as much as a worker in the steel mills or on the railways. The railway workers would like the farmer to receive less for his products, if necessary, to reduce the cost of his living. The interest of one class conflicts with another. But when groups representing special interests combine to coerce the Government it should be possible for the Representative to defend himself before the electorate, and his critics should have the right to show his alleged unfitness with a 'publicity pamphlet,' printed and distributed, at public expense, to every voter.

"All democracies are about to be compelled to take their choice between the rule of the majority and the rule of the minority. The rule of the minority in Germany led to war. In Russia it has led to chaos. In the one case it was the rule of a minority representing the apotheosis of wealth and dynastic pride. In Russia now it represents the exact reverse. In both cases it represents a gigantic example of dangerous instability of government.

"The middle course of honest majority rule carries out the fundamental conception of our fathers in establishing government in America where the sovereignty was vested in the people and not vested in the few, whether dynastic military leaders, whether a few great financial and commercial captains, or the desperate Bolsheviki.

"The overwhelming majority of men and women in America believe in God, in morality, in religion, in ethical conduct, in conscience, in justice, in mercy.

"The overwhelming majority desire to acquire and protect property rights, and are willing to labor for it, and will support property rights. Stability in government requires the development, the perfection, the maintenance of the government of the majority, giving the people the right to initiate any law they want, to veto any law they do not want by referendum. The 'right of recall,' to recall any official who in public opinion has ceased to be desirable as a representative of the people. The laws should provide a short ballot, so that the people can function in choosing a small number whose records they may have time to study, and so that the people are not confused by the machine politician who would put up a long list of candidates for the very purpose of confusing the people and compelling them to rely on the machine men to nominate 'the ticket.'

"The laws should provide the preferential ballot, which automatically coheres the majority and automatically defeats the machine politicians who are always in a minority, except when by actual intent or by accident they do right.

"The law should provide a thorough-going corrupt-practices prevention act to safeguard the majority against the corruption and fraud of the minority. These processes will give stability in government and in commercial and financial life. They will give intelligence to government, calling the very best men to the public service; will accomplish through the wisdom of the people the development and protection of human life; will abate the high cost of living and make America what it ought to be, the leader in the highest ideals of government, of industry, of finance, and of human happiness."

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present and desire to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Herald relative to that portion of the treaty which has reference to the voting power of nations.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHEN INDIA VOTES.

One of Great Britain's six votes in the pending league of nations is assigned to India. To thus qualify for independent league membership India must be a "fully self-governing colony," under the language of the league covenant itself. By what stretch of the imagination can any candid analyst assign India to any such status? True there is a certain freedom in administrative matters allowed to native chiefs. But "the supreme government can exercise any degree of control it may wish," says the Statesman's Yearbook. This supreme government is exclusively and omnipotently British. The secretary of state for India, a Briton, selects a council, of Britons. The expenditure of the revenues of India, both in India and elsewhere, is subject to this council. "In dealing with questions affecting the relations of the Government with foreign powers," says the Statesman's Yearbook, "and in making peace and war and in prescribing the policy of the Government toward native States and in matters of internal policy, the secretary of state may act on his own authority." The Emperor of India is the King of England. The supreme executive authority in India is vested in a British viceroy, appointed by the British Crown. That India is not fully self-governing, either as required by the league covenant in order to justify independent league membership, or even as in other British dominions like Canada, etc., is apparent on the face of things. The great Indian poet, Sir Rabindranath Tagore, has just handed back the knighthood bestowed upon him by the British Government as a protest, according to the Literary Digest, "against British floggings of Hindu rioters." Such things do not happen in "fully self-governing colonies." In other words, the pretense upon which India is given an independent league vote is ridiculous upon its face.

We are not making this point because we have the slightest desire for American interference in England's method of governing India. That is her business, not ours. Neither are we making it because we would fan flames of anti-British prejudice—a thing inimical to the peace of the world, because the world has no greater guaranty of peace than in Anglo-American amity. We are making the point because of its potent bearing upon the structure of the proposed league of nations and our prospective relationship to this new international fraternity.

There may prove to be some elements of independent self-decision in league votes which may be cast by other British dominions like Canada, etc.; but a league vote for India is absolutely and completely a second league vote for England—absolutely and exclusively under British control. When other British Colonies signed the preliminary covenant they signed through native statesmen. When India signed she signed through "The Right Honorable Edwin Montagu, member of the British Parliament, and the King's secretary of state for India." Montagu spoke and acted for India. The Maharajah of Bikaner, who signed below Montagu, was only a rubber-stamp, because these native princes are specifically barred from peace-making authority. The Maharajah had no more chance to think or act for himself than did our own venerable Henry White and our own accommodating Robert Lansing and Gen. Bliss. England signed for India, and by the same token England will vote for India whenever a league referendum is to be taken.

So far as "fully self-governing" prerogatives are concerned, India would be even less free to think and speak for herself than would the Philippine Islands if they, too, had a league vote. She would not begin to be as free a moral agent as would the State of Michigan if Michigan had a league vote.

It is too late to correct this glaring discrepancy without reopening the whole Versailles negotiations. But it is not too late to render the discrepancy innocuous. Humiliating to us though such a discrepancy is, the Herald is not afraid of its practical menace in practical net results provided the Senate of the United States, by effective American reservations, prohibits illegitimate league interference in matters of vital American self-determination and vital American domestic policies, and proscribes the use of this British preponderance against the United States in American concerns which must be left exclusively within American jurisdiction. But the more study the country gives to this whole undertaking the more determined will become the conviction that these effective American reservations must precede our ratification of this unequal bargain.

Nor need any of us seriously fear that Britain is going to object to these American reservations—and that by adopting reservations we shall disrupt the whole adventure—when we see to what extremes the Paris council went in protecting Britain's every whim and wish and aspiration. The last limit of these "extremes" is the acknowledgment that India is a "fully self-governing colony" and that India is therefore entitled to one full vote (equaling ours in assembly arithmetic) and is eligible even to a place upon the league's council of nine. If we shut our eyes to this anomaly and take the covenant without textual amendments, Britain (satisfied and chuckling) will not object to American reservations, which merely protect the things which are American. And if, perchance, she should, it is her responsibility and not ours for disrupting this league undertaking. The United States, at least, is still "fully self-governing"; and we do not yet owe any obligation to any sovereignty other than our own.

PROMOTION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, on yesterday Senate resolution No. 203, heretofore submitted by me, went over without prejudice. I ask that it be taken up at this time for consideration by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 203), as follows:

Whereas the Department of Commerce and certain other governmental agencies in various departments and independent establishments, including the Consular Service and office of the Foreign Trade Adviser of the State Department, the War Finance Corporation, the Federal Reserve Board, and International High Commission in the Treasury Department, the Bureau of Markets of the Department of Agriculture, the Federal Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the United States Railroad Administration, the United States Shipping Board, and, perhaps, other agencies in other departments or establishments of the Government are, in the exercise of their lawful functions, engaged with matters having to do, either directly or indirectly, with the foreign commerce of the United States, but oftentimes work independently of each other, and each without a knowledge of what any of the others may be doing in this direction; and

Whereas, in order to foster, promote, and develop the foreign commerce of the United States in the most effective manner, so as to meet successfully the competition of foreign agencies, it is essential that there should be no unnecessary work or duplication of work on the part of the aforesaid agencies of the Government and that coordination and cooperation so essential to the successful promotion of the foreign commerce of the United States; and

Whereas it is desired by the Senate to consider the expediency of enacting legislation to provide for such coordination and cooperation of agencies: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the heads of the several departments and establishments hereinbefore referred to be, and they hereby are, requested to submit to the Senate as promptly as possible detailed statements covering the character, amount, and estimated cost to the Government of such work as is now being carried on under their respective jurisdictions which, directly or indirectly, has any relation to the foreign commerce of the United States or which may in any way be of value in connection with the promotion and development of such foreign commerce, which statements should also indicate the number of employees engaged on such work, and also to submit with such statements such suggestions and recommendations as they may be able to make looking to the closer cooperation and coordination of the various agencies of the Government for effective promotion of the foreign commerce of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 8624, which is known as the food-control bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 8624.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8624) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' approved August 10, 1917."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the report read. I have not had time to go over it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, and read as follows:

"The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8624) entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917,' having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

"That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, and agree to the same.

"Amendment numbered 1. That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: 'section 1'; and on page 1, after line 2, of the engrossed bill insert the following:

"'That this act may be cited as "the food control and the District of Columbia rents act."

"'TITLE I. FOOD-CONTROL ACT AND AMENDMENTS.'

"And the Senate agree to the same.

"Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"'TITLE II. DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA RENTS.

"'SEC. 101. When used in this title, unless the context indicates otherwise—

"'The term "rental property" means any land or building or part thereof in the District of Columbia rented or hired and the service agreed or required by law or by determination of the commission to be furnished in connection therewith; but does not include an hotel or apartment.

"'The term "person" includes an individual, partnership, association, or corporation.

"'The term "hotel" or "apartment" means any hotel or apartment or part thereof, in the District of Columbia, rented or hired and the land and outbuildings appurtenant thereto, and the service agreed or required by law or by determination of the commission to be furnished in connection therewith.

"'The term "owner" includes a lessor or sublessor, or other person entitled to receive rent or charges for the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel or apartment, or any interest therein, or his agent.

"'The term "tenant" includes a subtenant, lessee, sublessee or other person, not the owner, entitled to the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel or apartment.

"'The term "service" includes the furnishing of light, heat, water, telephone or elevator service, furniture, furnishings, window shades, screens, awnings, storage, kitchen, bath and laundry facilities and privileges, maid service, janitor service, removal of refuse, making all repairs suited to the type of building or necessitated by ordinary wear and tear, and any other privilege or service connected with the use or occupancy of any rental property, apartment or hotel.

"'The term "commission" means the rent commission of the District of Columbia.

"'SEC. 102. A commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the rent commission of the District of Columbia, which shall be composed of three commissioners, none of whom shall be directly or indirectly engaged in, or in any manner interested in or connected with, the real estate or renting business in the District of Columbia. The commissioners shall be appoind by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The term of each commissioner shall be three years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he succeeds. The commission shall at the time of its organization and annually thereafter elect a chairman from its own membership. The commission may make such regulations as may be necessary to carry this title into effect.

"'All powers and duties of the commission may be exercised by a majority of its members. A vacancy in the commission shall not impair the right of the remaining commissioners to exercise all the powers of the commission. The commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed.'"

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in relation to the changes in section 102, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee of what they really consist? I have not had time to compare the conference report with the bill as passed, but from a hurried examination of the report it seems to me that the only difference is that under the conference report the proposed commission is to be appointed by the President from anywhere in the United States instead of from the District of Columbia exclusively.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that that is correct. One other change is made, namely, instead of making the term of office of the commissioners two years and providing that the law shall continue in effect for four years, it provides that the term of office shall be three years and that the law shall remain in force for only three years. The Senator, however, is correct in his understanding of section 102, so far as it relates to the changes made.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, the life of the act is decreased from four years to three years and the appointment of commissioners outside of the District of Columbia is allowed?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; that is correct.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the conference report, and read as follows:

"'SEC. 103. Each commissioner shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year, payable monthly. The commission shall appoint a secretary, who shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year, payable in like manner; and, subject to the provisions of the civil-service laws, it may appoint and remove such officers, employees, and agents and make such expenditures for rent, printing, telegrams, telephone, law books, books of reference, periodicals, furniture, stationery, office equipment, and other supplies and expenses as may be necessary to the administration of this title. All of the expenditures of the commission shall, upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the commission, be audited and paid in the same manner as other expenditures for the District of Columbia.

"'With the exception of the secretary, all employees of the commission shall be appointed from lists of eligibles supplied by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the civil-service law.

"'SEC. 104. The assessor of the District of Columbia shall serve ex officio as an advisory assistant to the commission, but he shall have none of the powers or duties of a commissioner. He shall attend the meetings and hearings of the commission. Every officer or employee of the United States or of the District of Columbia, whenever requested by the commission, shall supply to the commission any data or information pertaining to the administration of this title which may be contained in the records of his office. The assessor shall receive for the performance of the duties required by this section a salary of $1,000 per annum, payable monthly, in addition to such other salary as may be prescribed for his office by law.'"

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in relation to the latter part of section 104, did the original bill grant to the assessor an additional salary of $1,000 per annum?

Mr. GRONNA. No; it granted him $2,000 in addition to the salary received by him for his services as assessor. The conferees reduced that to $1,000; they cut it in two.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know what the assessor is receiving now under the law?

Mr. GRONNA. The assessor now receives $3,500. This would give him $4,500.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that $3,500 is sufficient; but I am not going to object on that account.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator in charge of the conference report. I note that there is a requirement in this provision that the assessor shall attend "the meetings and hearings of the commission." I wonder if consideration was given in connection with this provision to the existing duties of the assessor and whether, if this provision be strictly enforced and observed, it will not very materially interfere with the discharge of his duties as assessor. My idea is that if this commission performs the functions for which it is created it will be in session practically all the time, and if the assessor is required to be in attendance on all meetings and hearings of the commission he will be totally unable to perform the duties of the office of assessor.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator, in reply to his question, that the conferees made an inquiry into the condition which the Senator has suggested, and the information received by the conferees was to the effect that it would be possible for the assessor to give sufficient time to meet with the commission at any time that it was absolutely necessary to have him present; and when I say——

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not making an objection to the provision for the purpose of resisting the conference report; but I think that the clause preceding the one which I have last mentioned—namely, that "the assessor of the District shall serve ex officio as an advisory assistant to the commission"—would meet all the requirements, and that the statement just made by the Senator that it is expected that he will be able to attend whenever it is absolutely necessary shows that this provision can not be strictly enforced or observed. This provision requires him to attend all the meetings and all the hearings of the commission, and nobody expects him to do that.

Mr. SMOOT. It is mandatory.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is a mandatory provision, although I have not discovered that any penalty is attached. It seems to me that it would have been much better to have said, "Whenever in the opinion of the commission it is necessary or desirable that the assessor do so," rather than make it mandatory upon him to be present all the while.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that that question was gone into very thoroughly, as the same suggestion that the Senator is now making was made to the conferees, but it was thought by the lawyers on the committee—and I will say that as to lawyers and laymen on the committee, we were on a fifty-fifty basis; that is, we were fortunate enough to have three lawyers and unfortunate enough to have three laymen—it was thought best to make it mandatory, so that the assessor could have no possible excuse for not attending whenever it was necessary for him to be present.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not intend to resist the conference report, but I think it would have been much better to have said that the assessor shall attend the meetings and hearings when necessary or when requested to do so by the commission, because this discussion has disclosed the fact that it is not expected that the provision will be literally complied with.

Mr. GRONNA. That is true; it might have been better, I will say to the Senator, to have provided as he suggests.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to add a word, of course, unless the Senator from Arkansas and other Senators are familiar with the facts I am going to state, I can understand what their position would be. I do not believe that this is going to require a great deal of the time of the assessor. I say that for this reason: The law provides for triennial valuations of property in the District; and I happen to know from my former connection with this legislation that the present assessor and his force have a complete survey of the various properties in the District, not only hotel properties and apartment houses, but private residences, which it was necessary for them to make in preparing their valuations for the purposes of taxation. So the presentation of these records and other data as the assessor's office have compiled them, and which are going to be necessary in order to fix rentals, is going to greatly simplify the work of the commission.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I think he has missed the point of my suggestion. My suggestion is that the assessor ought not to be required by law to be constantly in attendance upon the meetings and hearings of this commission, for the reason that his presence there will not be necessary at all times, and for the further reason that the requirement, if strictly complied with, will deprive him of the opportunity to perform his functions as assessor of the District.

I am not going to ask that the conference report be rejected with a view of modifying this provision; but I merely point out the fact that we are writing into the law a requirement as to this officer which he can not comply with unless he neglects his important duties. This commission will be in almost constant session, either holding meetings for the determination of questions before it or having hearings, and under a strict construction of this provision the assessor is required to be present all the time. The statement of the Senator from North Dakota and that of the Senator from Ohio are to the effect that as a matter of fact it will not be necessary for him to be present much of the time.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will say that the statement made by the Senator from Ohio is absolutely true. The committee also went into that phase of the matter, and it was disclosed that the assessor can give a great deal of his time to this particular work. It is not necessary, as the Senator from Ohio has stated, for the assessor to take much of his time in making the assessment, because he has all the maps, all the data, and he makes up his assessment rolls practically from the records in his own office. That matter was gone into very thoroughly. I will say that personally I was in favor of modifying it, but it was thought best to make it mandatory, and say that the assessor should be present whenever it was necessary to have him attend the hearings of the commission.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is exactly the view I take of it; and what I can not understand is, the Senator entertaining that view, and it being so clearly correct, why it was not written into the law instead of this requirement that he should be there all the time.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, it might give the assessor an excuse to say that it was impossible for him to be present. It is possible for the commission to treat him leniently, I think, and say that it is not necessary for him to be present at all hearings. I will say to the Senator that there is no penalty provided in this bill in case the assessor does not attend. He is not penalized in any way.

Mr. McCORMICK and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have wondered whether, under existing law, this additional $1,000 per annum can be paid. We have a statute which positively prohibits any employee of the Government who is receiving as much as $2,000 per annum from receiving an additional salary from the Government of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will yield to me, I do not think there is any difficulty at all about that, because this is subsequent law. This, being the most recent enactment, if it passes, will modify the act to which the Senator from Utah refers.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think the Senator is right.

Mr. GRONNA. It is provided for in the act.

Mr. SMOOT. But I wanted to call attention to the fact that it is a very bad thing to have any employee of the Government drawing two salaries. We are now paying the assessor for all of his time. The work for which we are paying him $3,500 each year is supposed to require his whole time, and I have no doubt that when he applied before the Appropriations Committee for a raise in salary the plea was that the work had piled up on him so greatly of late that it required overtime in order to accomplish it. I am not going to ask to have the conference report rejected upon this account; but I hate to see the Senate of the United States begin now to establish here a precedent of paying two salaries to one employee of the Government, one salary from one department and another salary from another department.

Mr. GRONNA. But I am sure the Senator from Utah realizes that this legislation will continue only for a period of three years. It is not permanent legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. But it is a precedent, all the same.

Mr. GRONNA. And it also adds to the burdens and to the work of the assessor. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SMOOT. If he gives his time to this commission, he can not give it to his office as assessor. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that it does not take all of his time.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am perfectly aware of that.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GRONNA. I do.

Mr. McCORMICK. I was going to ask the Senators who have engaged in this interesting colloquy, inaudible to the other Senators, if they would be good enough to repeat what they have said, so that we may form some judgment of the debate. I have no doubt the Senators on the center aisle "acquire merit" by propinquity to the seniors who have secured those positions by long service and distinguished service; but there are others of us who would occasionally like to be informed as to why public moneys should be expended or conserved. I have no doubt that the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Utah and the Senator from North Dakota added very much to the sum of the information of the Senators who heard them, and to the sum of the information of Senators who may read the RECORD after church on Sunday; but in the meantime I should like to know why I should vote two salaries or why I should not vote two salaries for one person. There are some of us in this Chamber who would like two salaries.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRONNA. Before I yield to the Senator from Arkansas, I simply want to say that I apologize to the Senator from Illinois for not speaking audibly.

Mr. McCORMICK. I did not ask for an apology. I asked for a repetition of the colloquy, in order that we may know what has been said.

Mr. GRONNA. As far as I am concerned, I have said very little, and it would be a very easy matter to repeat what I said.

Mr. McCORMICK. If Senators will rise, then, and repeat seriatim what they said, we will not ask in this corner that they repeat verbatim the colloquy.

Mr. GRONNA. I observe that the Senator is about ready to leave the Chamber.

Mr. McCORMICK. No, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I feel more like apologizing to the Senate for having made once the inconsequential remarks that I have made, and of course I have no intention of repeating them. I always speak in the Senate so that anyone who is not deaf may hear me if he desires to do so, but I can not say that it would have added very materially to the intelligence of the Senator from Illinois if he had been listening and heard what I said.

Mr. McCORMICK. It might not have added to the sum of my intelligence, but it might have added to the sum of my information if I could have heard what was said—I sat here, listening—when the three Senators conducted the debate sotto voce, in whispers, which I presume will appear to-morrow in the RECORD.

Mr. GRONNA. As I understand, there is no objection to these sections, and I believe it is best to proceed.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the conference committee a question about this report. I was not in the Senate when the bill was passed. I was attending the meeting of a committee. Does this bill propose to fix all rentals in the District of Columbia; and if so, for how long?

Mr. GRONNA. As long as this law is in effect.

Mr. KELLOGG. Permanently?

Mr. GRONNA. Well, I do not know. It would be fixed permanently unless upon complaint by either the tenant or the owner of the property, if there be reason for complaint——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator? I think the Senator from North Dakota did not understand the inquiry. The law expires by its limitation in three years.

Mr. GRONNA. I said, as long as the law is in effect. The bill provides, as the Senator from Nebraska has said, that it shall expire at the end of three years, unless sooner repealed by Congress.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall not vote for any conference report which authorizes the fixation of rentals in Washington for three years. We need more individual enterprise and initiative in the business of this country and less Government interference, and if we fix prices on commodities in the District of Columbia and throughout the country, we will entirely discourage individual enterprise which is absolutely essential in our development. The principle is uneconomic and wrong.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I think I did not make myself plain. It is not necessary for the commission to fix a price where no complaint is made. If the tenant and the owner of the property are both satisfied, the condition, if this bill becomes a law, will be exactly what it is to-day; but this bill does provide that where the owner of the property takes advantage of these hundreds of thousands of people who must necessarily be here if we are going to carry on the business of the Government, if exorbitant prices are being asked from those people, then they have the right to appeal to this commission and the commission has the authority to fix a reasonable rent.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I know of no governmental commission that will decline to function if it possesses the power. They always exert their power to the fullest extent and sometimes intermeddle in matters without their jurisdiction.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suppose the Senator is fairly familiar with conditions in the District of Columbia relating to rentals during the period of the war?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to ask the Senator a question, with his permission.

Mr. KELLOGG. What is the question?

Mr. ROBINSON. It is this: In view of those conditions, does the Senator think that no legislation upon this subject is necessary?

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, the war is over for all practical purposes. During the two years of the war it may have been necessary that Congress should temporarily provide means of housing the thousands of employees that were brought here who were necessary to the prosecution of the war; but, instead of confining our efforts to that object, we passed the Saulsbury law. A more absurd statute was never put on the statute books. In the majority of cases it operated unjustly and failed to accomplish the results intended by the Congress. Hostilities ceased a year ago; thousands upon thousands have left the city, and more ought to leave it; and we now propose to initiate a system of price fixing in the District which will have an ultimate effect on the entire country.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? I have profound respect for the Senator's judgment as a lawyer. I know of him and know of his work. As I said a moment ago, there were, unfortunately, three laymen on this conference committee, but fortunately three lawyers. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota if, in his opinion, Congress has no constitutional right to fix rents for the employees of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia even in times of peace?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not a constitutional lawyer to commence with, but just an ordinary country lawyer. Undoubtedly, in time of war, when necessity exists to provide for an extraordinary number of people here, Congress has the power to insure their subsistence and residence, even to the extent of condemning private property. But that Congress in time of peace can fix the prices generally throughout the country I have very grave doubt.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator on that point; but my inquiry of the Senator was, Does he not believe that Congress has authority, even in time of peace, and that it has not only authority but that it is the duty of Congress to provide for the people who necessarily must live here in order to do their work?

Mr. KELLOGG. It resolves itself into a question of the necessity for their continued residence in the District. The consensus of opinion seems to be that the efficiency of the departments of the Government would be increased if the great mass of employees is reduced to a reasonable number. If it is shown that actual necessity exists for employment by the Government of more people than the housing facilities of the District will accommodate, then I assume that the Congress has the power to provide for them.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the committee who has the conference report in charge. It occurs to me that the bill is wrong in principle, because the high rents in the District of Columbia are due entirely to the fact that there are more people than there are houses. I can not conceive of a measure better calculated to deter owners from erecting houses than the establishment of a commission to fix rents; and if that is true, this is the veriest temporary expedient, justified only on account of war conditions. But, as the Senator from Minnesota says, the war has been over for a year; people are leaving the District, the pressure is being reduced, and the number of employees will probably be reduced. It seems that we are resuming our normal life. Hence the peril in the bill is that it will deter men from building.

The question I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the report I do not find answered from a hasty glance through the pages of the bill. It is whether a man contemplating the erection of a structure can go to this commission and ascertain in advance what would be the return upon his investment?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I believe I will ask my colleagues on the committee, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] or the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who are both lawyers, to answer that question. I presume it is a legal question.

Mr. PHELAN. I suppose the power would have to be directly conferred. Is it directly conferred?

Mr. GRONNA. We deal with dwellings, apartments, and hotels. That is all the bill deals with. It deals with conditions as they are.

Mr. PHELAN. But suppose the Senator desired to erect an apartment house which involved the expenditure of a million dollars. If he had the expectation of a fair return, he might undertake to build such a structure. In the absence of it, he puts his entire investment in the hands of a commission, which might decide that he paid too much for the land, or that the labor conditions were such at that time that he would be unwarranted in collecting a return upon the cost. So, in subsequent years, he would be wholly at the mercy of the commission. If he understood those conditions, as a business man he would not construct the building. The element of speculation is in every enterprise, and he expects, when he puts up a building, to get a satisfactory return as soon as the building is completed. Must he then for the first time ascertain what his return is to be?

Mr. GRONNA. My opinion would be worth very little, I take it; but I will give the Senator my opinion. All through the bill the term "fair and reasonable rents" is used. It seems to me it would not be difficult for anyone who had the money and wanted to build an apartment house, or anything else, to take the plans to the commission, because plans and specifications must be made out anyway, and the commission, I believe, could very well afford to give an opinion as to what would be a reasonable rent, or what the commission would consider to be a reasonable rent. The Senator must not lose sight of the fact that if the rent fixed by the commission is deemed unreasonable, the owner of the property has the right to appeal to the courts. Does not the Senator believe that the courts would do justice to the party who invests his money in the building?

Mr. PHELAN. I am speaking of the state of mind of the party who has the money and wants to make the investment. The presumption is that he would not want to submit to the courts the question of a reasonable rent, because he goes into the enterprise very often with the best expectation of getting a very considerable return, say 10 per cent, and the courts are very fond of holding 5 and 6 per cent as reasonable. The Senator himself reported a provision here defining "intoxicating" and "nonintoxicating" in the food bill. He did not leave that to the judgment of the court but provided that nonintoxicating beverages consist of those that contain not more than one-half of 1 per cent alcohol. Why should not an attempt be made to determine what is reasonable here, so that a man might know in advance what he might expect from such a commission as is here set up?

Mr. GRONNA. I believe such a bill was reported, and I think the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was the one who had the pleasure of making that report. I will say to the Senator from California that I would be glad to have made it, but I did not make it. I approve of everything that was in that report.

Mr. PHELAN. Then the Senator approves of the principle of deciding what "nonintoxicating" means in the one case and "reasonable rent" means in the other?

Mr. GRONNA. Does the Senator from California believe that the Congress of the United States should fix these rents? Does he believe that we should define here what is a reasonable rent?

Mr. PHELAN. I stated that I believe this bill is wrong in principle and that the Congress of the United States should not meddle in a matter of this kind except as a war emergency; that the war is past and we should resume normal life, which would mean the construction of new buildings in the District of Columbia, thus benefiting the people of the District of Columbia, and what is a fair rent would be ultimately determined by the law of supply and demand. The landlords in emergencies get excessive rent. This should be curbed. In normal times, however, for the most part, with the deterioration of residence property, they are poorly recompensed. The Government should raise pay or provide dwellings and leave private enterprise unhampered in time of peace.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me say to the Senator from California in all seriousness that if he will read the testimony presented not only to the Committee on the District of Columbia but to other committees, he will find a condition such as has been pictured by some of the witnesses, and that are appalling, when it is found how the poor working girls who come here to work in these departments are compelled, on account of expenses, to huddle together like a bunch of sheep in insanitary conditions.

I will say to the Senator that this bill is to prohibit the practice of charging exorbitant rents and also to prohibit the practice which has grown up in the District of Columbia of profiteering in subletting rental properties at not only 100 per cent or 500 per cent, but in some instances at 1,000 per cent. The owners of the property who are doing an honest business are not complaining against the bill so far as I know. I have talked to some of them, and they have said to me that they believe it is a good measure. They do not wish to be classed with the profiteers who, for the last two years, or since the war commenced, have engaged in these practices. The testimony shows that some of the apartment leases have been made at a reasonable price, but there has been collusion between the parties who sublet the apartments and the owner of the property; and where in the first instance the property was leased at a fair rental of, say, $75 a month, $150 or $200 worth of furniture would be put into the rooms, and those very rooms sublet for five or six hundred dollars a month.

The Senator must admit that it is our duty to do something for the people who are here working for the Government of the United States. War or no war, I maintain that it is the duty of Congress to protect these people.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am asked a question by the Senator. I am perfectly familiar with the testimony and I sympathize entirely with the Senator in stigmatizing the practices of profiteers during the war as being unjustifiable, if not worse. I am proposing a remedy for these very conditions, but a permanent remedy, by permitting men, unhampered, to improve property in the District. I greatly fear that a restriction of this kind will deter them, and hence there will be no permanent remedy for these poor people. This being a conference report, I understand we can not amend it; we have either to accept it or reject it, but I should think the Senator might consent to a suggestion that the operation of the law be limited for a period not exceeding two years.

Mr. GRONNA. It is limited to three years, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. PHELAN. I did not know there was even a limitation of three years in the bill. That is a confession, therefore, on the part of the committee of the correctness of my contention, that it can not be regarded in any sense but as the veriest temporary expedient.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota why it is that the useless employees in these departments are not let out, so that they may go to some other part of the country and do something that is useful? In an investigation that was started a long time ago it was found that a large number of employees were engaged in perfectly useless work, and it has manifestly been worse during the war. For instance, in the Treasury Department some 25 or 30 employees were copying decisions into a book that never in the history of the Government had been opened. Such things as that are going on all the time, but it was a great deal worse during the war. A number of clerks and stenographers told me that they had nothing to do but sit around, perhaps take one letter a day or attend to the office. If we go at it and make a careful investigation of these departments, weed out the useless employees, and see that the rest do their work as they ought, the Government will not have any surplus here to take care of.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am surprised that the Senator from Minnesota, with his legal training and logical mind, should offer the objection he has offered to this conference report, that because there are, as he claims—and for the sake of the argument I am going to admit it, as I think there is a great deal in what he says—a great many employees in the Government who are useless and who ought to be discharged, therefore this kind of legislation ought not to be put on the statute books.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say to the Senator, if he will permit me, that I did not offer that as an objection to the conference report. I am quite aware that it is not an objection.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to hear the Senator make that admission.

Mr. President, I think we are confronted with a serious situation, and we have been confronted with a serious situation in Washington ever since the beginning of the war, and for some time before, really a serious situation in times of peace. It seems to me it is a fundamental proposition which no man can dispute that the Government of the United States owes it to itself and its employees that they should be properly protected in the place where they must live and work in order to carry on the governmental functions. When the Constitution was adopted I think the framers of that great instrument had that point in view, because they provided for a place that should be under the jurisdiction exclusively of the United States.

It is a well-recognized fact that for two or three years in this District there have been conditions existing that were simply appalling, making it almost impossible for employees of the Government to even live. I know it can be said that they can go somewhere else; and that might be true, and that somebody could come and work for a dollar a year, who had a million-dollar-a-year income, and run the Government. That is one idea, and that would be one way to do it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. But that would drive out of the employment of the Government all the men and women who are depending upon their salaries for a living. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may be permitted to make a suggestion, the rental year in the District begins October 1. I share the view of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] that there are a lot of supernumerary clerks who ought not to be in the departments here.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with that also.

Mr. POMERENE. But there are a lot of them who are very essential to the Government service; and there are a lot of other people who are employed in stores.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. POMERENE. If there is not to be any relief granted, all these people will be the victims of the rapacity of a lot of landlords.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is true.

Mr. POMERENE. I think, from information I have, that probably four out of five have been notified that there would be a very substantial increase in their rental beginning October 1, and they were politely advised to move out, or given one excuse after another in order to dispossess them in spite of the Saulsbury law or any other law that may be on the statute books.

I share the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] that we would be very derelict in our duty if we did not do something for the relief of the people in the District at this particular time.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for his observation. He has called attention to one point that I wish to emphasize. We must not only protect the Government employees but we must protect the other people who are in business here and who must be in business here or the Government employees could not live.

Now, Mr. President, we have a conference report here which under ordinary conditions I would not offer. I suppose if I had been told 10 years ago that the time would come when I would support a proposition of this kind I would have hooted at the statement; but, in my judgment, it is the very necessity of the case that makes it obligatory upon us to do something. It may not be right. I know that men's judgment will differ, when they are all equally honest, but to bring about some remedy the Senate and the House ever since the beginning of the war have been striving to do something. We passed the Saulsbury resolution. I think it can be safely said that it was not satisfactory to anyone in Congress, and yet almost everyone supported it, because we realized that we were confronted with a condition in which we had to take some definite means in order to even permit the Government to continue to function.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest to the Senator that it was intended really as a temporary provision, until we could enact legislation to meet the situation more fully.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly, until we could enact other legislation. Next came the bill that was offered as an amendment to the food-control bill that was reported out by the District of Columbia Committee. It went to the House and from the House into conference and the conferees redrafted the bill. It is limited by its terms to three years. It goes out of existence in three years from now unless Congress extends it, and, of course, Congress may repeal it before that time, so that all its provisions are ended in three years.

In my judgment, that limitation ought not to be placed upon it, but I am not going to argue that. I think we could well let it stay on the statute books until Congress found it advisable to repeal it or change it. I believe we will find that for much longer than three years we will have to have some legislation protecting the people of the District.

The bill provides for a commission of three men drawing a salary of $5,000 each. In brief, it is the duty of the commission to fix the rents. They fix the rents upon complaint. They can also fix them upon their own initiative. When they fix the rents they are instructed, of course, to fix them upon a fair and reasonable basis, and when they once fix them for a house or an apartment or any other building, the amount at which they fix the rents remains until changed by another order of the commission or by an order from the court to which the case may have been appealed. There may be a better way to handle it. I am sure if there is a better way, I would be glad to see it suggested and put into operation. But after all the discussion, and it has been honest and earnest, diligent, and prolonged, the conferees have agreed upon this kind of a measure. There are appeals allowed. There are one or two penalties in its provisions. Where the landlord appeals, for instance, from a decision of the commission and it has to go to the court, it is made the duty of the commission to defend the case in court and relieve the tenants, to protect the tenants, to supply the attorney and pay the expenses. I really believe that some such provision is necessary in order to prevent injustice from being brought about through a simple matter of delay. We have thought that we ought to permit an appeal to the courts so that the matter could be adjudicated and passed upon, but while it is pending the commission's order goes into effect. It applies to leases that have been made, it applies to houses and apartment houses, it applies to hotels.

Mr. President, in my humble judgment this measure will be effective and bring about justice if we have a good commission. I think any man who will read the proposed law will realize at once that whether it is good or bad will depend, more than any other one thing, upon the men who are named by the President as members of the commission.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I was not in the Chamber when the bill was under consideration and have had very little opportunity to examine it; in fact, I have not read it through. I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska upon what theory this legislation is justified. I see that it is an amendment to a bill which was passed during the war and which was based, as I recall, upon the war powers of the Federal Government. Does the Senator contend that the measure now is justified under the exercise of the war power or can he justify it upon some other power of the Federal Government?

Mr. NORRIS. I think probably the Senator was not in the Chamber when I was outlining what in my judgment is the justification.

Mr. KING. No; I was not.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe that it can be justified in time of peace as well as in time of war. I will read just one section of the bill, and then I will endeavor to answer his question.

Mr. KING. Just one question. Is it not rather incongruous, if it is passed as peace legislation, to attach it to a bill which is confessedly a war measure?

Mr. NORRIS. It is probably incongruous to attach it to the bill to which it is attached. I admit that it ought to have been a separate bill, but the Senator knows how legislation of that kind comes about. It is tacked on as an amendment to another bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator allow me to make a very brief statement, which will perhaps add some light to the situation?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I was sitting in my office some time ago when a conversation was reported to me, which I believe to be entirely authentic, that a member of the family of one of these landlords had said, in reference to the Saulsbury resolution, "Just wait until the Saulsbury resolution expires by limitation, and then we will make lots of money."

Mr. NORRIS. There is not any doubt but that that threat has been made thousands of times.

I will read one of the sections of the bill:

SEC. 122. That it is hereby declared that the provisions of this title—

The title, I will say to the Senator from Utah, refers to the rent proposition entirely—

It is hereby declared that the provisions of this title are made necessary by emergencies growing out of the war with the Imperial German Government, resulting in rental conditions in the District of Columbia dangerous to the public health and burdensome to public officers and employees whose duties require them to reside within the District and other persons whose activities are essential to the maintenance and comfort of such officers and employees, and thereby embarrassing the Federal Government in the transaction of the public business. It is also declared that this title shall be considered temporary legislation, and that it shall terminate on the expiration of three years from the date of the passage of this act, unless sooner repealed.

That is the reason given in the proposed law itself. Personally I think that we have a constitutional right to enact this kind of a law in time of peace for the very reason that it strikes at the very fundamental existence of the Government. If we had, let us say, a different Constitution and a board of aldermen in the city of Washington, over which Congress had no jurisdiction or control, they could make it impossible for Congress to remain in session, they could make it impossible for the Federal Government to exist. If a combination of men owning not all the property, not even a majority of the houses and apartments, should raise rents to such an amount as they could if they had complete control, they could absolutely make it impossible for the Government to function, and we would have to go out of business. Self-preservation is the first law of nature. I think we could apply it to other things besides rents, and I am not sure but what we will have to do so.

Mr. President, it has gotten so right now that if a Member of the Senate has a toothache he has to suffer with it; he can not go to a dentist and let him know who he is before he has his tooth pulled without putting up installments out of his salary for the next two or three months. He can not get sick, members of his family can not get sick, he can not live here unless he is healthy, or is able to go home, when something like that happens to him or members of his family, to be doctored or have his teeth pulled. It is a continual holdup all the time.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that the Government meddling in the coal business and appointing a coal commission actually raised the prices and decreased the production during the war? That is generally understood to be the fact.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no Senator here who is more opposed to the Government meddling in the ordinary affairs of life than I am, and I have entire sympathy with Senators who take that view. I am not going to argue the coal question or the other questions the Government went into. Every one of them has two sides. I supported in most cases the legislation that gave the Government power to do it. It seemed to me necessary. I am basing this legislation upon a different principle. It is for the preservation of the Government itself. It is to enable the Government to function; and I think the Government has absolute control in the District of Columbia to regulate by law any business, any industry, so long as it does not take private property for public use without compensation and so long as it does not confiscate private property. It owes it to itself and it owes it to the country to do that.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. And that authority is as unlimited as the authority of the State legislature would be in the State in which it functions.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir; and I think a great deal more so, perhaps. The State legislature, for instance, is handicapped to some extent even in the capital of the State, because it does not have supreme jurisdiction over it as Congress does over the District of Columbia. Here, however, there is not any such limitation; and that wide scope of authority was put into the Constitution for the purpose of meeting just the kind of a contingency that we have had to face.

Mr. President, personally I believe that there is nothing in the conference report that is unfair to any legitimate, honest industry or business, apartment house, hotel, or other rented properties. I am sure I would not want to do and I am sure the conference committee would not want to do anything unfair to such interests; but the conferees have felt, I think in answer to a conclusion reached by all people who have lived here and studied the situation, that some steps are necessary to be taken and to be taken now. Even though an armistice has been signed for nearly a year, the unfortunate conditions still exist and are with us to-day.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I am a member of the subcommittee which helped to frame the original bill. I desire to say that we labored for a long time on it and think we reported a very good measure. I wish, however, the section in reference to the renting situation in the District had been embodied in a separate bill.

I have heard a great deal said here about there being unnecessary employees of the Government. I do not know whether or not that is true; but, so far as I am individually concerned, I should be willing to join in an investigation with the object of dismissing any surplus employees of the Government and should favor such an investigation extending through the entire system of the Government. If it were found that there were unnecessary employees they should be sent home. That is the way I feel in reference to that matter.

The reason for framing the proposed rent legislation was this: As has been stated by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], Congress has jurisdiction over the District of Columbia; and it seemed to the committee that the only way we could obtain housing accommodations for people at any reasonable rate of rental at all was to enact the legislation proposed.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] speaks of regulating rents all over the country; but, of course, Congress has no constitutional right to do that; and our committee would not expect that to be done. Therefore, we never got to the point of considering such a proposition. I feel that it is wrong in principle for the Government to undertake to interfere with investments in property, but the circumstances existing in this District excuse the application of such a remedy in this case. It is not our intention to discourage people from investing in the District; on the contrary we desire to encourage them to build houses here; but upon investigation we found that providing a certain amount of profit from such investment, limiting it to a certain per cent, would be impracticable; that it would be very difficult to prejudge what would be a reasonable profit in any particular case; that there would have to be taken into account depreciation, vacancies, and considerations of that sort. We, therefore, concluded that it would be wise to leave the matter to a commission.

Personally I feel this way about it; that it is the business of Congress to pass some such legislation in order to protect the people whom we bring here to help carry on the affairs of this Government. We are compelled to have them here; and we either ought to pass legislation to protect them or we, perhaps, ought to do worse and have the Government go into the building business and erect homes here for the purpose of renting them to the employees of the Government.

I am just as much opposed as is any other Senator here to the Government engaging in any business. I have so stated heretofore. I want the Government to refrain from interfering in business so far as it can be kept out of it. I favor turning back the railroads and everything else in which the Government has been dabbling. I do not think it is a proper governmental function to engage in such matters; the Government should leave them to the people. It is absolutely necessary, however, for those connected with the Government to live here; we have clerks here to perform the duties which are incumbent upon them. Therefore we should see that they are not robbed here every day and every month in the year.

I do not ask the Government to protect me, though I have had a hard time; so hard that it came mighty near putting me into an insane asylum hunting for a home. At last I found one; bought it, paying cash for it, and received a deed; and now its occupants tell me that they will get out whenever they are put out by legal proceedings. That is the kind of a situation we are in here.

So I have come to this conclusion. We have discussed the legislation as now found in this conference report; we have considered it carefully; and I feel as I have said. I would go just as far as any man; I would back and buck and kick just as hard as anybody in the world against the Government going into business or interfering with private investment. I believe in encouraging the people, in letting them go to work and make money, and letting capital get a just return upon its investment, as well as labor getting a just return upon its service. We ought not to discourage, and I do not believe this bill will discourage, honest investment.

I therefore hope that the conference report will be agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and others that there is a serious situation now existing in the District of Columbia as affecting those who are compelled to rent property. It would be a very simple matter to relieve that serious situation; it could be done, and millions of dollars could be saved to the Government of the United States without interfering one particle with the work that is being accomplished in the District now. I say that relief will come before very long, and will be afforded by separating one-third of the employees in the District of Columbia from the Government service, which should be done.

Employees of the Government who visited my office this morning told me that within the last few days the head of a division in one of the departments called in all the employees of the division and told them that upon a certain day there would be an investigation made as to whether or not there were too many employees in the division; and he told all of the employees that on that particular day they were to be at their work, and if they had no work they were to create some. I am not going to give the name of the division head until I receive a letter from the employees who came to my office this morning who told me that story and swore that the statement was true, but I expect to get the letter in a day or two.

Mr. President, there is no doubt in the world that if we would dismiss one-third of the Government employees in the District of Columbia the work would be done just as well, and then we would find the owners of houses to rent hunting for tenants, and they would not dictate the rental, but the tenant would have something to say as to what he would pay. The whole situation would thus be entirely changed.

Mr. President, there are now 104,000 Government employees in the District of Columbia. One-third of them, or at least 35,000, might just as well go home and do some work other than what they are supposed to do for the Government. The statement which was made yesterday by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is absolutely correct. I know there are employees in the departments who do not do two hours of work in a day.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. I am in entire sympathy with the Senator's statement to the effect that there are more employees in the District of Columbia than there ought to be, but that is not going to give us the immediate relief which we need.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to oppose the adoption of the conference report, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I will give to the Senator, for what it is worth, a statement made to me this morning in my office by a former clerk who had in his charge a number of employees. They make out, as I understand, certain certificates or efficiency reports. One of the young ladies under him made out her report reciting the fact that she worked from 9 o'clock until 4.30 o'clock, and on the same day she wrote a letter to a friend that she did not have one hour's work a day.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to another condition existing here. The Government of the United States erected the buildings north of the Capitol, now called the Government hotels. We did not erect those buildings simply for the purpose of giving employment to people; we thought we were erecting them to serve a useful purpose; that they would be run in a business-like way, and would furnish rooms for Government employees at a reasonable price. Senators, do you know that the cost of administration of the Government hotels to which I refer, those just north of the Capitol, in the item of wages alone exceeds $108,864 a year?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. I will call attention now to some of the salaries, and I wish to inquire whether or not the Senate of the United States ever intended such salaries to be paid?

Miss James, the manager—and I have learned within the last day that her salary, beginning July 16, 1919, has been increased $500, including the maintenance she receives from the Government—has a salary amounting to $5,904, and with the $500 added it will amount to $6,404 a year. Why, Mr. President, we are paying assistant secretaries of the Treasury only $5,000 a year; we are paying the Commissioner of the Indian Bureau only $5,000 a year; we are paying the Commissioner of the General Land Office only $5,000 a year. Think of that! I find that Miss Davis, assistant manager of the Government hotels, is receiving $5,904 a year.

Mr. THOMAS. What is the $4 for.

Mr. SMOOT. That comes in through the maintenance charge. Miss Ryan, assistant and private secretary to Miss James, $2,464; Miss Stern, register, $2,184; the head bookkeeper, $4.500. Without any maintenance item, the head bookkeeper receives $4,500. Then there are four assistant bookkeepers at $2,304 each, and Miss McGregor, head of the office force, $2,100.

I might go on and recite further what the Government is called upon to pay for salaries in connection with this enterprise. I know that Congress never intended that such amounts should be paid when it undertook to erect these buildings to secure a place in which the employees needed by the Government might live.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Can the Senator tell us whether or not the dormitory buildings a little north of the Capitol are self-supporting?

Mr. SMOOT. They are not self-supporting.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. That, of course, is contrary to the colored statement that has been circulated by the Housing Bureau.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the Housing Bureau knows that the property referred to is not self-supporting, and we all know that it is not.

Mr. President, I say again to the Senate that we thought when the war closed the number of Government employees in the District of Columbia would be lessened, but we were mistaken. During the month preceding July 27 of this year there was an increase in the number of employees in the District of 1,119—no decrease, but an actual increase. This condition will not be changed unless Congress takes action to compel a change. I do not know whether it is worth while to go into this question further at this time, but I know that if the people of the United States understood how their money was being spent there would be a cry from one end of the country to the other that would compel Congress to act, and of which the heads of the divisions and the heads of bureaus would have to take notice.

Mr. President, so far as the conference report is concerned I am in hearty sympathy with any legislation that will tend to rectify the injustice that is being imposed upon the employees of the Government; but I think that it could be rectified, as I have said, by separating from the Government service 35,000 employees who have to be housed, the great majority of whom are complaining that their salaries are not high enough and should be increased. Let them go home and enter upon some other line of work which will accomplish more good than the work they are supposed to be doing for the Government in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have no excuse to make for the redundant pay roll referred to by the Senator from Utah. That, however, is not the question involved in this conference committee report. If there are more on the pay roll than the Government's needs require, the blame rests in this Chamber just as much as it does in the executive departments. I have uniformly, in the Appropriations Committee, tried to reduce these appropriations, and we have done so in some instances; but there is no general, hearty, sympathetic support for the cutting off of appropriations. The most lonesome task a man undertakes in this body is to reduce Government expenditures. It is unpopular. I do not so much blame the departmental officers. It is bad form to turn back a surplus from a fund furnished by Congress. They would lose standing in the fraternity. They would be open to have charges preferred against them. As long as congressional discretion sends to that department so many million dollars, we may expect it to be spent. Anyone is a trusting innocent that ought not to be allowed to go out without a traveling companion who thinks that a department will turn back, or has, as a rule, for 30 years ever turned back, a dollar that was furnished by a congressional appropriation whether it ought to be spent or not.

We wanted some help on the District of Columbia Committee here a month or six weeks ago, and we sent to the department whose employees are supposed to be experts on that subject, and they wanted to charge us a $10,000 bonus over and above the salaries of the persons employed, because they were short on appropriations, and they wanted to extract $10,000 from the Contingent Expense Committee of the Senate in order to piece out the appropriations. They were short, for some reason; I do not know why. They had spent all of their money, and they wanted to profiteer on the District of Columbia Committee to the extent of $10,000 for the information that they had. That is over and above the salaries of the paid employees of the Government sent to us to help in our investigation.

That is an extreme case, of course. That does not happen every day; but so long as we furnish the appropriations we may expect them to be spent. Often a healthy deficiency is brought in. The right place to begin this reform or criticism, however, is in the Appropriations Committee. We have the hatchet, and if we do not use it we ought not afterwards to be heard to complain.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is interesting to know whether or not the District Committee allowed this profiteering scheme to succeed.

Mr. SHERMAN. It did not. We went without the information, or got it ourselves. I think that does not usually happen, because in the case of many of the departments, when we asked for information, they gave it without a request for any bonus upon the knowledge conferred.

Mr. President, the question before this body is on the adoption of this conference report. When it comes to cutting off appropriations, there is one member of the Appropriations Committee who will go to the extreme limit. For anything that will not hamper the operations of the Government in the way of reducing appropriations there will be one vote in the committee, I am sure, and I am quite sure there will be others. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is very prompt to respond in matters of that kind.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] says the war is over. I was laboring under that hallucination myself for some months, but that is a mistake. The war is not over. Two regiments have been recruited to full strength and sent to Silesia very recently to engage in Poland's struggles with Germany. The armistice of November 11, 1918, and the subsequent negotiations have not ended the war at all. Men are being recruited for the Army to send to Siberia and to northern Russia. All over the country, when we get out in the Provinces, away from the center of Government and all information on these questions, we find notices asking for recruits, either for domestic or foreign service; and at every place in the States where these recruiting stations are located men of military age go in and volunteer their services to go to Siberia or to any designated point, and they are interrogated on that question at the time of enlistment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will walk down Pennsylvania Avenue, he will notice near the Center Market a brown khaki tent, the quarters of a recruiting station. Right in front of it he will notice a poster stating that men are being recruited for various terms of service, and on the bottom of the poster, in large scarlet letters, is the word "Europe."

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; that is correct. From my own congressional district a lieutenant who has been home on a furlough was notified on Tuesday of this week to report to his superior officer for service in Poland. That is repeated all over the country. I have a great deal of correspondence on that subject, and I have no doubt the Military Affairs Committee has much more than I have in proportion; but the war is not over. When it will be over nobody knows. When the 104,000 Government employees will be out of the District of Columbia nobody knows. Grant that one-third of them are entirely superfluous in the service; they are not to blame. They might resign and go home. Possibly they are not worked up to the limit. Few of them are. I am quite certain that out of the 104,000 many could be dispensed with, but at present they are here. Advertisements are still seen all over the country asking persons to come to Washington to go into the Government service.

There is no cessation of that and has not been all along. The prospects of further war in Europe are increasing with every move our Government makes.

Now, with the 104,000 employees in the District of Columbia, and most of them within the limits of what we call the city of Washington, some extraordinary conditions have resulted surrounding them. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] made the inquiry upon what basis this bill rests, and I might just as well submit what I think about that now as at any time. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] read from the bill itself. That, in part, explains the basis on which such legislation in the District rests, but there is a further foundation for the bill.

From time immemorial bakeries have been regulated, both in the sanitation of the bakery, in the size of the loaf, and in the conditions under which the loaf is delivered to the customer. For 300 or 350 years back these regulations are found in the legislation of the English-speaking race. The mills that reduce the edible grain to a form where it is fit for human food have been, for a like time immemorial, subject to regulation. The flour so milled goes into the loaf, and the two, both of them, are kindred subjects in the regulation.

Inns or taverns, as they were known in the early law, hotels, lodging houses, and apartments or apartment houses, of late years, fall within the same list. From a very ancient time inns or hotels have been regulated by Parliament and by the various State legislatures. That is well established. The different State authorities have litigated that fact; courts of last resort have decided it; and there is no well-considered case where the right of the State to regulate in such cases has been denied.

In addition to that, Mr. President, warehouses have been included. Before I leave inns or hotels let me say that it applies either to those that furnish lodging, to those that furnish either lodging or meals, or to those that furnish both. A hotel may be run upon various plans. An apartment house may be conducted on the plan of furnishing lodging and board, either or both, and they are in either case within the regulating provisions of the Congress or of the various State legislatures.

Warehouses have long been acknowledged to be within the regulating power of the States. To me it is a very singular thing that we can regulate the storage of a slaughtered steer in a cold-storage warehouse and that we can not regulate the lodging of a live human being. I do not think there is any respectable court in this country, State or Federal, that would not sustain the power to regulate the price charged in an apartment house or a rooming house. If we can regulate the storage of a dead animal I believe the power exists to regulate the lodging of a live human being. The police power is precisely the same.

For instance, in this District 104,000 employees of the Government are engaged in detailed Government work. Without the service of what appears to some to be the inconsequential, small employee of the Government, obtaining from $1,500 to $2,500 per annum, these departments could not operate. If the greater part of the 104,000 people in the somewhat or sometime humble employment of the Government were to leave Washington, the departmental operations could not be longer conducted. They are indispensable. Therefore, upon both grounds, whether it be upon the ground of the protection of these employees or upon the ancient common-law ground that we have the right, under the police power, to regulate lodging houses, inns, warehouses, railways, and other property impressed with a public use, the right is justified.

The bill declares in a subsequent section that property of the kind enumerated is impressed with a public interest, and that such public interest renders it subject to the police regulation of the Government. I will read from that section in a moment, as soon as I shall have found it.

Section 106 of the bill, set out on page 9, provides:

> For the purposes of this title it is declared that all (a) rental property and (b) apartments and hotels are affected with a public interest, and that all rents and charges therefor, all service in connection therewith, and all other terms and conditions of the use or occupancy thereof, shall be fair and reasonable; and any unreasonable or unfair provision of a lease or other contract for the use or occupancy of such rental property, apartment, or hotel with respect to such rents, charges, service, terms, or conditions is hereby declared to be contrary to public policy.

That is one basis upon which the bill rests. It is as wide a basis as the regulation of the charges of public warehouses or any of the other occupations of property impressed with a public interest.

Then, aside from that, is the reason referred to by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that Congress possesses the power inherently to provide that the 104,000 Government employees in the District shall be cared for, that conditions shall not prevail here that will make it impossible for the 104,000 employees to subsist, be lodged and permitted comfortably to live here while they are rendering the Government their service. When that 104,000 shall be reduced, if a third of them shall be cut off, if 35,000 of them be sent home, the commission then, finding conditions changed, can modify the provisions fixed under which property shall be rented. This continues for three years. It would cost only in the neighborhood of $150,000 for the whole three years. That is, as expenditures go now, a comparatively small sum of money for the benefit received.

There is another feature of it that to me, Mr. President, is quite a lively indication that the war is not over. That is the pressure brought upon the members not only of the conference committee from landlords, tenants, and subtenants, but the continual pressure brought upon the Committee on the District of Columbia. The complaints are multitudinous. They are made literally by the hundreds. There is a vast deal of unjust charging, the larger part of which is in the subleasing of property. I think there is more abuse in that respect than there is in overcharging by the owner of the property or his agent in making the original leases. The purposes of this bill reach every sort of evil. It all depends upon the persons who are appointed. The Senator from Nebraska is strictly accurate in that. But three good commissioners, with the help that will be given by the assessor of the District, who is thoroughly familiar with the values of real estate, will be enabled, in each individual case, to work out what is just.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the former Senator from Delaware [Mr. Saulsbury], myself, and others began this investigation more than two years ago last spring. No legislation resulted, owing to some unhappy differences that arose between the two Houses of Congress. But it is an old subject. The evil is apparent. The remedy is desired now fully as much as it was two years ago, if not more. Constant threats are made. My files are filled with letters on the subject and my offices have been filled with persons making complaints that their landlords have threatened to evict them because they took advantage of the Saulsbury Act. They assert that in the absence of the legislation provided in this bill they will not be allowed to remain in the property, even if they seek to remain on the same terms, with the same covenants in the leases, and paying the same rental. The landlords have notified them to move. I have in my possession a 30 days' notice, to take effect on the 30th day of November, to a tenant who has been occupying the property more than three years, paying the rents promptly in advance on the 1st day of each month, but who is notified now to vacate the property because the landlord wishes to rent it to somebody else. It is purely a capricious act of the landlord or it is malicious. It is one or the other. The property possibly ought to produce more rent, and if the rent commission, in its discretion, finds that there ought to be a 5 or a 10 per cent advance in the rent, they can so order. They are required by the terms of the bill, under those conditions, to give the existing tenant the priority of choice, so that he can pay the increased rent rather than be evicted. That is the practical suggestion in this bill—to preserve the rights of existing tenants, so that something like 50,000 or 60,000 people in Washington may not be set out upon the curbstone on the 1st day of November under these 30-day notices that have been served.

It is further the duty of the rent commission to defend its orders. It relieves the tenant from employing a lawyer and trying a lawsuit. If this were not done, the tenant in most instances would never try to assert his rights.

I have not the remotest doubt in my own mind about the validity of such legislation or fear that it will not be upheld by the courts. There are a few provisions in the bill, parts of sections, and possibly one provision limiting the powers of the court, that may not be sustained. Those are not essential, however, to the main merits of the bill, which would relieve this great number of tenants who are threatened with eviction. Taking it all together, there is enough to be enforced, enough that is valid, to furnish the remedy needed; enough that the courts, I think, will sustain. I think the conference report has improved the bill that came from the Committee on the District of Columbia, which attached the amendment, and on the whole the bill is a workable one.

In section 121 it is provided:

> If any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this title shall be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder thereof, but shall be confined in its operations to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

These parts that may be of some doubtful validity are of the kind that can be stricken out of the section, or the whole section can be stricken out without impairing the remainder of the bill as an entire act capable of application by the rent commission, and the sustaining of the balance of it by a court when it may be attacked. I am satisfied that either upon the war power of Congress, or upon the general police power of Congress exerted in the District of Columbia, the proposed measure is valid legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have read a memorial addressed to my colleague and myself on the subject of the league of nations. It is signed by several thousand influential people in our State. I observe that it contains the names of the chief justice of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, a majority of the members of the three larger courts—the supreme court, the circuit court, and the court of errors and appeals—and that it contains names from all sections of the State of lawyers, bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and 150 employees from one large plant. I ask that the Secretary may read the memorial.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to have the names read?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; let it be read without the names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Hon. JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN and Hon. WALTER E. EDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We believe that a speedy, just, and practical treaty of peace could have and that such a treaty should have been formulated at Paris without the delay which attended the consideration of the league of nations covenant.

We believe that the Paris conference days, with their stress and hurry, were not a proper time for the consideration of any world-government scheme, and this is manifested by the character of the present league of nations covenant, which provides a system of machinery but not a code of international law, leaving world questions to be decided by votes and not by principles of justice and equity.

We believe that the duties and the obligations of the United States under the league of nations covenant of the proposed treaty are so indefinite as to imperil the future peace and prosperity of our country.

We believe that no matter what anyone may tell us the treaty does or does not do, the meaning of the treaty as expressed in its language and its implications should be patent to all men.

We believe that the circumstances under which American boys can be called upon to fight in foreign quarrels should be clearly stated.

We believe that no group of political units recognizing the same sovereignty should have any greater voting strength than the United States would have.

We believe that we, as a nation, should be free to settle our own internal matters, without any question whatever of our right to do so.

We believe that the United States should be the sole judge of its right to terminate its membership in the league.

Recognizing that an early adoption of the peace treaty is most advisable, but believing that it should not be adopted as it stands, we urge upon you, our representatives from New Jersey, to give your support and votes to such reservations and amendments as will preserve to our nation the full enjoyment of its complete sovereignty in all matters affecting its peace, its prosperity, and its happiness.

Respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM SHIPPEN,
President of the First National Bank of Hoboken, N. J.
(And others).

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, one of the things that is charged in the statement, or resolution, or whatever you may call it, that has just been read is in reference to the voting strength of one particular power. I do not think there is any one subject on which the public is more grossly misinformed than upon the subject of the voting power of the several nations.

It is alleged and so understood generally by the country that the council or the assembly has the power to decide disputes between nations, and that in such decisions Great Britain would control 6 votes and the United States but 1, and more prejudice has been created against the league of nations because of this mistaken idea than by any other criticism urged against that instrument.

Mr. President, these claims are without any foundation whatever, because:

First. Neither the council nor the assembly is a board of arbitration.

Second. Neither of them decides international disputes at all.

Third. The only jurisdiction which either the council or the assembly can have over a dispute between nations is the right to investigate and report what the true facts are concerning the dispute and make recommendations in regard thereto.

Fourth. As neither Canada nor any other British dominion or possession has a separate membership in the council, of course neither could have a vote in the council.

Fifth. If the investigation of the facts concerning the dispute should be transferred to the assembly, then Canada, Australia, or other British dominion would still have no vote if either the British Empire or any one of its constituent parts was a party to the dispute, inasmuch as a dispute with a part is necessarily a dispute with the whole, and a dispute with the dominant nation is necessarily a dispute with all its parts.

Sixth. If the dispute were between nations entirely outside the British Empire, and the case were referred to the assembly, then these self-governing dominions mentioned could vote, not in settlement of the dispute but only on the question of what are the true facts concerning the dispute.

Seventh. Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa are self-governing nations, governed solely by their own separate Parliaments. And on these investigations of facts and recommendations, the only questions on which the representatives of these dominions could pass, their votes would in no way be subject to the control of Great Britain.

Mr. President, as that seems to be the one important criticism urged against the league of nations, I shall ask permission on Monday morning next, after the close of morning business, to address myself to that phase of the question.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move that the Senate proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the very extensive discussions of the treaty, both in and outside of the Senate Chamber, have developed a great many imperfections in that document, some of very great importance, some sufficiently so to require most careful consideration, and some of more or less trivial nature. One criticism to be made of these discussions is that in considering these defects as much emphasis is laid upon those which are unimportant as upon those which are of grave concern. Consequently we are prone to lose the sense of proportion which should attend the discussion of any proposition, and particularly of those concerning a most important treaty.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], now occupying the chair, has just emphasized several propositions aimed at amendments Nos. 1 and 2, which I am sure will receive that careful consideration which all of the Senator's contributions to the subject of the treaty so fully merit.

I have never been able to perceive the strength of the arguments, although very plausible, upon which these amendments rest. They assume that in the distribution of representation in the league assembly, one of the great powers is given an undue and disproportionate advantage and that the menace to the other nations, and particularly to our own, is sufficiently apparent to justify the establishment of an equilibrium through an increase of the voting power of the United States, thereby giving us equality in the assembly and making it practically impossible that any disadvantage or injury should result to us because of the provisions of the treaty in that respect.

I think, Mr. President, that it is the fact that it is only one of the great nations of the world which possesses self-governing dominions or dependencies, and therefore only one of the nations of the world against which this objection can be urged, that has made the subject so prominent in our discussions.

England is the great colonizing nation of the world. She has extended her language, her peoples, and her institutions to many portions of the globe, and by the encouragement of the principles of self-government and self-reliance she has builded up great communities, nations in themselves and exercising practically all the attributes of nations, where other governments, lacking her wisdom and her institutions, have succeeded in colonizing either not at all or in a qualified degree.

Hence, in recognizing the right of self-governing dependencies to representation in the league of nations the only communities corresponding to that designation are those which profess allegiance to the British Crown, and the only great dependency not self-governing whose contributions to the cause of the Allies in this Great War is also to be under the same dominion.

It is perfectly natural that the United States, in considering the question of representation under this treaty, should inquire carefully into, and as far as may be guard against, the possible contingency of a preponderance of power in the assembly which might in the future prove embarrassing to our people. I may add in passing that the reservation offered upon this subject by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] appears to me to anticipate every contingency that the future may have in store and make provision against it.

The proposed amendments are to articles 3 and 15 as reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. In order to clarify such comments as I may make upon them I will read them into the RECORD. They are identical in purpose, although they differ in phraseology. I read the first amendment, which is to article 3:

Provided, That when any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire, which are also members of the league, the United States shall have votes in the assembly or council of the league numericaly equal to the aggregate vote of such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire in the council or assembly of the league.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the Senator if he is reading now the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. They are numbered 1 and 2 in the report of the committee.

The second amendment is to article 15, which I will now read:

Whenever the case referred to the assembly involves a dispute between one member of the league and another member whose self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire are also represented in the assembly, neither the disputant members nor any of their said dominions, colonies, or parts of empire shall have a vote upon any phase of the question.

These amendments, as was asserted by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] in the last speech that he made in the Chamber, are not designed to disfranchise any self-governing colony or dependency. On the contrary, they are intended to duplicate the votes which are given to them by the treaty in the assembly in the one instance and in the other to exclude them from participation in any dispute which concerns the empire itself.

My first comment upon the proposed amendments is that they do not accomplish the purpose which the author of them must have had in view. Let us assume, by way of illustration, that some proposition of importance should come before the assembly for consideration and, of course, that these amendments had been finally incorporated into the treaty.

I think it may be said with perfect safety that in such event, and practically in all events, the 6 votes of the United States would be cast en masse. It is barely possible there might be some differences of opinion among the members, but inasmuch as they constitute collectively the representation of the United States, he would be a courageous individual to dissent from the prevailing opinion, the governing vote, and array himself against his fellows.

On the other hand, the six delegates representing the British Empire and its dependencies are each appointed to represent the specific country whose credentials he holds. The delegate from Canada, for example, is primarily a delegate from that Dominion. The delegate from New Zealand is primarily the representative of that nationality, which is self-governing and therefore a member of the league of nations as a distinct political entity. The occasions when the 6 votes representing those dependencies of Great Britain would be cast en masse would, in my judgment, be comparatively few, because were the fact otherwise it would be necessary to presuppose an identity of interests which will seldom occur.

The domestic affairs of Canada are far more nearly identical with those of the United States than with those of Great Britain, and those of Australia and New Zealand are still more divergent. I can not speak with so much confidence regarding the conditions in South Africa, and I can conceive how India as a dependency might be more or less subject to the dominating influence of Great Britain and act in harmony with the delegate representing the British Empire. If, therefore, it be the purpose of these amendments to equalize voting power, they do not do it. They give to the United States a preponderance so distinct and so striking that inevitably the other great powers would, upon the adoption of these amendments, very naturally and very properly insist upon being given similar representation in the assembly; and I have no doubt that the smaller powers, actuated by the same impulse of political self-interest, would also feel entitled to demand an increase of representation. We would, therefore, have a measure not particularly protecting the United States but one begetting imitation clear down the line.

Let us suppose again, Mr. President, that a case under article 15, which amendment No. 2 is intended to reach, should arise—that is, a dispute referred to the assembly for consideration, between Great Britain and France or between Great Britain and Italy or any other country—this amendment, if crystallized into the treaty, will disfranchise, in that instance, the six votes representing Great Britain and her dependencies, but it will not disfranchise the six votes to be given to the United States; and in such a dispute the United States would have such a preponderant power and influence as might decide the question. Whether it decides it wrongly or rightly is another proposition. What I am emphasizing is that the purpose sought to be subserved by this amendment is not accomplished, and that it merely transfers to the Government of the United States, as against Great Britain and other countries, that identical preponderance which is the subject of complaint and which it is desired to remove. So this remedy, instead of curing the alleged disease, will only serve to aggravate it, and aggravate it so extensively as to require either the recasting of the plan of representation or in the collapse of the entire scheme of the league.

I think, Mr. President, that I do not transgress the proprieties when I say—and my conclusion, of course, is based upon the public utterances of the distinguished gentleman—that it is not the purpose of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to vote for the league, whatever the fate of his amendments. His objection to it is fundamental. Of course, I realize that he desires, with the remainder of us, to secure such amendments as he deems essential to the perfection of the scheme, but which will not prohibit his rejecting the treaty after the amendments shall have been made a part of it.

I desire in this connection, not as a part of the argument, but as a subject of historical interest, to remind the Senate of the fact that the representation given to her self-governing colonies was not moved by Great Britain. She was extremely reluctant to recognize the right, much less to grant it. She finally agreed because of the firm insistence of her dependencies, every one of which had contributed in men and material to the waging of the war; every one of which had lent its powerful aid to the suppression of Germany; every one of which, except India, had gone through the formality of a declaration of war; every one of which had earned its right to representation as an independent government, through its unsparing and continued sacrifice of blood and treasure in the common cause. The demand appealed to other members of the congress at Versailles, so that England finally withdrew her opposition, recognized the right of the colonies to representation, and consented to their inclusion as units of the congress.

Mr. President, I think the institutions of the United States so harmonize with those of Canada, of Australia, and of New Zealand that in all probability we and they will be found more frequently acting together than in opposition in the deliberations of the assembly to be created under the league. The principal difference between a Canadian and an American lies in the fact that the one pays tribute to the British Crown, while the other does not. The laws and institutions of Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, like our own, were borrowed from the mother country, transplanted to foreign soil, nurtured and protected by the citizenship of the Anglo-Saxon, and have borne the same rich harvest of freedom and prosperity.

The Australian and the Canadian soldier frequently declined "over there" to pay his tribute of salute to the British officer, but never to the American. The comradeship upon the field and in the camp was far more close and cordial between those troops and ours than between them and those of the British Government. That is no reflection upon the British soldiery; it merely indicates an unconscious reaction of mind to mind, of temperament to temperament, that common view of the world and of its institutions, that recognition of the common destiny of these people with our own, and that mutuality of purpose which springs from common laws and a common origin.

Mr. President, this view is emphasized by the recent utterance of a former premier of Australia, the Hon. Crawford Vaughan, who a few days ago, in referring to this subject in a public address, said:

The self-governing dominions are in some respects closer to America in understanding than are the British Isles. We owe more to the land of Washington than we can ever repay. We are faced with the same problems of development that America has successfully solved. The destiny of Australia and New Zealand in the Pacific are wrapped up with the destiny of the United States in that greatest of world oceans. Canada and the United States have dwelt in concord, side by side, for more than a century. For these reasons any closer coordination between America and the dominions would find the most cordial support in the dominions. The unity of the English-speaking peoples is, indeed, regarded by the citizens of the outlying parts of the British Commonwealth as vital to the peace of the world.

I have no doubt that Mr. Vaughan reflects the opinion of the everyday man in Australia, in Canada, in New Zealand, and possibly elsewhere. This is but one of many evidences which might be offered in support of the proposition for which I am contending. I therefore predict that if the league of nations shall become an established fact, its progress will be punctuated more frequently by cooperation between the United States, Canad, and Australia than by opposition between these great English-speaking countries.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator if I should ask him a question?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir.

Mr. CURTIS. There are two questions involved in this amendment which have been giving me considerable trouble. The first one, I think, the Senator is covering now in reference to controversies with the colonies of Great Britain; but if the United States should become involved in a controversy with either of the colonies or dependencies and the matter were submitted to the council, Great Britain having a vote and we having none, it being necessary that there should be a unanimous vote, would not that give Great Britain the advantage?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, Mr. President, I think it would; but that contingency is covered by the McCumber reservation, for which I shall vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I was going to ask the Senator if he was going to support a reservation which would cover that.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; before I finish I shall try to discuss that reservation. Possibly it might be amplified a little, but it does meet a real contingency which the amendments, in my judgment, do not.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. Suppose, for instance, that there should arise a dispute—and we all hope there will be no disputes between ourselves and our allies—between Great Britain and the United States, and Great Britain, believing the council to be friendly to the United States, should, upon motion, take the dispute to the assembly. In the assembly there must not only be a unanimous vote of the council, but there must be a majority vote of the assembly. Now, if the colonies with five votes should happen to be friendly to Great Britain, as it is reasonable to suppose they will be, would not that give Great Britain a decided advantage over the United States in the controversy?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; in the assembly; but that also is covered by the McCumber reservation. Even there, however, Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield that I may suggest a somewhat different case?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose the dispute was between the United States and some other member of the league——

Mr. THOMAS. I understood that to be the case put by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. LENROOT. No; in the case put by him Great Britain was mentioned.

Mr. THOMAS. His first question was with reference to some other member of the league.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose a dispute should arise between the United States and some other member of the league, and that Great Britain sympathized with the other member, and, fearing the council would be unanimously against us, we would take it to the assembly, where a majority can make the decision binding, the six votes of Great Britain would help constitute the majority making the decision, would they not?

Mr. THOMAS. It would constitute a part of the majority; but that also, if I properly comprehend the reservations which I have referred to, is amply provided for.

I was about to say, Mr. President, that even were the treaty to be ratified by the Senate in its present form and without reservations—of which, I take it, there is no probability—I am satisfied that the United States could depend quite as confidently upon the votes of Cuba, Haiti, Nicaragua, and Panama, and possibly of Brazil and Liberia, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] suggests, as could Great Britain upon her five dependencies. Panama is a child of the United States. It never has been a legitimate child, in my estimation, but a child nevertheless. It is "an ill-favored thing, but our own." Cuba is our ward. But for the United States, there would be no independent Cuba. The Governments of Haiti and Nicaragua are sustained by the continued physical presence of United States marines. I do not mean to say that the United States Government would exercise any compelling force upon the representatives of these Governments; I should hope not; but there is unquestionably to-day greater dependency of these four Governments upon the United States than there is of New Zealand, Australia, Canada, and South Africa upon Great Britain. Therefore, so far as these amendments go, I can perceive how potently they could be utilized by some of the other great powers not blessed with such influence among the smaller nations for added representation in the assembly for their protection against us as well as against Great Britain; and we must always remember, Mr. President, that as we are keen to look after our interests here in the Senate in considering this treaty, so also are the other nations, each of which, in the discharge of its functions, will make the national interest their principal viewpoint, and consider with infinite care every condition and covenant of the treaty that is at all ambiguous before finally accepting it.

If I were disposed to criticize a formidable defect in the structure of the governmental body of the league, I would assail the principle of unanimity. My own view is that inasmuch as unanimity is required in the action of the council, the league will prove practically innocuous as to any matter of importance upon which the nations may differ; and it is very difficult to conceive of any interest liable to come before the council for determination about which the various nations represented in the council will be in harmony. We are abandoning, in this treaty, the old democratic doctrine of rule by majority. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] a few days ago criticized the proposed constitutional amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] because of its requirement, first, of a two-thirds to the proposal and afterwards of a three-fourths vote to the adoption of any amendment, and served warning upon the Senate that the Constitution, to be democratic, must be so changed that the vote of a majority would suffice to amend it. He spoke for the majority; yet the Senator swallows without blinking the principle of unanimity in the congress of nations. Every Senator within the sound of my voice is familiar with Polish history, and knows that the old Polish Nation collapsed because the Polish Diet could do nothing except it acted as a unit. Unanimity was impossible. The nation finally became like an engine on a dead center and drifted helplessly and hopelessly into collapse and ruin. But we have it here, and I think it is a complete protection as to all possible contingencies that may present themselves under the league, under which it can do little or nothing. I do not and can not approve of the insertion of that principle of action in a body that it is proposed shall hereafter influence, if indeed it does not dominate, the destinies of the world, but I offer no objection to it upon that score.

But, Mr. President, let me for a few moments concede the need for these amendments. Let me assume that they are absolutely essential to the improvement of this treaty and to the protection of American interests. I should like to ask the Committee on Foreign Relations why, then, they were limited to part 1? Why were they not made to comprehend the entire scheme of the league of nations, a part of which is numbered 13, where there is no requirement of unanimity where procedure by two-thirds and in one instance by two-thirds of 50 per cent of the membership being all that is necessary for action?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. I have not in my hand a copy of the so-called McCumber reservation, but my recollection of that reservation is that it applies only to a controversy in which Great Britain or any of her colonies shall have a dispute with the United States, and does not apply where there are disputes between the United States and other countries. Am I right in that?

Mr. THOMAS. It applies to any dispute between Great Britain and another country, or any dispute between any of these colonies and another country. It covers both contingencies.

Mr. WATSON. Suppose we were to have a dispute, for instance, with Chile, as an illustration. We can not vote in the council; Chile is not represented in the council; but Great Britain could vote in the council. Suppose, then, that we give the notice required and appeal to the assembly. Now, Great Britain and her five colonies could all vote in the assembly, could they not?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. And we could not vote at all?

Mr. THOMAS. No.

Mr WATSON. Therefore, the McCumber reservation does not affect that situation, does it?

Mr. THOMAS. Perhaps not; but I think we would be as amply protected by our own dependencies to begin with, and I am quite as willing, so far as that phase of the question is concerned, to place my dependence upon them. It might not make a complete protection. I believe it would.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. In a case such as the Senator from Indiana speaks of, where we have a dispute that we take to the assembly, our only reason for taking it to the assembly would be the fear that the council would come to a unanimous decision against us, I take it, and we would take it to the assembly in the hope that a majority of the assembly would decline to follow the findings of the council. In that case, would not the 5 votes of the colonies of Great Britain, sustaining the British Empire, represented on the council, prevent us from securing a majority against the decision of the council?

Mr. THOMAS. It might. Of course, that is entirely possible, although here again are the votes of Panama and the others; but suppose that the controversy, instead of being between the United States and Chile, should be between France and Chile, how would these amendments then operate? We would have 6 votes, and would cast them as a unit, in all probability, because they collectively represent the United States. Great Britain has 6 votes, and may or may not cast them collectively in such a dispute. I can conceive such a condition quite as easily as the one suggested by my friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, where there is a possibility of danger, just as in the other there may be, and probably is, a greater possibility of danger; but I do not think the amendments, if they were enacted, as I have tried to explain, would meet the thought in the mind of their framer. They will fall short of it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just taken up the hypothetical case of a controversy between France and Chile. If the council were unanimously against France, and if a majority of the assembly, plus the council acting with the assembly, were against France, I suspect that in the judgment of the average man he would come to the conclusion that France was probably wrong. It seems to me that those who are taking the extreme position want to avoid not only any but every possibility of a decision against the United States, whether we are right or wrong.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the party fearing the action of the council, and having reason to apprehend an adverse decision, would be the party to appeal to the assembly. Generally speaking, I think it is fair to assume that the ultimate action of either will be in accordance with the facts; but we can not be certain of it, because even eminent bodies like those are, after all, human and subject to the same infirmities and the same influences which govern some of us in a more humble sphere of life.

But let me come, Mr. President, to a consideration of the method of voting, and the possible consequences of its exercise as provided in certain articles of part 13, about which not only are these amendments silent, but concerning which not a single amendment or reservation was offered for the consideration of the Senate by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I do not assert that the voting power of Great Britain will be exercised collusively or improperly; far from it. I am merely assuming it as the proponents of these amendments assume it in supposititious controverties arising under the covenants of part 1.

I said the other day, and I have had no reason to change my mind, that of the two parts constituting the league of nations, part 13 is the more important. Let me refer by way of digression, lest I overlook it, to the commission of inquiry provided for in article 412 and following, which is to pass upon and decide complaints against member nations. It is to be composed of three members, but there is nothing in the phraseology of the articles which requires unanimity of action by that commission. The United States may be cited by a delegate to the conference to appear at Geneva and there answer his complaint that it has failed to effectively carry out some of the covenants recommended by the general conference and adopted by the United States. A commission of inquiry is impaneled, as the articles require, and as I construe it the vote of any two of the three is decisive. The principle of unanimity is not required at all, and I think it is an evidence of the superior wisdom of the committee which framed part 13. It seemed to act upon the practical view of things and to realize the impossibility of doing anything or getting anywhere through required unanimity of action. Hence the principle was rejected.

Now, I will take up two or three of the articles of part 13, with a view of demonstrating, if I can, how much more essential this amendment is to that part of the treaty than to the one at which it is aimed, if it be essential at all. Let me call attention first to article 389, on page 491, of the document. That article begins on page 490 and is devoted to the structure of the general conference, which is the legislative body of part 13 of the league. That is to be composed of four representatives of each of the members, of whom two shall be the Government delegates and the two others shall be delegates representing, respectively, the employers and the workpeople of each of the members.

That is to say, each Government has two, the workers have one, and the employers one. These are official delegates. But when we turn to the last sentence of the article we discover that the credentials of delegates and their advisers shall be subject to scrutiny by the conference, "which may, by two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present, refuse to admit any delegate or adviser whom it deems not to have been nominated in accordance with this article."

That reminds me of the good old days of Democratic conventions in Denver, where the committee on credentials generally dictated the complexion and policy of the convention.

The President of the United States may send to us four names, nominees of the Government as delegates to the general conference at Geneva. The Senate confirms the nominations, and their commissions are issued. They go to Geneva and present those commissions, when some question concerning the character, conduct, religion, previous record, or other supposed disqualification is raised and the credentials go to the general body of the conference. If two-thirds shall sustain the objection, out goes the delegate or the adviser, or both, although the great seal of the United States is affixed to his credentials. The same may be true of the delegates of other countries—Great Britain, Japan, Italy, or France. The article gives to the conference a qualified veto upon the selection of its delegates, and that veto becomes effective whenever it is sustained by a vote of two-thirds of its membership.

Upon the basis of the present organization, which consists of 27 members, the total of delegates to the general conference will be 108, two-thirds of which, if my calculation is correct, are 72. The total of the delegates of Great Britain, her colonies and dependencies, is 24, or exactly one-third of the two-thirds, and if for any reason the delegates from Great Britain and her colonies are dissatisfied with a delegate from the United States, or the entire delegation, the influence which they can exercise through the control of one-third of the number required upon a vote to disqualify becomes at once apparent. That, however, seems to be satisfactory to the committee, at least, because, as I have stated and reiterate, no amendment or reservation of any kind, nature, or description has been reported here aimed at any provision of part 13.

Let me pass to article 393, which is devoted to the governing body and which is part of the permanent international labor organization. That consists of 24 members. On page 493 will be found the method of their selection. Twelve shall represent the Government, six selected by the delegates to the conference representing employers, six by the delegates to the conference representing the workers. Of the 12 persons representing the Government 8 shall be nominated by the members which are of chief industrial importance and 4 by the members selected for the purpose by Government delegates. This body also operates under the two-thirds rule. The total number of delegates to that body are 24. The total number of Government delegates are 12.

Of the eight which are to represent the nations of chief industrial importance we may assume that the principal allied and associated powers will constitute five. Some of the others may or may not be self-governing dependencies of Great Britain. I think one or two of them could put in very strong claims for consideration as being of chief industrial importance. Belgium probably would have a delegate, one of the eight, under this arrangement, and it is possible that through the control of her delegation, including those from the colonies, to the general conference Great Britain might easily influence the selection of the remaining four and of some of the delegates representing labor and some representing employers, and by that means obtain control of this governing body, two-thirds of which are invested officially with all the powers possessed by the whole.

I am not contending, Mr. President, that this will be done—by no means. I am merely calling attention to possible contingencies, in order to emphasize the fact that they are more easily accomplished under that part of the treaty which is governed by a two-thirds majority in all things than under that part which requires unanimity in one body, when acting separately or when its powers are shared by the assembly.

Let me turn now to article 402, on page 497. It will be recalled, Mr. President, that the agenda or program to be considered by the general conference is fixed in advance by the governing body, and the subjects constituting that agenda are those only which can be considered and disposed of at the next conference. The article reads, in part:

> Items to which such objection has been made—

That is, for the consideration of any item—

> shall not, however, be excluded from the agenda, if at the conference a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present is in favor of considering them.
> If the conference decides (otherwise than under the preceding paragraph) by two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present that any subject shall be considered by the conference, that subject shall be included in the agenda for the following meeting.

That is to say, notwithstanding the action of the governing body fixing the agenda, notwithstanding its determination might be based upon the conviction that an excluded subject was beyond the jurisdiction of the general conference, two-thirds of that conference may, nevertheless, vote in favor of including it in the next agenda, and it ipso facto becomes a part of the succeeding program.

Let me again say that the British delegation is not likely to so conduct itself. But we are dealing, because we must, with possibilities, finding justification under the powers granted by the covenant and, having established them, inquire what rule of consistency vindicates amendments to part 1 to cure defects and dangers far more evident under the articles of part 1 to which the amendments do not even remotely relate.

I have already called attention to the constitution of the conference, and the same criticisms apply here as well. Great Britain enters it, together with her colonies, with 24 members, or exactly one-third of the required two-thirds, as against 4 members representing the Government of the United States. Does anyone believe for a moment that a great body like a general world conference of labor will content itself at all times with the consideration merely of those things mapped out by its governing body? Would any conference representing any body of men be so restricted? The subject under consideration might concern the United States vitally, yet, notwithstanding its protest, Great Britain, with 24 votes as against its 4, might if so inclined be sufficiently strong to dictate the result, and by the sheer force of preponderant power inject a world question into the next agenda, fraught with the gravest and most far-reaching consequences to our domestic affairs.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Apropos of what the Senator is just stating, although it is perhaps not quite relevant or pertinent, the newspapers reported a few days ago that one of the prominent labor leaders of Great Britain stated that when the league of nations was in operation and part 13 of the treaty went into effect the negro question, which was agitating the American people considrably, would be settled, and that if the people of the South did not accord to the negroes the same rights that were accorded to white laborers, pay them the same wages, and accord them social equality, the matter would be taken up by this labor organization, and the rights of the colored laborers would be enforced through forbidding the shipment of cotton from the United States, and by the calling of strikes and the prevention of ships leaving the ports of our country. This, he said, as the newspaper reported it, would be one of the consequences of the organization that is provided for in part 13. Does the Senator think that the article contains such sinister potentialities as that?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I would be unwilling that the extreme assertions of some irresponsible fanatic or enthusiast should be made the basis of a conjecture as to what may or may not be implied under the provisions of article 13. I may say, however, that my view of the negro situation comes closer home; that unless we quit butchering one class of our people to make a hoodlum's holiday, unless we guarantee to every man the equal protection of the laws, we shall aggravate a serious condition, one which may find an attempted solution through other than agencies of an international character. Two Mexicans were lynched the other day in my State, the excuse being that the governor had paroled a convicted criminal some time before who happened to be of that nationality.

The difficulty with the exercise of such lawlessness lies in the impossibility of restraining it. It began as a punishment for a nameless crime. Since then it has been frequently applied, regardless of the nature of the crime, whenever the accused happened to have a black skin. I trust, Mr. President, that the American people are becoming more and more impressed with a realizing sense of the great truth that the Government can not afford to deny its laws and protection to the meanest citizen if it would preserve them for its highest representatives.

Let me proceed, however, with the discussion. Section 403, on page 499, relates to conference procedure. Its concluding clause is that—

> Except as otherwise expressly provided in this part of the present treaty, all matters shall be decided by a simple majority of the votes cast by the delegates present.

There is your majority vote.

> The voting is void unless the total number of votes cast is equal to half the number of the delegates attending the conference.

Fifty per cent of 108 is 54. Under this provision Great Britain and her colonies may control an actual and potential representation of 24, or 44⅔ per cent of the half. This, too, seems to have escaped attention, our difficulties and our problems being wholly confined to a consideration of the political as opposed to the economic side of the proposed league.

Article 412 deals with the commission of inquiry which is to try complaints which may be made by any member or by any delegate to the general conference against a member. One of the delegates from Hejaz—I believe Hejaz has been very frequently used here for illustration—can complain that our Government is not properly enforcing or regarding some of the covenants of the conference which it has adopted, and forthwith Uncle Sam is haled into court, must submit his cause to the determination of a commission of inquiry consisting of three, any two of whom may decide the controversy, and also provide what measures of economic character shall be taken to enforce the decree. This is subject only to an appeal to an international court not yet created, whose judgment shall be final.

The commission is selected by the secretary general of the league from a sort of panel. I read article 412:

> The commission of inquiry shall be constituted in accordance with the following provisions:
>
> Each of the members agrees to nominate, within six months of the date on which the present treaty comes into force, three persons of industrial experience, of whom one shall be a representative of employers, one a representative of workers, and one a person of independent standing, who shall together form a panel from which the members of the court of inquiry shall be drawn.
> The qualifications of the persons so nominated shall be subject to scrutiny by the governing body, which may, by two-thirds of the votes cast by the representatives present, refuse to accept the nomination of any person whose qualifications do not, in its opinion, comply with the requirements of the present article.

Here, again, Mr. President, there is reserved to the governing body what may be called a challenge for cause to the panel from which the tribunal is to be selected to try these complaints against member nations. Here, again, the members of the panel bear commissions from all the Governments, from the United States by nomination and confirmation; here, again, is a committee on credentials with power to determine whether the persons composing the panel are fit or otherwise, whether their qualifications do or do not, "in their opinion"—not in fact, but in their opinion—comply with the requirements of the present article.

The total of that panel, if my figures are correct, would be 81, two-thirds of which are 54, of which Great Britain and her colonies supply 18, or a percentage of 33⅓. Here, again, the dominance of the arrangement, if it is a bad one, is dangerously great, provided there be unity of action among them. This, in my humble judgment, is one of the most far-reaching and extremely important of all the articles in the treaty, because it involves the trial of a sovereign power haled to Geneva, possibly, by an irresponsible member, or indeed by a single individual, then and there to show cause why the judgment of the court should not be pronounced against it.

Can it be possible that an objection to this preponderance, in a body consisting in part of members of a council which must act as a unit, is dangerous to America while it goes unchallenged when the check is only a two-thirds vote? Can it be possible that we perceive visions of national injury to us through the determination of disputes betwen nations, yet can see none in disputes in which a judgment economic in character, but a judgment nevertheless, may be enforced through the collective power of the boycott and the strike—for I feel very sure that whatever adverse decree may be pronounced by one of these commissions against any nation will have behind it and for its enforcement the collective power of international organization, which, in my judgment, is but another name for the collective power of international socialism?

This, however, seems to be unimportant, and all emphasis is laid upon the subject of representation in another part of the treaty, which, together with this part, collectively constitutes a proposed league of nations. It can not be that the Committee on Foreign Relations, composed of eminent Senators on both sides of the Chamber, some of them having long experience in foreign affairs, all of them supposedly familiar with the terms and conditions of the treaty, could have overlooked these contingencies when they framed and reported these amendments. It would be a reflection upon their intelligence and their industry to so suppose.

I leave it to the Senate and to the country whether the conditions to which I have called attention do not furnish the strongest of all reasons that can be urged here against the matter of representation if it be as faulty as Senators contend; for we must not lose sight of the fact that the league of nations, as provided for in this treaty, creates five different bodies, two of them, the council and the assembly, having jurisdiction over all matters of general national concern; three of them, the governing body, the conference, and the commission of inquiry, having exclusive jurisdiction of what may be termed economic class questions or conditions, the representatives of a huge section of humanity, given separate and distinct consideration from the rest of mankind, exempt from the necessity of unanimous action, clothed with power to pass upon the credentials of their members, and having behind them the collective force of class organization.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. I agree entirely with the Senator in his description of the sinister character of this provision, and I am wondering whether or not he proposes to offer any reservation to that particular provision.

Mr. THOMAS. As before stated, I am not so impressed with the necessity for amendments or reservations relating to these possibilities of danger as I am with the fact that here much more than in part 1 is where the evil lies, if it is an evil. I may say, however, that I have been trying to frame some reservations to part 13. It is rather a difficult thing to do. I hope to be able to submit something, however imperfect, to the consideration of the Senate very soon.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. I think, in justice to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I should inform the Senator from Colorado that this is a subject which was not omitted from the discussions of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very sure of that.

Mr. MOSES. If the Senator is at all familiar with conditions as they existed upon the two sides of the table in the committee room, he can well understand the difficulties which confronted the committee in reaching an agreement. I will say further that it was well understood in the committee room, certainly on one side of the table, that one member of the committee who had given notice of intention to offer in the committee amendments covering this part of the treaty——

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. MOSES. Later withdrew that notice and took no action in the committee room, but reserved the full right to offer his amendments and reservations on that subject upon the floor, and, as we understood, with every intention of so doing.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire has anticipated the current of my thought. I was just about to except the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] from my comment. He did introduce such a resolution before the committee, and who there withdrew it, for what reason I know not, and who is the only man that I can now recall, except myself, who has discussed on the floor the provisions of part 13.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the latter statement is entirely true; and I congratulate the Senator from Colorado upon his courage in having taken up this subject which so many men seem to try to avoid; but I can assure him that the Senator from New Mexico was by no means alone in the committee room in the opinions which he there expressed.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, that is gratifying. At the same time it increases my wonderment that some reference was not made in the committee's report to the serious features of part 13. There seems to be but one explanation of the circumstance.

I do not want to do injustice to anybody. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is to-day touring the country with the most gratifying success, if the Associated Press dispatches can be believed—and I have no doubt that they are reliable—enthralling multitudes by the earnestness of his argument and the eloquence of his tongue. His discourses seem to be very largely pivoted upon these two amendments. So far as I am able to ascertain he has said not one word about the character of representation and voting power in part 13. There he might find his strongest argument, yet he avoids it altogether. I reflect upon nobody, yet I can not avoid the suspicion that these amendments are in the main political; that they were largely designed to capture the Irish vote without imperiling the labor vote.

They seem to me, Mr. President—I will not say insincere—but so incomplete and so strangely one-sided in their method of presentation, so tender of the vital clauses of part 13, and so completely in harmony with the demands of an active, organized antileague propaganda, as to make any other conclusion most uncertain.

My friends upon the other side are not alone in their appreciation of this influence. Yesterday morning the Washington Post published a telegram giving an account of the proceedings of the Democratic convention of New Jersey, which, among other things, adopted a resolution "declaring that the league of nations covenant should not be approved without giving recognition to the Irish republic." That sounds like the Swede who said he was "again the war unless it make Sven a colonel." This convention, whose leaders I have no doubt are familiar with the provisions of the treaty, makes no mention of part 13, but is unwilling to accept part 1 except upon the condition mentioned in the resolution. That it was adopted for the purpose of placating the vote of Irish-American citizens in New Jersey no one can doubt. To what a lofty plane is the treaty lifted when it enters a party convention.

I wish this treaty could be considered by everybody, inside and outside of the Senate Chamber, upon its merits and without regard to the future of political parties. I love the Democratic Party; I have been a humble member of it since my majority; I have fought many of its battles and it has honored me far beyond my deserts; but in a matter of this importance, presenting problems not only of a national but of an international character, affecting American institutions and American destiny, fraught with possible benefits and equally possible evils which we can not wholly conjecture, I am obliged to follow the dictates of my own judgment and my own conscience, regardless of consequences to myself, to the Democratic or any other political organization.

Mr. JONES of Washington obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Under an agreement with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me for just a few words?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado has just concluded a very important and illuminating address upon part 13 of the peace treaty. While he was discussing the matter I interrupted him for the purpose of propounding a question and directing his attention to a statement reported to have been made by one of the labor leaders of Great Britain. I fear that I was unfortunate in not making myself understood by the Senator; indeed, as I interpreted his reply, it indicated that my suggestion and question were not apprehended. I did not intend to convey the idea that our colored citizens should be discriminated against or denied economic and industrial equality. Indeed, I believe that all citizens, regardless of race or previous condition, should enjoy the full rights guaranteed by the laws and Constitution of our land. I deplore as much as does the Senator the manifestations of race prejudice in our country. The negroes are American citizens and they are entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizenship. The misdeeds of a few among them do not call for the condemnation of the race. There are millions of negroes who are law-abiding and by their lives and conduct reflect credit upon their race and contribute in many ways to the building up of the communities within which they reside. Unprovoked attacks unfortunately have been made by white people upon members of the colored race, and in many instances negroes have been wantonly and brutally murdered. Those who believe in law and order sincerely regret the recent tragic occurrence in the city of Omaha. A mob of white people in a cowardly and brutal way not only killed a colored man but made an equally brutal and cowardly attack upon the honored mayor of that city. It is to be hoped that the civil authorities of Nebraska will vigorously prosecute those who committed these offenses and bring them speedily to trial and punishment.

The point, however, which I attempted to direct the attention of the Senator from Colorado to did not relate to the civil and political, or indeed the industrial or economic, rights of the colored population of our country. I had in mind, when I propounded the question, the statement attributed to the British labor leader, that when the peace treaty was signed and part 13 thereof, which relates to the organization of labor, went into operation, the organizations created or provided for under this part of the treaty would have such power and authority as to require and enforce equality among the races living in the United States, and determine the wages which should be paid not only the white people but the colored part of our population, and that if the international organizations were not satisfied with the treatment accorded to the negroes or the wages paid to them they would prohibit the exportation from the United States of cotton and other products, and to accomplish that end would prohibit vessels from carrying any such articles. As I understood the position of this representative of labor, it was that the treaty created a powerful international organization which would fix and regulate the hours of work in all countries who were members of the league, and would also regulate the wages to be paid, adopt steps to prevent unemployment, establish provisions that would provide, according to their views, an adequate living wage; direct the industries in the various States; establish provisions for insurance and old-age pensions; and that such organizations would have full authority to provide punishment for those States and nations who failed to respond to the orders and decisions of such international organizations. I inquired of the Senator from Colorado whether in his view the provisions of part 13 of the treaty were susceptible of the interpretation given to them in the reported statement of this labor leader. I inquired of the Senator whether in his view this provision of the treaty possessed "such sinister potentialities."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Utah does not mean to have it inferred that he indorses the views of that labor leader in his construction of part 13?

Mr. KING. I will frankly say that I am not absolutely certain as to the power conferred upon the tribunals and organizations provided for in part 13 of the treaty. I regard it as one of the most, if not the most, important part of the treaty. I have been able to reconcile myself to other provisions of the treaty, many of which I do not like and many of which I think are very objectionable, and shall vote for those provisions; but part 13 of the treaty has been the subject of considerable concern to me. If it is to be interpreted, or can reasonably be interpreted, in the manner indicated by the labor leader to whom I have referred, I should regard it as a very serious menace to the liberties of the American people. I have given considerable attention to the treaty, but have not perhaps with sufficient care analyzed all of the provisions of part 13. While I am not satisfied with many of the provisions of the treaty, and while I regard some provisions as very objectionable, I have been able to reach the conclusion that under all the circumstances it would be best for our country and for the world for our Nation to approve it. However, if part 13 of the treaty does create an imperium in imperio and an international organization that may superimpose its will upon all nations within the league with respect to the questions of labor and all cognate matters, then I should not feel like voting for its ratification. I would not support a treaty that created a supergovernment, either of a political or of an industrial and economic character. If an international government were created possessing political powers which were destructive of the rights and sovereignties of this Republic. I would not support the proposition; and if an economic organization were created with authority to control the economic and industrial life of this and other nations, I should attempt to defeat the exercise of its authority. The internal affairs of this Republic must not be interfered with. No supernation should be created with authority to control the economic or industrial affairs of this Nation or interfere in any way with its national and internal affairs.

The welfare of the inhabitants of all the world is an object of solicitude upon the part of all right-minded people. All students of sociology feel that the rights of the masses have not been sufficiently considered in the past. The laboring man has too often been denied the fruits of his toil, and proper protection has not been accorded to him by the governing forces of the world. With the overthrow of autocracy, with the departure of absolutism in the world, the side of humanity must rise. Men everywhere are beginning to realize that labor must be considered in any program providing for the future activities of nations. Archaic conditions must pass away and injustices to which the laboring men have been subjected must cease, and a spirit of fraternity and cooperation must prevail among all elements of the social structure. The American people are intensely interested in all labor problems, and there is a sincere desire to bring about peaceful and harmonious relations between capital and labor. Legislation calculated to ameliorate conditions of the working man is being enacted in the various States, and Congress has passed laws relating to labor problems within the sphere of its authority. It is quite likely that international conferences and international organizations for the purpose of promoting the interests of those who toil will result in great benefit to labor. There is no question but what the conscience of the people should be quickened so that there will be a more hearty response in behalf of needed legislation essential for the laborer's welfare.

Organizations which seek the welfare of labor in this and other lands should be welcomed by all classes; but as there would be objection to a supergovernment—an international government—possessing political authority and control over States and nations, so there would be objection to an international labor organization or government that would have the power and authority to go into the various nations and States of the world and interfere with their domestic affairs.

I know that there are some representatives of labor who believe that the treaty now before us does provide an international labor organization possessing power to go into the various nations who are signatories of the league and fix wages, hours, and conditions of labor, make provision for insurance and pensions for laboring men and women, and call and order international strikes and blockades for the purpose of enforcing orders and decisions with respect to all labor questions and conditions coming under their cognizance. Of course, if the treaty created an organization of such authority and power, the duty of the Senate would be very clear. Any treaty conferring such power upon an international organization should be defeated. The Senator from Colorado has heretofore challenged attention to the importance of the provisions of the treaty dealing with labor, and his remarks to-day should have the effect of causing a reexamination of part 13 of the treaty. I feel sure that it was not the intention of the representatives at the peace conference to create an international organization with plenary power to deal with labor in the nations within the league, and I am inclined to think that the treaty will not bear the interpretation placed upon it by some of the radicals in this and in other lands.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, two years ago the term "willful men," applied by the President to a few United States Senators who, in the discharge of their patriotic duty, did not do what he asked, consigned them to the gibbet of public opinion, and all but convicted them of high treason. Passing events have fully justified their position. Their number has multiplied manyfold, and to-day the terms "pygmy," "Bolshevik," "lovers of war," "haters of truth," "ignorant fumblers of English," "blind, perverted fools," "deserving of hanging on the highest gibbet," "contemptible quitters," "jaundice-eyed zealots," "pro-German," "disloyal," "dishonest," "cowards," "traitors," "unpatriotic," and "un-American" arouse only distrust and derision. Such language sustains no great cause nor does credit to any great man. It may bring a cheer from the thoughtless crowd, but it shocks and repels the just and thoughtful citizen.

The President presents a treaty to the Senate and tells us to consent to it without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." When we hesitate he threatens us with the wrath of the people. When we do not act as promptly as he thinks we should he takes the platform and urges, if he does not order, the people to coerce us into doing what our judgment and patriotism tells us not to do. He assumes that when he speaks and acts wisdom is exhausted and further effort useless. He is due for a rude awakening. The people are willing to concede that he is a learned man, that he is a wise man, that he is a great man, but they are beginning to resent the assumption that he knows every thing, past, present, and future, that he is the sole interpreter of their will and that his judgments should be accepted by all without question. An old hard-headed farmer expressed the sentiment of the ordinary citizen a few days ago when he said to me: "By gum, does the President think he knows it all? He'll find out he don't, and that the people won't accept his orders and ask their Representatives to do what he tells them to do regardless of their judgment as to what should be done." Another average citizen and an old soldier writes to me as follows: "I tell you, Senator, there are a lot of us common people who believe that all the brainy men of the Senate, with years and years of experience in State and National affairs, must know more than one man of less experience, even if he is pretty smart." And another man who served across the sea writes me as follows:

> Many people opposing the President's speeches are not necessarily against a league of nations. They resent, however, the autocratic method of forcing his own particular league down their throats whether they want it or not.

The open attempt of the President to coerce the Senate to act contrary to its patriotic judgment is fraught with great danger to the Republic. It embodies the spirit of the mob and justifies lawlessness.

While speaking for democracy and urging that the world be made safe for democracy, he practiced an autocracy that is hardly parallel in the annals of history. He named himself peace commissioner and, contrary to all his country's traditions, went to Europe to make peace. His associates were mere dummies. They acted as he ordered. His judgment was theirs whether they approved it or not. They come back confessing their ignorance and proclaiming their servility. The war was won. Germany was conquered. Our brave boys had done their work well. They were anxious to get home. Everybody wanted peace terms imposed upon Germany promptly. No negotiations were needed. The victors were expected to make their terms. Germany would have to accept them. Peace would come, and the nations would seek to recover from the awful thing they had passed through. The President would not have it so. A league of nations must be formed. A covenant must be drawn up. Everything must wait on this. All the world's differences must be adjusted. He had his way. Peace was delayed. When the covenant was drawn up opposition to it developed. To defeat this opposition he announced in New York that he would so entwine the covenant for a league of nations with the treaty with Germany that they could not be separated. Both would have to be accepted or both rejected. It was a "your money or your life" proposition. He would use business chaos, industrial uncertainty, and the desire for peace and the return of our boys as a club to force the adoption of this covenant. This attitude was unworthy of him and of a great man. It should be resented by every loyal citizen. It was a direct assault upon the fundamentals of our Government and a display of egoism unworthy of any man, much less one in his position. This very thing became his undoing. It threatens to defeat the covenant now, and it enabled other nations to secure his consent to their covetous desires, the violation of his lofty ideals, and left him but a shadow of his idealistic dream. Japan robbed China and forced the President to approve it to get his league. The "freedom of the seas" was abandoned, and England was left undisputed "mistress" of the seas to get his league. He was compelled, so far as he could, to pledge the riches and blood of this land to protect France against attack by Germany in this and succeeding generations to get his league. When these things were done, these and other nations were willing to enter into the league, hoping still further to get of our blood to police Europe and of our treasure to pay their debts and relieve them of their war expenses.

Thus the covenant was entwined in the treaty. The President brought it home. He had gone as far as he could. It could not be ratified without the advice and consent of the Senate. He grudgingly submitted it. He did not want to give the facts about it. Information sought by the committee was withheld as long as possible or not given at all. Some has not been given to this day. The Senate was, in effect, told to ratify the treaty as it was, under threat of his displeasure. When it proceeded to discharge its patriotic duty in a deliberative way under the Constitution, he threatened it with the wrath of the people and finally started upon his trip through the country to coerce it to do his will, regardless of the merits or demerits of the covenant. He has threatened, cajoled, and denounced. Scarecrows have been held up to frighten the people to action. Dangers have been laughed at until one could well wonder what the league can amount to, anyway. At one place it is a mighty force to prevent war, and at another it is an impotent debating society. The President meets himself in every argument as he goes from place to place and speaks upon different phases of the covenant.

In spite of all this, I do not question the President's sincerity, impeach his integrity, or question his loyalty and Americanism. There are three facts in his life, however, that make one hesitate to follow him. These facts will furnish a most interesting psychological study in the future. He always says what the occasion seems to demand to attain his end. He can be quoted by the most confirmed reactionary or the most extreme radical to sustain any position upon any important question from the days of Washington to the present. And he has strangely been wholly consistent in acceding to the demands of the British Empire since he became President, from the Panama Canal tolls to the "freedom of the seas" and the open admission of the superlative supremacy of British citizenship and sovereignty. His action in attempting to coerce a coordinate legislative branch of the Government to do his will regardless of its own judgment and conviction of duty is a more dangerous assault upon democracy and the integrity of this Republic than any armed attack could be. I regret to say it, but it is a fact that the President, by word and deed, has done more to undermine orderly, peaceful representative government than any other human agency. The time has come for our people and this Nation to get back to the orderly principles of government and the principles upon which the Republic rests. We can not do it so long as the acts and words of those in highest positions can be used to justify those who seek to overturn law, order, and liberty.

When we voted to enter this war we voted as Americans and not as partisans. Our politics were laid aside. We have had none in the conduct of the war. Every measure deemed necessary for its successful prosecution has had our earnest support. Mistakes have been made. They were inevitable. I have no criticism at this time to offer. Republicans sought only the Nation's good. They saw politics attempted by the administration in almost every measure and upon all occasions. They knew their counsel was not sought, but their votes were always given for their country's welfare.

As we entered the war as patriots, we should come out of it as Americans. Partisanship and personal bias should have no place in the consideration of this treaty. It is a broad American question, and should be passed upon in a purely American spirit and with an intense devotion to American welfare and American ideals regardless of party consequences. This is the spirit in which I have tried to consider it. This is the spirit in which I am going to vote on it. No party has a monopoly of patriotism or Americanism. Senators on the other side of the aisle are just as patriotic and just as loyal to American interests and American ideals as Senators on this side of the aisle, and it will be a sad day for the Republic when we divide along party lines on what is and what is not Americanism in our dealings with foreign countries. No matter what my personal feeling toward the President may be; no matter how strongly I may condemn the methods he has pursued; no matter how unwisely I think he may have acted; no matter how unjustifiable I consider his course now; no matter what epithets he may indulge in, I have tried and shall try not to allow these things to influence me in determining my duty at this hour. This treaty is the act of this Government, so far as he can make it so. It should not be rejected except for the most weighty reasons. The time has come for me to do my duty. The Constitution of the United States, which I have sworn to uphold and which I love and revere, makes it my duty to pass upon this treaty as one of the representatives of the people. My responsibility is to them and not to the President. I am here to represent them and not him. He says he reports to the people. So do I. I am as sensible of my obligation to them as he, and I am prepared to account to them fully for whatever I may do here.

In studying this treaty I have sought to find reasons to justify my supporting it rather than to sustain a vote against it. I know a tremendous task confronted the President. I would not seek to minimize it in the least. With his desire to promote world peace and avoid war I am in hearty accord, as is every man who loves humanity. That he sought the peace and welfare of the United States I do not question; that he placed the United States first and above all else I have my doubts. He tells the people now that there is a cause that is greater than the Senate. That may be true. He says there is a cause greater than the Government itself, and for that he is ready to die. I have been taught that above everything, above property, above life, above loved ones, above home, above all, is my country. When I was but a boy my dear old mother took me in front of a picture of a bearded man in a uniform of blue and said to me, "My son, that is your father, who left all and gave his life to save his country. Be true to his memory." That principle has actuated me all my life. I have never knowingly departed from it. What he died to save is good enough for me and has my highest allegiance, and in serving my country I believe I am best serving humanity.

The main controversy about this treaty is over the covenant for a league of nations. It should not be in the treaty. Months ago the treaty with Germany should have been made and ratified. Rehabilitation here and in Europe should have been under way. Who is to blame for the delay? No one but the President. He and he alone insisted upon the two things being put together. He did it deliberately to force the adoption of the covenant and now this is used as an argument for speedy action.

The President says we must take it as it is, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," or it will fail and the world's heart be broken, and all sorts of direful calamities will fall upon us, including famine, pestilence, business ruin, strikes, and anarchy. He says, "You must take what I offer you or there shall be nothing." That is the word of an autocrat, not of a democrat, there is the spirit of tyranny, not liberty.

The covenant will not be rejected. It will be ratified, but it will be so ratified that the vital interests of the United States will be protected and its independence and sovereignty preserved; and in so doing the world's peace and progress will be promoted even if the President's vanity shall suffer a shock. We will not be scared from doing our duty by bogies nor led into national pitfalls by fairies. We will keep what is good of this covenant and throw away a part, at least, of what is bad. When we consent to it with such changes as we think best for our country's good, it will rest with the President whether the concurrence of other countries shall be sought. He can refuse or not, as he sees fit. If the world's heart is broken, he will break it. If the world's hope of peace shall die, he will kill it. Will he dare to do it; and if so, why?

We have a written Constitution. Other nations have not. Our powers are limited; theirs are not. The provisions of this covenant should be and must be construed in the light of this difference. If our agents have not protected the interests of our people, this body should do it. We should make it plain that we are not and can not be bound to do that which our Constitution says we can not do. We should not make the Constitution a cloak to shun duty or responsibility; but we must remember that it was adopted by the people for their own safety. Its limitations were imposed by them upon their representatives. There is a growing disregard for the Constitution that ought to be stopped. This is not confined to men of low degree. Men in high station spurn its restraints and limitations. If it stands in the way of what we want or what we think ought to be done, we say, "Away with it." Some time ago I received a letter from a minister of the gospel whom, of all men, should urge obedience and respect for law. He urged the ratification of this covenant as it was. I suggested that some serious constitutional objections had been made to it, and that I proposed to give them careful study. He wrote back suggesting that the Constitution is a very convenient excuse for opposition to the league, but, if the Constitution stands in the way, the Constitution must go. That is treason to this Republic and means the overthrow of orderly government. It would be a sad outcome of this war if one of its results should be the uprooting of the Government of the most perfect and efficient Republic of the world's history and the highest expression of democracy. That must not be.

As I said before, with the high and lofty purpose of this covenant every American is in hearty accord. The prevention of war and the maintenance of peace is the hope of the world. The empty sleeves and lost limbs, the sightless eyes and disfigured faces, the weakened bodies and bent forms of the best and bravest of the land, the bereaved mothers and wives and sorrowing homes, the mute headstones of the battle fields of Europe—all plead the horrors of war, and the burden of taxes through the ages will tell of its waste. Not everything labeled "peace," however, means peace. Human nature is the same to-day that it was a thousand years ago, and in any proposal for peace there may be the germs of war. The good should be kept, the bad thrown away. There is wisdom, too, in counsel. No man or set of men should assume to have all the wisdom of the world in themselves, and while the President of the United States is entitled to every consideration by virtue of his great ability and the high office which he holds, yet he does not combine within himself all the knowledge and wisdom of mankind, and his mere dictum that this treaty, without change, is the world's best hope is not all convincing.

Let us look at some of the terms and provisions of this covenant and the suggestions made to meet objections to them.

The British Empire has six votes and this Republic one. If there is one principle recognized as fundamental by all nations in their dealings with each other, it is that each nation is the equal of every other nation in its independence and as a sovereign entity, no matter how small its domain nor how great its power. All free and independent nations act and deal with each other as equals. This is essential to peace and harmony and has always been so until now. It is the great safeguard of small nations. This covenant destroys this principle of equality. It takes one nation and sets it apart by itself as a superior sovereignty, leaving all others upon the humble plane of equality. We have heretofore laughed or sneered at the bullying air of the Britisher, but we can not do it any more. We confess his superiority. We agree that Haiti and Hejaz are our equals, but confess that we are inferior to the British Empire. For the purposes of this covenant, the British Empire is recognized as six sovereignties, while this great Republic is but one. The British Empire is a perpetual member of the council and can prevent any action on any important matter by its one vote there. The British Empire is represented in the assembly by one vote, and it also has five other representatives, each one of which can block action upon almost any important matter. This is bound to give rise to charges of bad faith and double-dealing. It will lead to trouble, disputes, and to war. I would welcome Canada as an equal among the nations of the world, but until she is such let her take her proper place as a part of the British Empire and not have the power of an independent sovereignty in addition to her power and prestige as a part of the British Empire. Let the British Empire be not six but one sovereignty no greater than Hejaz, no less than the United States. This is fundamental in national dealings, and I shall never confess by my vote that this Nation is inferior to the British Empire in sovereignty. I will not justify the sneering claim in foreign lands, "An Englishman is superior to the American, and the American admits it."

Many peoples and nations are impressed by show, pomp, and claims of superiority. What a sorry showing we will make in the march of the world confessing to all our inferiority. An American may not be any better than the Arab of Hejaz, but he is the equal of any Englishman that ever trod the earth. If I confess otherwise I feel that I am unworthy to represent that citizenship. We have millions of naturalized citizens who are loyal patriotic Americans and believe their acquired citizenship to be the best on earth. What will they say, how will they feel, when they go to their old home and boast of their citizenship to have it pointed out to them that their own Government admits that they are inferior to the British? If there is anything in this covenant more insidiously dangerous than this invidious provision I do not know what it is. It makes intrigue and double-dealing easy and probable and will inevitably lead to disputes, charges of bad faith, and probably worse. If we have a dispute with the British Empire of course it will be transferred to the assembly under the covenant. We and the British Empire will stand aside but the five votes of Britain's parts will be cast against us. How can that be justified? In fact, in any dispute between the British Empire and any country such dispute will go to the assembly and the two disputants will have to stand aside, but still there will be five votes representing parts of the British Empire to vote on such dispute.

The President says this six-vote power of the British Empire is unimportant, but what are the facts? And I want to emphasize these facts. Every dispute between members of the league can be transferred to the assembly by either party to it. The action of the assembly is determined by a majority vote, excluding the disputants and including the concurrence of all the other members of the council represented in the assembly. In every dispute between other countries the British Empire and its parts have six votes and we have one. The possibilities of such power are many and great. In every dispute between the British Empire and any country other than ours the British Empire, through its parts, will have five votes. The other disputant will have none and we will have one. In any dispute between the British Empire and our country her parts would have five votes and we would have none. Is there any unbiased mind that can not see the substantial advantage to the British Empire of these six votes, and her superior importance in the eyes of all the other members of the league, and especially the small States?

I understand that a reservation has been prepared which will meet that phase of the situation. Mr. President, I do not know what may be the fate of that reservation, but I propose to vote at the first opportunity I have to do away, so far as I can, with this inferiority. If this amendment is not adopted, then, of course, I shall vote for the reservation. But, Mr. President, I do not see how any reservation can be prepared that will meet what, to my mind, is the fundamental feature of this discrimination—that is, the recognition of the superior sovereignty and superiority of the citizenship of the British Empire as compared with our own.

How does the President further answer this? He points to some fine Canadian fellows across the street and says, "Don't you think those fine fellows should be allowed a vote when we allow Panama and Cuba a vote?" Of course there is a loud shout of approval. But when the people go home and think about it they begin to feel "sheepish," as we say. The British Empire has one vote the same as Panama or the same as we. Canada is a part of the British Empire and so is represented by that vote. Why should they be given another vote and the Californian not? I am not concerned especially that the Canadian is made superior to the Panaman, but I would like to have it explained why he is made superior to the American. I would like to vote to reduce the British Empire to our level. The President has made it so that this is about impossible, and so I am going to vote to place this Nation on an equality with the highest. Our soldier boys did not fight and suffer in Europe to elevate British citizenship and debase Americanism. Others may vote this way and look them in the face and tell them they are the bravest soldiers and the finest citizens in the world, but I will not.

A vote for the covenant as it is, is to say officially that British citizenship and British sovereignty are superior to American citizenship and American sovereignty. That I will not do.

Mr. President, I listened with much interest to the splendid and able address of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. He has pointed out provisions in this treaty and compact which, construed in connection with the superior voting power of the British Empire, should have the most careful and the most earnest consideration of the Senate; and I think it will have before the treaty is finally acted upon.

No one claims that this is a perpetual league, even if it is hoped that it may be. It is not sought to create a new nation. The right of withdrawal is recognized. This is as it should be. No nation should be kept in if it is dissatisfied and wants to get out. To attempt to do so would mean trouble and war. There should be no uncertainty about this or how it is to be done. The right of withdrawal is expressly provided for upon two years' notice, but it does not stop with such a simple, plain declaration, but says:

Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

Who is to determine whether a nation has fulfilled its obligations or not? Must that be left to the council? If so, would one objection prevent a decision and thereby keep a nation in the league indefinitely against its will? Would we stay in a league if we wanted to get out? Surely not. Do we want others to decide for us when or how we shall get out? I think not. No one need fear that we will not comply with our obligations. We will do it just as surely out of the league as we will in it. Each nation should be the sole judge of when it shall withdraw, and if it withdraws from the league it should be held to its obligations in the same way as nations are usually held to their obligations. This should be made clear to avoid disputes. This will prevent war, promote peace, and bring joy to the heart of the world.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] the other day eloquently, forcefully, and strongly claimed that the compact means that each nation is the sole judge of its right to withdraw, that it meant this when it was originally presented, that it means it now, with the limitation that we can not go out except upon two years' notice. There are others, however, who contend that it does not appear plain that each nation is the sole judge as to when it shall withdraw. I am in favor of making it plain, not leaving it to a matter of construction by men in the future, who may look at these things differently from the Senator from Delaware, and who will look solely to the compact and the resolution of ratification to determine its meaning.

The American people prize the Monroe doctrine. They believe in it. They consider it essential to peace and feel that it has done much for their safety and for the safety of the Western Hemisphere. They will not consent to its impairment, and they insist that this covenant shall clearly and fully recognize it. The covenant says:

Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

I think this language does recognize the Monroe doctrine. Whether it is to be classed as a regional understanding or not, it is expressly recognized by name. Able, patriotic men, men of greater knowledge than I in international matters, have doubts about this. There should be no uncertainty upon a matter of such tremendous importance. Our understanding of it should be declared, so that all may know our position, and so that the men of the future may know it. This is certain. What the Monroe doctrine is is not defined. It was, no doubt, wise not to attempt to define it, but the United States should be expressly recognized as the sole judge of what the Monroe doctrine is. If a dispute should arise under the covenant, as it now is, as to its meaning, that dispute would go to the council, to arbitration, or to the assembly, and thus the whole Monroe doctrine be brought into question and rest upon the determination of other nations. This we will not permit. We should be the sole judge as to what the Monroe doctrine is. It is peculiarly our doctrine. We have announced it, we have made it, we enlarge it as occasion demands. We are the sole judges of its application. It is really a domestic policy declared, maintained, and followed for our own peace, safety, and protection. While it may not be a regional understanding, it is regional in its application. Our people cherish it as vital to their own defense and to the preservation of the Western Hemisphere from external aggression. They will not give it up; they will allow no one else to interpret it, and this should be made plain to all nations in any covenant we enter. Not only should it be recognized by name, but our right to interpret it and declare what it is should be clearly recognized. To do so is to promote peace, keep us out of war, and give added assurance to the mothers of the land that their boys will not be taken from peaceful homes to the battle front, either here or across the sea. To leave our position uncertain or doubtful in this respect is to increase the danger of disputes and war, with all that it means in broken hearts, desolated homes, and bloody battle fields. Common sense, human nature, and experience surely teach this. I shall vote for a reservation declaring clearly our position on this important question.

Some urge that the covenant brings domestic questions in one way or another within the jurisdiction of the league. The first draft, I thought, left this in doubt. This one, to my mind, does not. It now expressly provides:

If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council, to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

There are those, however, who, construing the covenant as a whole, do think that domestic questions may be made subject to the decision of the league. They are wise men, learned men, patriotic men. They may be right. I may be wrong. Why not make it so plain that there can be no doubt? What are domestic questions and how they shall be dealt with ought to be and must be determined by each nation for itself. Our people are not willing that any other nation or group of nations should tell us how we shall deal with immigration, tariff, education, naturalization, and other kindred questions. If they seek to do so there will be trouble. Is not it better for us, better for the world, and better for peace to leave nothing in this regard to uncertainty, nothing to construction, nothing to mere unexpressed or unrecorded understanding? I think so.

Article 10 is viciously attacked as subversive of our liberty of action, as requiring us to make war upon the command of other nations, and as compelling us to send our boys to fight on foreign soil in controversies in which we have no concern, and as depriving Congress of its power and discretion under the Constitution to make or not make war, as the occasion arises. Those who support article 10 do not advocate anything of this kind, but deny that it has any such meaning. Why not say so, then, beyond any controversy? If this is the crux of the whole covenant, as the President has so often stated, why not make its meaning plain if it can be done? Can we afford to deal lightly with any provision of such tremendous import? I can not grasp the motive or character of the man who would allow pride of opinion or devotion to a peculiar form of expression to trifle with the peace and destinies of nations. I do not see the dangers in article 10 that some fear, nor do I see the benefit from it that others point out, but I can see no excuse for not making plain what we understand it to require of us. It reads as follows:

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

In construing it we must keep in mind the provision relating to the unanimous action by the council, which is as follows:

Except where otherwise expressly provided in this covenant, or by the terms of the present treaty, decisions at any meeting of the assembly or of the council shall require the agreement of all the members of the league represented at the meeting.

Some construe the first sentence as if it stood alone. This can not be, because no nation is to act alone. The two sentences must be taken together to determine our obligation and how and when it shall be fulfilled.

No definite action can be or is to be taken under this article until the council advises what it is to be. We are a member of the council. The council can give no advice until all agree. If anything is sought of us we must agree to it before there is any advice from the council and before we can be required to do anything. If we do not think we should do anything, we are not bound to do it, legally or morally. Every nation that goes into the league knows that no member of the council is required to agree to any particular course of action, and if it does not do so it can not justly be charged with failure to comply with its agreement or with dishonorable action, and so, until our representative on the council agrees to some course of action we are not bound legally or morally to do anything.

There is no decision by the council until everybody agrees upon it. I may be dull; I may be obtuse; but I can see no other construction to be placed upon section 10. This I conceive would be the action under article 10 if a nation of Europe were to make an attack upon another. The council would be called together. If some member should propose that we send an army across the sea to cooperate with others, our representative would say, "No, gentlemen; this does not threaten our peace or safety; it is your own peculiar concern; you are near the scene of conflict; your peace and safety are affected; you can deal with it fully and more easily and cheaply than we can. Furthermore, I have no authority to declare or make war or raise armies. That must be done by Congress and I shall and can consent to nothing of this kind until Congress authorizes me to do so." This would be in harmony with our traditions and policies and with the Monroe doctrine and our Constitution, with both of which other nations and people must be presumed to be familiar.

"But," says some one, "what if it should be proposed that we send an army of a hundred thousand men across the sea to fight for some other country and our representative on the council should give its consent to it." Then, Mr. President, we would not be bound legally to do it, because neither the council nor any such representative can declare war for us. But if a nation can be bound morally to do what it is not legally bound to do, then we and Congress would be morally bound to do what our representative had given his consent to. It is easy for us to say now in grandiloquent fashion that every obligation we make we will fulfill. If we believe this we should be extremely careful what we promise; because I say, as my deliberate judgment, that no Congress of the United States will ever declare war and send an Army across the sea to fight in a cause that does not directly concern us and in which our peace and safety are not threatened, and the people would soon get rid of it if it did. Believing this, as I do, I shall vote to save my country from such an embarrassing situation. Let us make sure of our political independence; let us preserve inviolate our right of sovereign action; and let us save ourselves from the very appearance of dishonorable action. This makes for peace and not for war.

"But," some one says, "it is inconceivable that our representative would give his consent to anything of this kind." I have seen so many inconceivable things done of late years by men in high position that I am not willing to intrust the destiny and honor of our Republic and the lives of our sons to the will or discretion of any man acting in a foreign capital 4,000 miles away. I remember when a bill was pending in this body before we entered the war to pass the war-making power of Congress on to the President that a proposal was made to amend the bill by providing that certain things should not be done by the President. The Senator from Massachusetts opposed the amendment and said:

> I think it is very undesirable when we are asked by the President to give him certain powers to accompany the authority with a statement that he must not do that which he knows he can not do without committing an act of war and going beyond his constitutional powers. I see nothing to justify Congress in taking that position.

And when asked:

> You do not expect it to be done in this instance?

Mr. LODGE said:

> I certainly do not; far from it.

And yet within 10 days this very thing was done. No, Mr. President, the people wisely placed the making of war and the raising of armies in the control of their chosen representatives, and until they change it I want to see it kept there. When they say they want this power placed under the control of foreigners and a man appointed by the Executive and responsive only to his will, it will be all right. Our Nation will then cease to exist; Americanism will be gone. That day, Mr. President, will never come. The President said in one of his speeches that no one expected us to interfere, for instance, in disputes in the Balkans; that the nations near there would take care of such a situation. He also said that if such a dispute spread so that it became our concern we would enter it whether we were in the league or not. Then why have article 10 at all, and if we are to have it, why not express in clear terms this very idea, because it is the idea of the American people? It is the idea expressed by the President himself.

I have here the language of the President. I am going to read it. This is from the President's speech at Salt Lake City:

> Let us go into particulars, therefore. These gentlemen say, "We do not want the United States drawn into every little European squabble." Why, of course we do not, and under the league of nations it is entirely within our choice whether we will be or not.

Yet the other day the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] declared that our obligation under the first sentence of article 10 was complete, and that the only power that Congress had or the only discretion that it had was to determine whether external aggression had occurred, and then our obligation was complete. Yet the President said:

> Why, of course we do not, and under the league of nations it is entirely within our choice whether we will be or not.
> The normal processes of the action of the league are certainly to be this: When trouble arises in the Balkans, when somebody sets up a fire somewhere in Central Europe among those little nations which are, for the time being, looking upon one another with a good deal of jealousy and suspicion because the passions of the world have not cooled—whenever that happens the council of the league will confer as to the best method of putting out the fire.
> If you want to put out a fire in the Balkans, if you want to stamp out the smoldering flame in some part of Central Europe, you do not send to the United States for troops.

Well, we hope they would not do it; and if they did, we would not send them. But why put us in a position where, if the contention of some is correct, we may be called upon to do so?

The President further says:

> The council of the league selects the powers which are most ready, most available, most suitable, and selects them only at their own consent, so that the United States would in no such circumstances conceivably be drawn in, unless the flame spread to the world. And would they then be left out, even if they were not members of the league? You have seen the fire spread to the world once, and did not you go in? If you saw it spread again, if you saw human liberty again imperiled, would you wait to be a member of the league to go in?

Then, why do we need the league? Of what effect is it? Of course, so far as the provisions of article 10 are concerned, if the same conditions were to arise that arose two years ago we would go in, and probably we would go in much more promptly than we then did.

The President further says:

> Why, the whole thing goes directly to the conscience of the Nation. If the fight is big enough to draw the United States in, I predict that they will be drawn in anyhow; and if it is not big enough to bring them in inevitably, they can go in or stay out according to our own decision.

And yet the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] says that his judgment does not run counter to that of the President in the least. In the White House conference with the President, at the close of the discussion with reference to our obligations under article 10, this colloquy occurred:

> Senator BRANDEGEE. Then, on a call from the council for us to perform our international contract under article 10, if Congress does not favor performing it, you think we would not be subject to criticism by other members of the league?
>
> The PRESIDENT. Oh, we might be subject to criticism; but I think Congress would be at liberty to form its own judgment as to the circumstances.
>
> Senator BRANDEGEE. I agree with you entirely, and under our Constitution Congress would have to do so.
> The PRESIDENT. Yes; that is understood by all.

Well, Mr. President, let us write that understanding so that no man now or hereafter can misunderstand our position. We do not know what the construction of other nations may be. Future representatives of this and other countries may read it differently. Let us make it plain by a record that can not be misunderstood and that will never be erased. Article 10 ought not to be in this covenant at all. No clause, sentence, paragraph, or section of the covenant depends upon it. It could be taken out and the remainder stand unaffected. We would have a league of nations with all the powers and duties provided in the covenant except the provision against external aggression. If armaments are restricted, if disputes are arbitrated or settled by the council, what danger is there of aggression? I can see but little. That would be a splendid structure to start with. It would go a long way toward peace without pledging us to meddle in every aggressive attack anywhere in the world. Article 10, as now written, instead of being the heart of the league is a canker of discord. It is the safeguard of the fruits of an autocratic oligarchy.

The covenant is strangely silent as to the way of naming our representatives in the council and the assembly. This may mean nothing to the other countries, but under our system important appointments by the President usually must be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. One can only surmise that the President expects to assume the right to appoint these representatives without consulting with the Senate. This is in line with his methods and his studied disregard of the people's representatives. If this league of nations is to represent the peoples of the world, the members of the assembly and the council should be selected by the people, otherwise they will constitute simply an oligarchy representing the opinions and will of the appointing power. Our representatives should be men of the greatest ability, widest experience, unquestioned Americanism, and intensely alive to the needs of humanity. It is not theirs to represent the President of the United States but the people. They will hold within their power the very destinies of this Republic and they should be elected by the people and responsible only to them. Until this is provided by law, they should be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The resolution of ratification should contain the following provision, which I intend to offer, unless the chairman of the committee proposes something of the kind:

> That the representatives of the United States in the council and the assembly shall be appointed by the President and with the advice and consent of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

Shantung brings a blush of shame to the cheek of every honest man and will go down through the ages as the foulest blot upon our boasted civilization. China declared war upon Germany at the earnest solicitation of the allied nations and upon our most friendly assurances. Thousands of her citizens rendered humble but effective service in the war. When it ended she had no reason to expect treatment as an enemy country, but this is what she received. Japan coveted Shantung. It has those natural resources which she needs. She had made a secret agreement with England, France, and Italy under which they were to help her despoil their ally. When the war ended Japan claimed Shantung with its 40,000,000 people, its great area, vast resources, and a shrine precious to every Chinaman. This claim was upheld by the Allies. The United States protested, but finally gave way and sanctioned this international robbery and wrote the most dishonorable page in our history. It is a deed of eternal infamy. The price of our approval was Japan's signature to the covenant of the league of nations. One is led to wonder if anything good can come from a union secured by such dishonorable bargains. I do not want to be unjust to the President. He did not approve this crime. He does not do it now. No one justifies it. All denounce it, but what can be done? The committee presents an amendment restoring Shantung to China. It is inconceivable that Japan will acquiesce. She has Shantung and she will hold it. We will not go to war to make her give it up. She has promised to restore it to China. She may do so, but if she does I fear it will only be the shadow that China will get. What should we do? Shall we do not only a useless thing, but one that may also do a great deal of harm? Frankly, I do not know what I ought to do. If we adopt the amendment it may kill the treaty. I do not want to do that, and yet I shudder at the thought of making an eternal record of shame by voting to approve this infamy. I will not do so unless I am convinced that it is the wisest, the best, and the most patriotic thing to do. Nations go to war to save their honor. Can they afford to dishonor themselves in a victorious peace?

The President tells the people that failure to ratify the covenant is the cause of business disturbance and labor unrest. He expects the people to believe this, and that it will all disappear with ratification. This claim can not be disproved, but it is hard to characterize it properly and respectfully. Common sense and human experience reject it. England is in the throes of the greatest strike in its history, even though it has ratified the treaty. Nothing in the dispatches indicates that the covenant for a league of nations has had anything to do with bringing about this controversy. Of course, a more settled and certain condition will come when this matter is disposed of, and I am sure the Senate desires to dispose of it as soon as it can be done with the consideration due such an important matter. Personally I am ready and anxious to vote upon it, and would gladly have foregone these remarks if it would have hastened a vote. When this treaty is disposed of there will confront us for solution the greatest and most difficult questions that ever confronted any people. They will tax our ability, our wisdom, our statesmanship, and our patriotism to the utmost, and whether we accept or reject this covenant will have but little effect upon these problems, but we ought to give them consideration without delay.

The President tells the people that the world will sink into chaos if the United States does not enter the league of nations, and hopes to frighten the people to force the Senate to action. The Senate will give its consent to the covenant, and if the United States does not enter the league the President will be the one that prevents it and not the Senate. The danger to the covenant to-day comes from the President himself. It rests with him and the friends of a league of nations whether we enter it or not. He insists that the covenant must be accepted by the Senate exactly as he has sent it to us. I know and his friends know and he ought to know that if reservations are not adopted the covenant will be rejected in its entirety. If, instead of trying to arouse the people against the Senate, he would seek to reach a fair and honorable understanding with it, there would be but little trouble. Senators are just as devoted to the cause of peace as he. They abhor war as intensely as he. They love humanity and seek to alleviate its sorrows and sufferings as much as he. They are as patriotic and as devoted to the interests of this country as he and they are as proud of its leadership and as jealous of its standing among the nations of the world as he. Many of them are as able, as learned, and as experienced in statesmanship and international relations as he, if not more so. They would welcome his cooperation. While he has been seeking to arouse the people against them, Senators have been studying the questions, counseling together; and not as partisans, but as patriots and Americans they have determined that reservations must be made to safeguard the rights, the welfare, the peace, and honor of this country. These reservations are going to be adopted. The Senate will give its consent to the treaty with its patriotic advice, and if the treaty is not ratified and the United States fails to enter the league of nations Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, alone will prevent it. He can do so if he will. When the Senate acts the question will indeed be presented to him to "ratify or reject." He, and he alone, will have to meet that issue. He can refuse to ratify and kill the treaty and compact, but the people, posterity, humanity, and the world will know that he did it rather than accept any change. His party friends know that this is the situation in the Senate. They should tell him plainly, bluntly, and promptly of it when he is able to receive that advice. We hope this may be soon, and every Senator is praying for the speedy recovery of the President from the illness which has now overtaken him.

The President says he does not want to go "hat-in-hand" to Germany and beg her to approve any reservations. Nobody wants to do it. He would not have to do it; but he ought to have thought of this before entwining the covenant in the treaty. Germany is not a member of the league of nations. She is not one of the signatories to the covenant. She has not been invited to enter the league; she may never be admitted to it, but when she does come in she will have to accept the covenant as it is at the time she is admitted. Now she is not concerned in it. If any of the provisions of the treaty dependent upon the covenant were changed by these reservations, she might have to approve such changes; but she is not interested at all in the terms of the covenant. The Senator from Montana said a few days ago that "we can amend this covenant in any way that we see fit without consulting Germany the day after we ratify the treaty, but that we can make no change in it now without Germany's consent." That is too profound for me. I can not see any justice or logic in it. The allied nations are the only ones interested. They will approve without delay if they need the league as the President says they do, and when they approve Germany can not complain. Even if her consent must be had, the supreme council can order her to give it as it ordered her a short time ago to change her constitution. She would accede just as she acceded to that request. She signed this treaty under orders, and if her further consent is necessary to any reservations we may make, that consent should be given under orders, and will be given. Surely the people that sent 3,000,000 men to conquer Germany are not now to be frightened by the vanquished. Germany can not scare us into a treaty which we do not want when she could not resist our boys on the battle field.

The strength of the desire in this country for a league of nations rests upon the wish to avoid war and keep our boys at home. The President makes his strongest plea when he says he does not want our boys in khaki to be sent across the sea to fight and die. Of course, he does not want this done; neither do I, nor does any Senator on this floor, whether on the other side of the aisle or on this side.

He says if we do not take this covenant as it is, our boys must go to war. I say that if the meaning of this covenant is made certain and clear, peace is made more sure. Which is right? The President stands for uncertainty. I plead for certainty. Uncertainty in compacts leads to disputes among nations. Disputes lead to war. Clearness and certainty make for peace and harmony. I appeal to the good sense of our people to say which policy will more surely keep our boys at home.

What do the boys in khaki say about it? They do not want to go back. They are also largely against the league of nations. They did their work well, but they do not want to go back to settle any disputes in Europe that do not involve our safety and security, and they believe the league ties us to the quarrels and disputes of Europe. They resent the delay in making peace, and this is one reason why they are against the covenant. I admit that it is not a very valid argument against it. I admit that it is not very logical, yet it is a very natural reason. As one said to me, "We could see no reason to take as long to make the treaty as it took us to whip the Hun when we got at it." Did you ever think that this is true? Chateau-Thierry was fought in the middle of July. On November 11, less than four months later, Germany was on her knees. The peace treaty was not signed until June 28, 1919, or over seven months from the signing of the armistice. It took our boys less than four months to whip Germany, and it took the President more than seven months to make a treaty of peace.

Mr. President, the heart of this covenant is not force and coercion, but public conciliation, open consideration of international disputes and provision for their settlement by arbitration and unanimous action. The Senate will keep the good in this covenant. We are heartily in favor of public discussion of international disputes and their settlement by conciliation and arbitration. Harmony and good feeling will be fostered among nations by the action taken here. The moral forces of the world will be marshaled for peace. Our Nation will act freely and disinterestedly and contribute of its wealth, resources, and power for the rehabilitation and stability of the world and the preservation of its civilization. Our political independence will be maintained, our sovereignty unimpaired, and real, genuine unalloyed Americanism will lead the world from the horrors of war into the bright sunlight of universal peace.

Mr. President, when I cast my vote on this treaty and the reservations and amendments thereto I can go home and look every mother, wife, sister, and sweetheart in the eye without flinching and say to them that I voted my convictions as to what is best to keep their loved ones at home and out of war; and I can say to every American citizen that I voted in the way I thought best to put the wealth, power, resources, and influence of this great country back of world peace and at the same time insure our peace and tranquillity, preserve our sovereignty and independence under the Constitution of the fathers, save our Nation from any charge of dishonor under this covenant and treaty, and make him proud to be an American.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if any Member of this body were asked to name a half dozen of the most distinguished lawyers of this body I think there would always be included in that half dozen the names of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. This week the Senate has had the benefit of the construction by each of those distinguished Senators of article 10 as they viewed it; and I wish to take a little of the time of the Senate in bringing before it the constructions that these Senators have given to this article.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], in his speech of last Wednesday, after discussing article 10 at some length, used this language:

> These considerations therefore prompt me to take the view that, considered in the light of the whole covenant and its purposes, several action on the initiative of the respective nations in keeping article 10 is in no wise contemplated. In other words, whatever is done or suggested to be done in keeping the obligations of article 10 is to be the result of the common judgment of the council, arrived at after joint deliberation.
>
> Aside from these general considerations, I am, in the second place, forcibly led to the conclusion that the obligation of the first sentence of the article does not rest individually on the nations, because of the peculiar language of the second sentence. That sentence provides:
>
> "In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled."
>
> If there is external aggression by one nation against another, then the case occurs which article 10 contemplates. When a contract provides what shall be done in a certain case, it is a sound rule of construction that nothing other than that provided shall be done. The principle falls within the legal rule of "Expressio unius exclusio alterius." Now, in the case of external aggression, the article provides that the council shall advise upon the means by which the obligation is to be fulfilled. This clearly and unmistakably conveys the idea that where there is external aggression by one nation against another anything that is to be done in that case under the league covenant in repelling the aggression and righting the wrong is to be done only within the scope of the advice given by the council.
> By the express language of the article, therefore, as contained in this last sentence, in addition to the general considerations applicable, the conclusion seems to me to be beyond all peradventure of doubt that there is no obligation upon any member of the league to do anything in obedience of article 10 except as it falls within the program laid down by the council in the giving of the advice.

A little later he said:

> Therefore it seems clear to me that when the external aggression has been committed by one nation in violation of the provisions of article 10, no duty rests on any member of the league to immediately rush to the defense of the aggrieved nation; that the council, in considering the case, can only give advice, in which case still there is no duty upon any particular nation to follow the advice.

In other words, the distinguished Senator from Delaware so construes article 10 that there is no obligation whatever upon the individual nations to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any member of the league.

Now, let us see what is the construction of the distinguished Senator from Montana, given just two days previous to the speech of the Senator from Delaware upon this same article.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] states:

> Under the first sentence of article 10, I repeat, our obligation is absolute and perfect whenever a war of aggression is made against any other member of the league.

And a few moments later he said:

> I assert that whenever this country is in any manner called upon, or it is suggested that its obligation under article 10 has arisen, the Congress of the United States determines whether the condition set out under article 10 exists, namely, whether the territorial integrity and existing political independence of another member of the league is threatened by aggression. If it is, then it is the duty of the United States, under this treaty, to do whatever is reasonably necessary upon its part to prevent that threat from being accomplished.

The Senator from Delaware undertakes to show that under article 10 there is no obligation, but that the United States is a free agent. The Senator from Montana, on the other hand, construes the obligation as absolute and several.

After giving the construction of both of those Senators, may I read, Mr. President, just a few words from a speech of President Wilson delivered at Des Moines on September 6, 1919? He says:

> I have been a student of the English language all my life, and I do not see a single obscure sentence in the whole document. Some gentlemen either have not read it or do not understand the English language; but, fortunately, on the right-hand page it is printed in English and on the left-hand page it is printed in French. Now, if they do not understand English, I hope they will get a French dictionary and dig out the meaning on that side.

Mr. President, it is not for me to suggest which of the distinguished Senators—the Senator from Montana or the Senator from Delaware—merits this criticism of the President. It is not for me to suggest which one of them he charges with not being able to understand the English language. It is not for me to suggest which of those distinguished Senators he thinks ought to study the French version, not being able to understand the English one; but it would seem, Mr. President, that because of the directly opposite constructions given by these two distinguished Senators, President Wilson thinks that one of them should be put in the kindergarten class.

Mr. President, that was what I rose to call attention to. I want to add just this word, however:

That construction given by the Senator from Delaware, if it merited that construction, would leave article 10 exactly where the reservation that is proposed would leave it. The reservation that the President denounced at Salt Lake City would give article 10 the exact meaning that the Senator from Delaware says that it now has. If that be so, with the Senator's distinguished colleague giving it a different construction, why should the Senator from Delaware object to a reservation giving his construction? If, on the other hand, the Senator from Montana has given the correct construction of article 10—and I feel very sure that he has—I agree with him fully that the obligation of the first sentence of article 10 is absolute; that our obligation is several as well as joint. I agree with him that if the treaty be ratified without amendment or reservation, whenever the occasion arises, whenever the territorial integrity of any member of the league shall be impaired or its political independence destroyed, the United States will not be permitted to inquire into the justice of the cause or the merits of the controversy. As he states, there will be but one question that the United States would be permitted to determine, and that is whether there has been an external aggression. If the answer be in the affirmative, all of the forces of the United States must be used to restore that territorial integrity or political independence.

As I believe that that is the correct construction, it is amazing to me that a single Senator on either side of the aisle would for a moment contemplate obligating the United States to the extent that article 10 commits us.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourned until Monday, October 6, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, October 3, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, source of every high and noble impulse, quicken our minds and hearts by Thy spirit, that we may go forward with the new day to larger conquests and achievements for ourselves as individuals and for our Republic, that the world may be a little better that we have thought and acted.

The heart of the Nation is stirred with anxiety and sympathy for our President and his family. Touch him, we pray Thee, with Thy healing hand and restore him to health and activity, for Thine is the Kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BOLSHEVISM.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in the form of resolutions adopted by the Society of the Sons of the Revolution of the State of California and remarks by Harry F. Atwood on the subject of Bolshevism.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is this the same request that the gentleman brought in yesterday?

Mr. OSBORNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARD. They are matters of resolutions from military posts in his State?

Mr. OSBORNE. No. It is the Society of the Sons of the Revolution from the State of California.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I hope my colleague will not object.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection. What are the other remarks that the gentleman refers to?

Mr. OSBORNE. It is a brief address by Mr. Harry F. Atwood. I think there are about five or six hundred words in it. It is a very striking address on Bolshevism—against Bolshevism.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I objected yesterday temporarily, but if there is nothing in the instrument but what is strongly American I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the documents referred to:

THE FOREIGN INVASION OF THE UNITED STATES.

PART I.

Resolutions adopted by Society Sons of Revolution, State of California.

Whereas the Government of the United States is based upon certain fundamental principles, insuring as nearly as possible equal human rights without class or distinction within the limits of human endowment; and

Whereas in the 143 years of its existence it has been the active exponent of such ideals, and should continue to be the same for all time; and

Whereas there unfortunately has grown up through a neglect of its citizens and Government a failure to learn and understand and appreciate the fundamentals on which this Government was established. A large element in our midst whose ancestors have for hundreds of years past been subjected to a greater or lesser degree of practical slavery and subjection to a privileged ruling class in other lands have not been in this country a sufficient length of time to have strongly ingrained into their natures the real ideals and purposes of our republican form of government, but still retain a wrongly conceived feeling which they inherited from the homeland from which their ancestors fled or came. Moreover, without any wrong intent within themselves, a large number of these citizens, because of a lack of a clear understanding and appreciation of the real and true conditions, have and continue to take a view of the Government of the United States that is not representatively an American idea, but a foreign thought not consistent with the true welfare of our country and Government; and

Whereas many of these in the fullness of their honest beliefs and entirely within their rights have banded together, some as capitalists, some as labor, some in other groups, each seeking his or her own personal advancement, no matter at what expense it may be to the great mass of citizens not affiliated in any way with any of these groups, but the accomplishment of the purposes and personal aims of any or all of said groups, is unquestionably at the ultimate expense of the great majority, who in this country of government by majorities are the real sufferers; and

Whereas that the purposes for which this Republic was founded and the Constitution upon which it is based may not be prostituted in behalf of any group or class, no matter for what it stands, if it does not actually represent a majority of the citizens of the United States acting within their rights as defined by the Constitution; and

Whereas that the authority and sanctity of the ideals of our Government, and that for which it stands, shall now and at all times in the future, as in the past, be above reproach and violation, or attempt at violation or question as to its final and fundamental rights and authority in all matters, it being a representative form of government, and that it shall at all times be the final authority in this land, undisputed or unquestioned, as well as unstained; and

Whereas anyone, either citizen or alien, within our border who may offer comfort and assistance to a foe or another country or element that is undermining our Government or opposing its maintenance and existence is a traitor to the Government and country; any attempt to undermine the Government in any way is treason, whether the attempt be individual or collective; and

Whereas that no opportunity should be given whereby acts that may be or are treasonable shall be encouraged or tolerated and the foundations of authority of the Federal, State, or municipal government be infringed upon or the authority of the Government in its operation be impaired or questioned by any of its citizens, visitors, or employees in a way that will impair the continuous operations and efficiency of each and every department at all times: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we call upon the constituted Government of this country, consisting of the Congress of the United States, its Executive, and judiciary, to at all times keep before it the principles upon which this Government was founded and maintain the constitutional principles of this Republic; and be it further

Resolved, That Congress be warned not to enact any laws, adopt any resolutions, or in any way permit any functions of the Government to come within the control or influence of any class, minority group, or organization, whether it represent all those intimately interested in such special department or not, that may or can possibly impair the fullest authority and freedom of the Government in its control in all things and at all times; and be it further

Resolved, That the Government of the United States for the purpose of preventing the possibility of any such influences from coming into control of any departments of the Government or its functions now or at any time, and thereby giving an opportunity for the questioning of the authority of the Government's control, which should be absolutely unquestioned, do not sanction the purchase or ownership or nationalizing by the Government of any of the public utilities not already so owned, unless Congress find it absolutely essential to secure ownership of or to take over such public utility at any time, in which case it should clearly specify that no employee of such utility who may go with the Government shall retain his membership in any organization or group that stands for similar or allied purposes in civilian life so long he remains with the Government, because loyalty in governmental service is loyalty to one's country, and such loyalty will not permit of a divided allegiance: And provided further, That all public utilities not owned by the Government shall be subject to Government control and regulation and for a full security of the vested authority possessed by the Government of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That all employees of the Government be enrolled under some form of enlistment, and that any employee or group of employees leaving or shirking their work without authorized permission shall be classed as a deserter; anyone urging or attempting to urge a Government employee or employees to leave or shirk their work shall be classed as a traitor and dealt with accordingly. And that the Congress of the United States create a means whereby full justice shall be done to each and every employee and worker of the Government in its hours of labor, its surroundings, and compensations, and for this purpose it is recommended that a bureau, department, or other means be created, whereby all inequalities or unfair conditions and compensations may be taken up and considered for either individuals or groups through properly provided means, and the same adjusted in a way consistent with the conditions and costs of living at the time. That this bureau be compelled to act promptly on all complaints, and without fear or favor, the same being nonappointive but civil service in selection; and that a system of pension be provided for all employees faithfully discharging their duties for a certain number of years; and be it further

Resolved, That Congress provide by act that all employees in the Government service shall take a special oath of allegiance to the Government, and also provide that any failure to carry out instructions of the Government through refusal or willful neglect in their work, either individually or collectively, shall be classed as a form of treason against the Government, which act shall carry with it as penalty a big fine and long imprisonment. Also that only benevolent and social organizations shall be permitted among Government employees, which organization shall not be permitted to affiliate with other organizations in other departments of the Government or with civilian organizations of any nature whatsoever; and be it further

Resolved, That the Society Sons of the Revolution in the State of California, a society standing for the purest patriotism and the absolute support of the Government, without fear or favor, which is a strictly nonpartisan and nonsectarian organization, adopt and ratify, by its board of directors, these resolutions as expressing the sentiment and will of its membership, and that the same be ordered printed and copies sent to the President of the United States, the Members of the United States Congress, the Supreme Court of the United States, the governors of the several States, and the press of the country for their consideration and guidance in the important matters coming before them, both at this time and in the future; and be it further

Resolved, That the Society Sons of the Revolution in the State of California call upon all organizations and groups whose loyalty and vision is ahead of self-interest to adopt resolutions of protest against changing or weakening the original representative form of our Government and send to all Members of Congress, the President of the United States, the United States courts, the governors of the several States, and the press of the country to show that the sentiment of the great mass of American citizens is for an unhampered Government in absolute control of all functions at all times, and that class interest, no matter whether capital, labor, or anything else, must remain in its place in civil life alone and not attempt to interfere with the freedom of the functions of the Government's workings.

BOLSHEVISM AND ITS ANTIDOTE—OUR CONSTITUTION.

(By Harry F. Atwood, author of "Back to the Republic.")

PART II.

It is a rather startling statement, but it is an indisputable fact, that during all the thousands of years prior to the writing of our Constitution and the founding of this Republic there was no government to which the historian could point and truthfully say, "There was a government that worked well."

Now, while that is an unusual statement, it is just as true as it would be if I should say that prior to the evolving of the 10 digits there was no system of mathematics to which the historian could point and truthfully say, "There was a system of mathematics that worked well."

During all those thousands of years the pendulum of government was swinging back and forth from one extreme to the other, just as it has done recently in Russia and is now doing in Germany, swinging back and forth from the extreme of autocracy, which has always resulted in tyranny, to the extreme of democracy, which has always resulted in chaos.

Since that word has been used so frequently and so much during recent years, I want to pause just long enough to say that it is an innovation in the life of this country to refer to our Government as a democracy. Up to 19 years ago we scarcely—I might almost say never—referred to our Government as a democracy. The men who founded this Government were more fearful of democracy than they were of autocracy, and said so just as clearly as I am talking now.

They made a very clear distinction between a republic and a democracy, and said that they had founded a Republic; and in order that there may be no misunderstanding, I want to read exactly what they did say. You will recall that after the Constitution was written, Hamilton, Jay, and Madison were appointed to interpret the work, and in the Federalist Madison says:

"What, then, are the distinctive characteristics of the republican form? Were an answer to this to be sought, not by recurring to principles, but in the application of the term by political writers, to the constitutions of different States, no satisfactory one would ever be found.

"Holland, in which no particle of the supreme authority is derived from the people, has passed almost universally under the denomination of a republic. The same title has been bestowed on Venice, where absolute power over the great body of the people is exercised, in the most absolute manner, by a small body of hereditary nobles.

"Poland, which is a mixture of aristocracy and monarchy in their worst forms, has been dignified with the same appellation. The Government of England, which has one republican branch only, combined with an hereditary aristocracy and monarchy, has with equal impropriety been frequently placed on the list of republics. These examples, which are nearly as dissimilar to each other as to a genuine republic, show the extreme inaccuracy with which the term has been used in political disquisitions."

The above quotation indicates how forcefully Madison called attention to the gross misuse of the word "republic" in his day. He was very jealous of the use of the term. He was extremely conscious and justly proud of having played an important part in helping to found the first republic in history. He knew the difference between an autocracy and a republic, and he objected to having autocracies spoken of as republics. He also understood quite clearly the difference between a republic and a democracy. His description of democracies is a splendid word picture of the Russia of to-day. Again, in the Federalist, he said:

"Hence it is that such democracies have ever been spectacles of turbulence and contention; have ever been found incompatible with personal security or the rights of property, and have in general been as short in their lives as they have been violent in their deaths. Theoretic politicians, who have patronized this species of government, have erroneously supposed that by reducing mankind to perfect equality in their political rights, they would, at the same time, be perfectly equalized and assimilated in their professions, their opinions, and their passions. * * * A republic, by which I mean a government in which the scheme of representation takes place, opens a different prospect, and promises the cure for which we are seeking. * * * The two great points of difference between a democracy and a republic are, first," etc.

I just raise that point to make it clear that the men who founded this Government had no thought of founding a democracy, and, while this may seem a rather extravagant statement, I believe that 75 per cent of the ills from which we have been suffering during the last 18 or 19 years are due to the prevalent misuse of the word democracy. I said to a man some time ago, just as an illustration, that Lincoln never used the word. This man had written a book of 600 pages on the life of Lincoln, and said he had used it often.

I asked him to find it. He made a search and found where Lincoln had used it once.

DYESTUFFS LETTERS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from the Hon. John J. Fitzgerald, formerly a Member of the House; also a letter from Hon. Herman A. Metz, also formerly a Member of the House; and a third letter from Hon. Victor Murdock, formerly a Member of Congress, now Acting Director of the Federal Trade Commission, all on the same subject of dyestuffs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting letters relative to dyestuffs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the letters referred to:

MR. FITZGERALD'S LETTER.

NEW YORK, September 29, 1919.

The Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MOORE: On September 26, 1919, in the debate on H. R. 8078, the so-called "dyestuffs bill," you appear on page 5991 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in referring to some affairs of Mr. Herman A. Metz, as having spoken as follows:

"One of the attorneys who is taking his property to-day is one of the numerous attorneys who were employed by the Alien Property Custodian, our former colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. John J. Fitzgerald."

I am ignorant of the source from which you obtained the information upon which you based that statement. So that there may be no misunderstanding about my relation to the situation, however, permit me to inform you that I have been acting as Mr. Metz's attorney in connection with his controversies with the Alien Property Custodian. Instead of "taking" his property, in association with other attorneys, I have endeavored to persuade the Alien Property Custodian that Mr. Metz's properties were not subject to seizure under the trading-with-the-enemy act.

The Alien Property Custodian determined that the stock of the Farbwerke Hoechst Co. was alien-enemy owned, and demanded its surrender by Mr. Metz. At the time of the surrender of the stock Mr. Metz suggested that I be designated by the Alien Property Custodian as a director of the company. This request was denied, but by agreement between Mr. Metz and the Alien Property Custodian I was selected by the directors installed by him as one of the counsel for the company.

Believing that you would not intentionally misrepresent my relationship to any matter, I have confidence that you will place this communication in the RECORD so that my connection with Mr. Metz's affairs will be given the same publicity as your unintentional misstatement has obtained.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN J. FITZGERALD.

LETTER FROM MR. METZ.

NEW YORK, October 2, 1919.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Mr. Fitzgerald sent me a copy of his letter to you and I wrote you that what he said was true and I confirmed it in all respects. While literally this is so, technically possibly it may not be, for the following reason, and I will give you the whole matter in detail:

Mr. Fitzgerald told me, I think in October of last year, that he had heard that the A. P. C. was going to take over my company—that is, the Farbwerke-Hoechst Co.—and that he wanted me to know about it and if he could help me any he would be glad to do so. I explained the circumstances to Mr. Fitzgerald, and he did go with me to see Mr. Garvan, after Garvan had made his demand for three of my concerns. I had previously made a full statement of the history of my concerns to the Information Bureau of the War Trade Board, and when Mr. Choate, of the A. P. C.'s office, began to inquire into the status of the company he had this report, and I gave him everything I had bearing in any way upon my business and all of my concerns. He asked me then, as they had no funds, whether I would permit their accountants to come in and verify my statements at my own expense. To this I gladly consented. But after the accountants had been here a few days and after the amendment—of November 4, I think—was passed at 6 o'clock on Saturday night, two days before the armistice was signed, I was served with a demand for all three concerns at my country place, to which the accountants came for the purpose of serving it. I called up Senator O'Gorman and told him what had happened, and he assured me that examinations of this sort were being made all over and that it meant nothing, and that the facts would be proven; and he advised me to accept the service and comply with the demand, as I would have my redress in court and I would not be damaged any, except the possible expense I might be put to. It was thereafter that Fitzgerald went with me to see Garvin, and Garvin told me immediately that there was a broader question involved than simply my company; that apparently I was of the opinion that colors could not be made on this side and that they had determined the industry should be established and that all German connections and influence should be wiped out; but that he was willing, pending the completion of the investigation, to allow the stock of my companies to remain in escrow with Fitzgerald under an agreement that upon the completion of his investigation Fitzgerald would hand it back to me and I could then determine what course to pursue in case he renewed his demand. To this I also readily consented, because I knew I had nothing to fear if the investigation was to be on the level and as I had Garvin's special promise that there would be no publicity, because publicity or even the intimation of German interests would hurt my business and interfere with it greatly. I was assured that nothing of the sort would be done. You and I know how much publicity there has been in the articles that have appeared in the lay press, in the magazines, and everywhere else, and at speeches delivered at banquets by Palmer, Garvan, and Choate.

The investigation continued until March, 1919, and the accountants' report was revised once or twice. The first report was so raw that not even Garvan would stand for it, and the men who really made the examination protested. The man who made it was the $100-a-day man who was here occasionally once a week, for a few minutes, and sometimes not at all for four weeks, while he was sick in Atlantic City. On the strength of the draft of the first report, my counsel, Mr. Vandiver, Senator O'Gorman, and Fitzgerald went to see Garvan and protested against the language of the report as absolutely unjust and unwarranted and doing me irreparable injury. Thereupon some of the most objectionable matter was stricken out, and the report was finally made as it appeared in the printed report of the Alien Property Custodian. One item, however, which appeared in the original draft was left out of the final report, and that was to the effect that no evidence had been found to indicate that there was any foreign interest whatever in the H. A. Metz laboratories. Garvan decided that in order to clean up the "Big Six" he would take over the Farbwerke-Hoechst Co., which was only a shell, as it had done no business for over a year (I having dropped it because of its foreign name and the antagonisms it aroused), and that there would be no publicity; and that he was also taking over the Badische Co. and the Casella Color Co.; and that my other two concerns would be cleared and given back to me, and that instead of being injured by his action I would be benefited by the fact that he had released these two companies after investigation, and that this would be the best advertisement I could possibly get.

Garvan consulted with me and suggested the names of certain gentlemen to be put in as directors of the Farbwerke-Hoechst Co., to which I agreed, assuming that they were fair-minded and did not want to injure my interests. When the men were finally appointed there were several changes. I suggested Fitzgerald to be one of the directors, but Garvan made him attorney for the company, and also put in Isadore Kressel, a former associate of his in the district attorney's office. The proceedings of the first meeting of the directors appeared in my bill of complaint against Garvan and are published in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee. Fitzgerald, as an attorney and to some extent, at least, as representing me in the matter, as well as the Alien Property Custodian, expressed the opinion right along, and in the arguments with Garvin above referred to, when Senator O'Gorman and Mr. Vandiver were present, also argued, that there was no reason to take over these companies. After this was decided and I approached Mr. Garvan and asked him to release the other two companies, he told me he was ready to do so, but that he wanted the directors of the Farbwerke-Hoechst Co. to look into the matter and have them recommend that there was no connection. A committee of the directors was appointed, but they never met for the purpose, and I was informed that Mr. Kressel, without consulting the directors, had written an opinion that although there was no direct evidence of any connection with the two concerns, nevertheless they should be seized and compel me to go to court to prove my case. This is practically what his report amounted to. I protested against this report to Fitzgerald at the time and telegraphed him to Washington, as follows:

"Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
"New Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

"Understand from Kressel he will report against me. I hope Garvin won't perpetrate this outrage, for it will do irreparable damage. It is unfair and unjust and he knows it.

"(Signed) METZ."

A meeting was called of the directors, to meet at my office, but on the morning of the same day my counsel appeared in court and submitted my bill of complaint. Besides the district attorney, Col. Rand (also a former associate of Mr. Garvan's in the district attorney's office) appeared as special counsel. This, of course, stopped further proceedings, although Mr. Tibbetts, an assistant of Mr. Kressel and now secretary of the Farbwerke-Hoechst Co., told me that he was about to have a resolution passed allowing $2,500 counsel fee each to Mr. Kressel and Mr. Fitzgerald. I told him I had gotten through paying any fees of any kind to anybody, and that if the directors voted any such salary or any such compensation I would hold them personally responsible. The meeting referred to above was called for 2 o'clock that afternoon. Mr. Kerr, who was elected president of the company, Mr. Prial, and Mr. Fitzgerald appeared at the meeting, but as there was no quorum nothing was done. The proposed report of Mr Kressel was discussed by Mr. Kerr and Mr. Fitzgerald, and both of them passed upon it as unwarranted. Mr. Kerr said that he had gone into the matter very carefully, and that in his opinion there might exist claim for an accounting on the part of the Farbwerke-Hoechst Co. against me personally because of the contract of 1912 with the firm abroad. I have never objected to any such construction. If I owe the people abroad anything the A. P. C. as conservor of their property is entitled to it, but my books show that instead of my owing the firm abroad money they owe me several hundred thousand dollars for payment of goods in anticipation of shipments and for part of the profits accrued to me from goods shipped here on the submarines and on British permits during 1915–16. After this meeting nothing further occurred. The Farbwerke-Hoechst case was set for August, was postponed until September by stipulation, and again postponed until October 6 by stipulation. In the meantime nothing happened until I appeared in Washington before your committee and the resulting controversy with Mr. Garvan because of your attitude on the Chemical Foundation and his other activities. Mr. Fitzgerald still holds the two stocks in escrow, but the status of the companies remains exactly as it was, and I have gone on doing business despite the handicap placed upon me by the insinuations and intimations whispered around by competitors because of the attacks and articles by Mr. Palmer, Mr. Garvan and Mr. Choate. I have drawn no dividends, but have allowed whatever profits there have been to accumulate. I have gone on, especially in the laboratories, increasing our production and improving our salvarsan and novocain, working in cooperation with Prof. Stieglitz and the Public Health Service, till better products at a lower price are made than can be obtained anywhere else on earth. What the effect of Mr. Garvan's demand for the two companies at this late stage will have upon the business of the laboratories can easily be imagined. It is bound to be harmful and serious. I have a large accumulation of evidence now from all over the country about the prejudice which his stories have already aroused on the part of many consumers, largely because of the fact that as a man in public life my name is well known throughout the country. My connection with the dyestuff business, dating over 35 years, is also known, and nine times out of ten any accusation made against any of the German concerns—and you will note he always bunches them—brings to the public mind my connection, and no one else's, so that I have been made the "goat," and irreparable damage all along the line has been done to me and my companies.

I defy Mr. Garvan, Mr. Choate, or anyone else to point out a single instance in which I or the concerns I control have, directly or indirectly, done a single thing that can be criticized from the viewpoint of loyalty, integrity, or absolute Americanism. * * * This last act in retaliation of my daring to differ with them in their procedure in the attempts to do that which will build up a monopoly of the worst kind here has brought about this sudden demand for my other two companies.

It will interest you to know that Judge Hough, of the Federal court, on September 30, has granted an order to show cause why these proceedings should not be stayed, pending the determination of the suit already begun, and that same was returnable on October 10. My case is in the hands of Messrs. O'Gorman, Battle & Vandiver, and I will undoubtedly have other eminent counsel, because I am determined to go the limit against this outrage which is being perpetrated against an American citizen in pursuance of the "policy" of a public official, nowise within his province or in the scope of the authority conferred upon him by law. I have not discussed the matter with Mr. Fitzgerald since I sent him my telegram, and in the meantime he continues to hold the stock in escrow and remains counsel of the Farbwerke-Hoechst Co. on behalf of the directors appointed by Mr. Garvan, and therefore to the extent to which I consulted him and that he appeared with Senator O'Gorman before Garvan in my behalf upon the filing of the report of the accountants he represented me and acted as my counsel.

I am giving you this in detail because in this matter all the facts are essential to show the ramifications of the entire case.

Yours, very truly,

H. A. METZ.

MR. MURDOCK'S STATEMENT.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, September 27, 1919.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In connection with discussion of the Longworth dyestuffs bill (H. R. 8078) my attention has been drawn to your reference to the Federal Trade Commission, quoted on pages 5811 of the RECORD of September 23, by reason whereof I desire to set before you certain facts, as follows:

As stated in the RECORD, approximately 4,500 patents were transferred by the Alien Property Custodian to the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), under certain of which patents licenses had been granted by this commission pursuant to the authority vested in it by the act of October 6, 1917, known as the "enemy-trade act," and the Executive order of October 12, 1917.

Acting without the knowledge of the commission and without any consultation upon the subject, the Chemical Foundation, following such transfer, addressed the licensees of the commission, in part, as follows:

"We have arranged with the Federal Trade Commission to accept a surrender of your license from the Federal Trade Commission and to issue a license on the same terms from the Chemical Foundation (Inc.)."

This letter was first called to the attention of the commission by a number of its licensees, whereupon, in order to make its position plain, the commission addressed to each licensee a copy of the 'circular' to which reference is made in your remarks. Not only did said 'circular' recite that the transfer of licenses was wholly optional with the licensees, but, while not counseling one way or the other, it did specifically and in terms suggest the inadvisability of surrendering a Federal Trade Commission license, at least until the treaty of peace was executed and its effect upon licenses and the patent situation generally was definitely known. The full text of said letter is inclosed for your information.

It may be added that while four licensees only, as a result, have tendered a surrender of licenses, no surrender has as yet been accepted by the commission.

Very truly, yours,

VICTOR MURDOCK,
Acting Chairman.

THE DYE PATENTS CIRCULAR.

JUNE 26, 1919.

GENTLEMEN: A number of those holding licenses with the Federal Trade Commission by virtue of the authority vested in the commission under the trading-with-the-enemy act and the Executive order of October 12, 1917, in re enemy-owned patents, etc., have notified the commission that they have been requested by the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), to relinquish the said licenses and in lieu thereof to accept licenses from the Chemical Foundation (Inc.). The Chemical Foundation (Inc.), through its attorney and representative, Mr. Hoguet, has appeared in person before the commission and asked for an expression from the commission as to its disposition in this matter. In response to these inquiries the commission makes the following statement for your consideration:

LICENSES GRANTED BY THE COMMISSION.

By virtue of the authority vested in it by the act of Congress approved October 6, 1917, known as the trading-with-the-enemy act, and the Executive order of October 12, 1917, vesting it with authority to administer said act, the Federal Trade Commission granted licenses thereunder for the life of the patent, unless otherwise stated, and upon payment to the Alien Property Custodian of a certain royalty. Under said license the commission reserved the power to terminate and cancel the license in whole or in part. It is this license that the Chemical Foundation now requests you to surrender, and in lieu thereof to apply for one to be issued by it.

THE CHEMICAL FOUNDATION (INC.).

At the suggestion of the commission the Hon. Ramsay Hoguet, counsel for the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), has made the following statement of the objects and purposes of the said foundation:

"The Chemical Foundation is a corporation to which the Alien Property Custodian, acting under the authority of the President, has sold all of the formerly enemy-owned patents relating to dyes, chemicals, and related subjects. The stock of the Chemical Foundation is divided into $400,000 of preferred nonvoting stock which it is expected will be redeemed within a very short time, and $100,000 worth of common stock, the dividends on which are limited to 6 per cent. This stock is sold in very small lots and is as widely distributed as possible throughout the industries affected by the patents. In order to prevent control falling into the hands of any one group, the stock is nontransferable except by leave of the board of directors and is placed in a voting trust for a period of 17 years. The voting trustees are the gentlemen who have been serving as the advisory sales committee to the Alien Property Custodian: Otto T. Bannard, esq. (chairman the New York Trust Co., New York); Hon. George L. Ingraham (late presiding justice appellate division, first department, New York Supreme Court); Cleveland H. Dodge, esq.; B. Howell Griswold, jr., esq. (of Alexander Brown & Sons, Baltimore); Ralph Stone, esq. (president Detroit Times Co., Detroit, Mich.). The officers and directors of the foundation are as follows: President, Mr. Francis P. Garvan (the Alien Property Custodian); vice president, Col. Douglas I. McKay (late colonel, General Staff, vice president of J. G. White & Co., and deputy and police commissioner of the city of New York under Mayors Gaynor, Kline, and Mitchel); treasurer and secretary, Mr. George J. Corbett (assistant secretary, Central Union Trust Co.).

"It is the purpose of the Chemical Foundation to issue nonexclusive licenses on equal terms to all properly qualified American manufacturers and to enforce the patents against infringement by the importation and sale of the patented product made abroad. The royalties charged are to be fixed after consideration of all of the facts surrounding the manufacture of the patented product, and will be at a reasonable rate. The royalties will be used to retire the preferred stock and for the encouragement of chemical industry in the United States. The directors of the Chemical Foundation hope to make it a central body and point of contact for the entire chemical industry, and the means of conducting research for the benefit of the industry as a whole.

"The sale of the Chemical Foundation by the Alien Property Custodian having been made unconditionally, no rights are reserved to the former enemy owner of the patents, and under section 7 (c) of the trading-with-the-enemy act as amended November 4, 1918, his only recourse appears to be against the proceeds of the sale from the Alien Property Custodian to the Chemical Foundation. It is the opinion of counsel for the Chemical Foundation that the alien enemy has no right of action whatever against the licensee under a license issued by the Chemical Foundation.

"The Chemical Foundation will issue licenses at the rate of royalty now paid to all licensees of the Federal Trade Commission who apply to the commission for a surrender of their licenses and the surrender of whose licenses is accepted by the commission."

The commission is informed that on July 1, 1919, the Alien Property Custodian will cease to be a member of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.); that thereafter there will be no connection whatsoever with the United States Government; and that its licensees will be governed by the terms of the license issued by it.

LICENSE OF THE CHEMICAL FOUNDATION (INC.).

There is herewith inclosed a copy of the form of license of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.). A comparison of the form of license of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) and that of the Federal Trade Commission will reveal a number of differences, several of which are herewith referred to.

According to section 2 thereof the licensee will not be permitted to import into the United States from any country "any product which is covered by any of said patents, or sell in the United States, its Territories, or dependencies any such product made outside of the United States."

By section 13 of said form of license there is reposed in the Foundation the exclusive discretion of determining, not only whether the licensee has lived up to the terms of the license, but the Foundation also reserves to itself the right to judge of the qualifications of the licensee at the time of the application and at all times after granting the same, according to the several sections of the said form of license.

ALTERNATIVES OFFERED TO LICENSEE.

The licensee has the privilege of electing one of the following three alternatives:

(a) The licensee may retain its Federal Trade Commission license and operate thereunder for the life of the patent, unless otherwise specified, subject to the powers of revocation provided by the Federal Trade Commission license. Or

(b) The licensee may retain its license with the Federal Trade Commission and at the same time apply for one from the Chemical Foundation (Inc.). Should the latter be granted, the licensee may operate under both of said licenses, but subject to either the Federal Trade Commission or the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), or both, according to the terms of the respective licenses. Or

(c) The licensee may surrender its Federal Trade Commission license and thereby withdraw from the protection of the trading-with-the-enemy act and apply for a license from the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) and, in the event of issuance of the same, operate thereafter under the control of the said foundation as a private corporation, according to the terms of the license issued.

A surrender of license will not be acted upon by the Federal Trade Commission where the licensee is a corporation until a written request is addressed to it by the properly authorized officers of the licensee, together with a resolution of the board of directors authorizing the said request. In the case of licensees not incorporated the request must be in writing, signed by the proper parties. The cancellation of a license will not take place until the commission has acted upon the request and informed the licensee of its action.

Attention is called to the fact that the commission does not have knowledge at this time of the effect of the treaty of peace now being negotiated at Paris upon the said patents or sales or licenses thereunder. It therefore points out that until the treaty of peace is executed and the effect thereof on patents and licenses is known the licensee may well consider whether he shall surrender the Federal Trade Commission license.

By direction of the commission:

Acting Chairman.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 7417. An act to amend an act of Congress approved March 12, 1914, authorizing the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

PRIVATE CALENDAR BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business of the day covers the bills which were passed by the Committee of the Whole on Friday, September 5. The Clerk will report the first bill.

CLAIMS OF THE SIOUX INDIANS.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 400) authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

Mr. EDMONDS. Upon that bill, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the previous question on the bill to final passage.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GANDY. At what stage of this proceeding would it be proper to ask unanimous consent to take up in lieu of this bill a Senate bill on the calendar in identical language?

Mr. WALSH. It is too late now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be permissible at any time.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Asking for my own information, and possibly that of other Members of the House, I would like to know whether it would be possible now, at this stage of the proceedings, when a certain bill had been approved by the Committee of the Whole and it is now before this House, to lay aside that bill, and whether another bill under the order for the ratification of private claims can be presented even by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not at first blush see why it could not be done.

Mr. WALSH. It would have to be done by a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand it is practically the same bill?

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, the bill is in identically the same language as amended by the Indian Affairs Committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see why that motion should not prevail.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is the situation this, that the House in Committee of the Whole recommends the passage of this bill and has laid it aside with a favorable recommendation and it is now pending, and now comes the gentleman from South Dakota with an identical Senate bill?

Mr. GANDY. Which has come on the calendar in the meantime.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Which has come on the calendar in the meantime. It seems to me the way out of it is if the gentleman would press a motion to pass the Senate bill and then have the House refuse to pass the House bill.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that would be one way out of it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that before consideration of this bill began was the time to substitute the Senate bill.

A MEMBER. It was not here.

Mr. MADDEN. If it was not here, then it ought not to be considered now.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman mean before proceedings began in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir; I do not see how, if the committee has reported a certain bill to the House for passage, you could substitute another bill for that bill except by unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. I object to that.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will withhold a moment, this is the situation: Since the Committee of the Whole passed on the bill favorably the committee has amended the Senate bill so that it is identical with the House bill reported by the Committee of the Whole, and as thus amended the Senate bill was reported and is now on the calendar. If we should insist on passing the House bill and sending it over to the Senate after the Senate has passed a similar bill, it seems to me it would hardly be proper courtesy to the Senate. And, furthermore, we would delay the enactment of the legislation, because it will then be necessary for the Senate to pass the House bill, after having passed a Senate bill on the same subject.

Mr. MADDEN. At the same time the gentleman knows very well that the procedure he is suggesting is a violation of the rules of the House, and if you can twist the rules to meet any emergency that may arise after consideration of a bill by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it might be done in a very important case. This is not so important.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY] is asking unanimous consent. Now, it would seem to me that before the previous question was ordered the gentleman from South Dakota might ask unanimous consent that a Senate bill of a certain number be laid before the House. The House can then act upon the Senate bill, and after it acts upon it, instead of the gentleman from Pennsylvania moving the previous question upon the House bill he can make a motion to lay the House bill upon the table; but as far as trying to substitute one for the other by unanimous consent while we are in the House, I suppose it could be done, but I do not think it is very good practice at this stage of the proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Senate bill as it passed the Senate is not identical with the House bill, that it was amended by the House committee. Is that correct?

Mr. GANDY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Then it must go back to the Senate, at any rate. So what advantage would be gained?

Mr. GANDY. It would have the advantage in that the same bill would have passed both Houses.

The SPEAKER. No; if it was amended it would have to go back to the Senate.

Mr. GANDY. I am assured at the other end of the Capitol that these amendments are agreeable over there.

The SPEAKER. But it would have to go back to the Senate, anyway.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, following the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 1018 be laid before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the bill (S. 1018) be laid before the House. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, inasmuch as the House committee has amended the Senate bill to conform to the House bill, there will not be any advantage in passing the Senate bill. It will have to go back to the Senate anyway, and the Senate might reamend it. You might just as well send the House bill to the Senate as to send the Senate bill amended by the House, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The question is on ordering the previous question on the House bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ROSEBUD INDIAN RESERVATION, S. DAK.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 396) to authorize the payment of certain amounts for damages sustained by prairie fire on the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in South Dakota.

Mr. EDMONDS. Upon that I move the previous question.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. EDMONDS. If I have the floor, I will yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the floor.

Mr. WALSH. How much do these damages amount to? I was unable to be here when this bill was considered.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman from South Dakota can inform the gentleman.

Mr. GANDY. My recollection is that the damages amounted to something in the neighborhood of $6,000. That is my recollection offhand. I am unable to give the gentleman the exact figures.

Mr. WALSH. All right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the previous question on the bill to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FRANK S. INGALLS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 685) for the relief of Frank S. Ingalls.

Mr. EDMONDS. Upon that bill I move the previous question to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

W. T. DINGLER.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 974) for the relief of W. T. Dingler.

Mr. EDMONDS. On that I move the previous question to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion by Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CLARA KANE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 6413) granting the sum of $549.12 to Clara Kane, dependent parent by reason of death of William A. Yenser, late civil employee, killed as a result of an accident at the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

Mr. EDMONDS. Upon that, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill H. R. 6413 to the Committee on Claims with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment, to wit: On page 1, line 5, strike out the figures "$549.12" and insert in lieu thereof "$480."

Mr. EDMONDS. Upon that motion to recommit I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum present. It is quite evident to the Chair that a quorum is not present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members. As many as are in favor of the motion to recommit will, as their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 7, nays 274, answered "present" 6, not voting 142, as follows:

BUSINESS ON THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman intend to consider only bills that are unobjected to?

Mr. EDMONDS. I would say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that while he was away attending to the duties of his committee we took up every one of these bills on the Private Calendar that were unobjected to. The bills that were objected to are now being considered in Committee of the Whole House. They have all had their turn in regard to unanimous consent, and the only way that we can take them up now is by taking up bills individually as they are placed on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the unfinished business.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 5348) for the relief of Mrs. Thomas McGovern.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. WALSH. I object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the bill has been reported.

Mr. EDMONDS. The Chair is correct. Discussion was had upon it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] had the floor for a part of his hour that he took to talk about the bill.

Mr. WALSH. But this starts the matter anew when we go over to another day.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Where objection is made to the bill after the reading of it, is it proper for the House to proceed to consider it until it has been read?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all. The Chair is informed that this is the unfinished business and that the bill has already been reported.

Mr. BLANTON. It has been reported, but never has been read to the House, and the gentleman from Massachusetts objected to its consideration until it had been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed the bill was read to the House.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JEFFERIS. I wish to be heard to some extent on this bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5348) for the relief of Mrs. Thomas McGovern.

MRS. THOMAS M'GOVERN.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I believe I had the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I do not recall how much time I had remaining of my hour, but I will reserve the remainder of my time. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he has some additional evidence——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois consumed 20 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to secure recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Do we not proceed de novo with respect to the present consideration of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that this bill has been partially considered.

Mr. BLANTON. But where a gentleman has used some time in a former Committee of the Whole, is the gentleman from Illinois entitled to a full hour?

The CHAIRMAN. He is not, he is entitled to the remainder of his time.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. JEFFERIS].

Mr. JEFFERIS. Mr. Chairman, I introduced this bill, it being the only available tribunal to which Mrs. McGovern could present a claim for the death of her husband. Had she been so unfortunate as to have lost her husband through the negligence of any private institution or corporation I believe I am safe in saying to this House that upon bringing suit in the courts under the laws of the State of Nebraska she would have been able to recover from $10,000 to $20,000 for the loss that she sustained through the death of her husband. Now, the question is whether or not the Government of the United States, acting through Congress, is to deal as justly with individuals suffering such losses as the laws require that individuals and corporations shall be compelled to do through an appeal before a jury in the county where the acts have occurred. According to the facts in this case, Mr. McGovern was walking northward on Seventeenth Street on the left-hand side of the sidewalk and attempted to cross Cass Street, running east and west, the same being a street some 60 feet in width between curb and curb.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Where?

Mr. JEFFERIS. At Seventeenth and Cass Streets in the city of Omaha. On this evening, about 6 o'clock, Sergt. Ens, a regular enlisted soldier, accompanied by a young man by the name of Dewey, were taking a Cadillac car from a repair shop to Fort Omaha just to the north of the city, drove northward on Seventeenth Street, and cut the corner, the southwest corner, almost striking the curb, and the car came in contact with Mr. McGovern as he was walking across Cass Street. According to the evidence in this case as submitted to the Committee on Claims and as investigated by the authorities in charge at Fort Omaha, the soldier authorities, the evidence seems to be firmly established to the following effect: That the sergeant in driving this Cadillac car was violating the law as to negligence in driving a vehicle on the streets of Omaha in four particulars, namely, that he was exceeding the speed limit at intersections of streets, driving, according I think to the weight of the evidence, from 15 to 17 miles per hour, whereas the law of the State and the ordinances of the city require that in turning corners at intersections they shall not exceed the rate of 8 miles per hour. The law and the ordinances provide that in making turns at intersections they shall go out around the center, whereas this particular soldier on that night drove on the left-hand side, the wrong side of the street, without sounding, as I take it, although there is a dispute as to that evidence, any horn, but if he did it must have been slight and it was a misty night and dark. Now, there is some evidence from reports of the officers in the report that has been sent in to the committee since this claim was here before which, in my opinion, only corroborates and substantiates that which was here before the Congress when the bill was under consideration some days ago.

It happened that I was not present on that day and was not in a position therefore to advise the Congress as to anything I might know about this bill personally or as to the local situation. According to the evidence that has been now reported to the committee it seems that the officers at Fort Omaha investigated this transaction immediately after it occurred, and according to the evidence it would appear to me that the claim is even stronger than that which was presented to the committee originally. There was a contention made that this automobile did not really run to exceed a few feet after it struck Mr. McGovern, whereas from the evidence, as revealed by the testimony taken by the officers at Fort Omaha immediately after the occurrence, it appears that the front wheel and the hind wheel on the right-hand side of the automobile passed over the body of the deceased. This is conclusive evidence not only that the car did go more than 6, 7, or 9 feet after it struck the deceased, because we all must know that a Cadillac car exceeds that number of feet in length very decidedly.

So, taking the evidence in this case into consideration, it seems to me that Mrs. McGovern is entitled to the amount of this bill if this Government is to deal as justly with individuals who suffer losses through the negligence of some of their departments of activity as is required by law with other individuals. The amount is $5,000. I want to say to this House that $5,000 for the loss of a life under the conditions shown by this evidence seems to me most moderate; that Mrs. McGovern, if allowed the same, is dealing more than fair with this Government. As a matter of fact, Thomas McGovern had been a valuable citizen of that city. While he and I did not agree politically, nevertheless he at all times was actuated by high motives in the discharge of public duty. He had at one time been city commissioner of the city of Omaha, when the board became a nonpartisan body, and rendered service to that city for a number of years. Further than that, I would say there was some talk that he was guilty of contributory negligence, but for my part I can not see from the evidence or facts in this case how any such imputation can be laid at the door of the deceased. He was walking north on the left-hand side of the street; he started to cross a street that is 60 feet between the curbs; he was moving northward, and he had no notice of any kind, as I can find from the evidence, to indicate that a soldier or anyone else was approaching him from the rear and was going to cut the corner on the wrong side of the street and run into him from the rear and knock him down and kill him, as occurred in this case.

Certainly, unless Congress is going to ask that a man shall have eyes in the rear of his head in order to observe such actions and conduct on the part of those who are driving automobiles as in this case, then he should at least be relieved of any such charge or imputation as has been intimated.

I believe as thoroughly as I believe anything, after having practiced law for 25 years in the city and tried such cases for both the defense and for the plaintiff, that if this cause was such from a legal standpoint that it could be submitted to a jury and to court, under competent instructions, Mrs. McGovern, instead of being allowed $5,000, would be allowed a verdict of from $15,000 to $20,000, and that it would be approved by the higher courts of our State.

Now, if anybody wishes to ask any questions I shall be glad to try to answer them.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, there are certain of us who are sympathetic with the claim the gentleman has introduced, but desire to know whether the committee had before it all the evidence which might have been brought before it, so that the claim might be fully understood and, as understood, presented to the House. What I should like to know, and what I made inquiry about when it was presented before, was as to whether or not the evidence of the driver of the machine, of this Cadillac car, in the Government service, had been considered, and also whether or not there had been any investigation by the War Department, for whom this driver was working, and what the investigation disclosed? These were the things certain of us were anxious to know and whether they had been presented to the committee; and I would like the gentleman to advise me.

Mr. JEFFERIS. I will say in reply to the gentleman that here recently an entire report, as I understand it, of the War Department has been presented to the committee. I secured a copy of that a couple of days ago, but it only reaffirmed, in my opinion, the evidence that was actually before the committee at the time they recommended this bill for passage. In other words, this report from the War Department shows that there was an investigation made at Fort Omaha immediately after this accident, and that the evidence was taken, by questions and answers, of a Miss Wilson and likewise a Mr. James, and the War Department really filed charges against the driver of the automobile. But that was not on the question of negligence. I will read just a part of it:

Sergt. Ens, the driver, was tried by general court-martial and acquitted. He was charged with violation of the ninety-sixth article of war, the specification alleging that "by improper driving" he did "run over and fatally injure Thomas McGovern, a citizen of Omaha, Nebr." The theory of the prosecution, which the defense did not dispute, was that if Ens was negligent in driving the car such negligence would constitute conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline; but whether the court decided the issue of negligence in Ens's favor, or whether it was of opinion that, even if Ens was negligent, such negligence as that with which he was charged would not amount to conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline within the meaning of article of war 96, does not clearly appear. The testimony against Ens adduced at the trial would be sufficient to sustain a finding (were one made) to the effect that he was driving at from 15 to 20 miles per hour; that he had no lights on and sounded no warning signal as he turned from Seventeenth Street into Cass Street; that he crossed Seventeenth Street diagonally, cutting the southwest corner very close to the curb; that, because of a fine mist, it was difficult to see through the wind shield, which was clouded with mist; and that Ens did not take proper measures to enable himself to see objects ahead, and did not see the deceased in time. The testimony adduced in favor of Ens, on the other hand, would be sufficient to sustain a finding (were one made) to the effect that Ens was driving at from 7 to 10 miles per hour; that the lights of the automobile were burning properly, and that the street was otherwise well lighted; that he sounded a proper warning; and that he turned properly into Cass Street near the center without unduly approaching the southwest corner. The testimony would sufficiently support a conclusion of negligence, if such conclusion were reached by a jury, and it would sufficiently support either of the alternative conclusions that the deceased, through want of attention, was guilty of contributory negligence, or that he was not guilty thereof.

In other words, as I review the charge and report as made by E. A. Kreger, the Acting Judge Advocate General, the real question of negligence could throw no light on it. It is a question of whether or not it was so negligent as to be destructive of military discipline.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Certainly.

Mr. BOX. I understood the gentleman to say that he thought the claim could be maintained on the evidence in the courts of his State. I understand in many jurisdictions the question of the measure of damages, the money value, enters in the question of compensation in such cases. I wonder if there is any evidence as to the age and productive power of the deceased, or as to what his money value to his family was?

Mr. JEFFERIS. I would say that I do not know as there was any particular evidence offered before the committee in that respect, but I can say here that I was personally acquainted with Thomas McGovern; that he had worked for a long number of years in the Union Pacific shops as a foreman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JEFFERIS. I would like time in which to answer the question.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Would the gentleman like five minutes more?

Mr. JEFFERIS. No; only sufficient time to answer the question.

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. JEFFERIS. I would say that also he was elected commissioner of the city of Omaha. He had the salary of that position, which, as I remember, was $5,000 a year, and after that he went into the insurance business, and, as I understand it, was making a success of it. He was 55 years of age; he had a family of nine children, and I am here to vouch for the thorough Americanism of all of them.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERIS. I will.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman speaks about the testimony introduced before the committee. What was the character of that testimony? Was it ex parte affidavits, given upon notice, or how was it done?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Ex parte affidavits. But now we have here before the Congress the testimony that was taken by the questions and answers of Army officers immediately after this and before Mrs. McGovern or anyone else would have had any influence with the witnesses.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman state who made those ex parte affidavits, and how many were filed?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Of all the eyewitnesses there were two, Mr. James and Miss Wilson, and there was a man by the name of Dewey, who was accompanying the lieutenant at the time this accident occurred, and according to the evidence, as I view it, Mr. Dewey, who was accompanying the lieutenant, seems to have made contradictory statements. In one place he talks of the speed of the automobile as having been from 5 to 7 miles an hour, whereas according to the report of Lieut. Hersley, of Fort Omaha, he seems to have had it from 12 to 15 miles an hour, whereas Miss Wilson says it was from 15 to 17 miles an hour, and Mr. James shows that it was far in excess of the speed limit.

Mr. MILLER. Was any inquiry held by the coroner, or any decision arrived at through that channel?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Under the law there it would not be necessary to reach any decision touching the question of negligence, only to ascertain the cause of death.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. It seems to me the one question to be decided here is as to the violation of the city ordinance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have one minute more.

Mr. EDMONDS. I will yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. FOCHT. Whether in approaching this corner the driver of the car, instead of going to the right, as provided by the ordinance, went to the left and struck the man?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. That has been well established?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Yes; that has been well established.

Mr. FOCHT. It seems to me that is all there is in the case.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. What precedent can the gentleman point to that would justify Congress in taking action of this kind? Has Congress undertaken in other similar instances to make appropriations to pay such claims?

Mr. JEFFERIS. I would say in reply to that that I am not as well advised on these questions, I take it, as those who have been here in former terms. I have not any information to give the gentleman on that question.

Mr. OLIVER. It seems to me a new and dangerous proposal to take up cases of this kind and appropriate money to pay same.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is probably aware that in San Antonio, Tex., just such a case occurred, only with greater severity, where two old ladies, as I understand, were run over, and so on. Those cases have been pending here for years, with an adverse report from the War Department on them. The evidence showed just as great negligence on the part of the soldier driving down the street in San Antonio. Then I call the gentleman's attention to a case in Houston, Tex., where rioting soldiers went down the street and shot right and left, and no action has been taken on those cases.

Mr. JEFFERIS. That is not germane to anything we have been discussing here. The proposition is that this House is the one tribunal that Mrs. McGovern can appeal to. The fact is the evidence shows and establishes negligence, and the question is whether this great Government of ours and Congress are to deal as fairly with people who have suffered such loss as the laws require other people to deal under such conditions and circumstances.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. If the driver of this car had been a man of means or wealth, would not action lie against him individually?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Undoubtedly; and the recovery would not have been less than $10,000.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has again expired. The question is on laying aside the bill with favorable recommendation.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, of course we are all very much touched by the eloquent appeal of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. JEFFERIS]. It is a very pathetic case. But I think Congress ought to stop and consider a bit before it starts in legislating along this line.

Here was a case where, when the country was in the midst of a great war, according to the report in the case, a soldier in the performance of his duty accidentally killed a private citizen. The gentleman from Nebraska, the accident having occurred on October 26, 1917, asks Congress to appropriate, for the widow of the deceased, $5,000 outright.

Now, of course, there is no liability on the part of the Government for that, and there ought not to be unless they can prove by the clearest evidence that there was gross negligence on the part of the servant of the United States and that the man who was killed was free from any contributory negligence. And I doubt even then if we ought to establish a rule that when a soldier of the United States Army, particularly during war time, in the performance of his duty accidentally kills a private citizen, we shall establish liability on the part of the Government for that act.

Now, of course, if we were sitting as a court we would refer to the records in the case and we naturally would ask what the recommendation of the department is. There is no recommendation on the part of the department. There is evidence, as I read the report, that there was ground for believing that the gentleman who was killed, a worthy citizen, was not in the exercise of reasonable care and might have been guilty of contributory negligence.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Rather than pass a special bill in a case of this kind, would it not be safer, if Congress decides to hold the Government liable in all such cases, to give the Court of Claims or the district courts jurisdiction for the tortious acts of its employees and make the Government liable for all such cases?

Mr. WALSH. If we are going to establish a precedent upon which this committee shall in future act, I will venture to say you will find the Private Calendar crowded with such instances. I ask the Committee on Claims or the Committee on War Claims—whichever committee this came from—to point to some precedent where the Government has paid damages for the death of a private citizen during war where an accident occurs and was participated in by a member of the United States Army.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to say that I rather think that this is establishing a new precedent. I do not remember of a case just like this. There are a few cases pending in the committee, quite a few, similar to this, that will be coming along for damage cases or death claims.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Congress has established several precedents. One of them just occurred this session in the case of a bill introduced by Congressman VINSON, where soldiers were shooting at a mark and killed a man and Congress paid his widow $7,200. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts voted for it.

Mr. WALSH. Was that passed recently?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes. The gentleman was here and participated in the debate, and I am quite sure he voted for the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I do not recall the measure.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will look up the record, he will find that he made some inquiry, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] answered him. I was acting as chairman of the Claims Committee on the floor that day. This man was shot through the carelessness of soldiers. The soldiers of the Government established targets to shoot at. They were careless in their methods of doing it and killed a man who was attending to his own business, and this Congress passed a law, or this House passed it at this session, authorizing the payment to the widow and orphans of $7,200 on account of the negligence of the soldier. The gentleman from Massachusetts participated in the discussion of that bill.

Mr. WALSH. But if the gentleman will recall he will find that my inquiries were not in support of that measure, but were asking how the amount was arrived at, and when the measure went to a vote I think the gentleman will recall that I voted against it.

Mr. LITTLE. I thought not.

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not like to differ with any other member of the committee, but I think the cases are not similar. The man in Georgia was killed by a shell that was not properly directed, and it was not a case where you could claim that the man could in any way have been guilty of contributory negligence, because he was not in any position where he could know he was in danger. In Georgia the range had been marked out and guarded. This man who was killed was outside of the range, and he certainly contributed nothing toward his death. In the present case there is a question of contributory negligence beyond any question.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not an attorney, and any lawyer will understand that it is incumbent upon the defendant in all cases to prove contributory negligence where it is sought to be maintained as a defense. There is nothing of that in this case. The plaintiff does not have to prove that he is not guilty of contributory negligence. The defendant has got to prove affirmatively that the plaintiff was guilty of it. There is nothing in that contention at all. As to not knowing what the facts are, every lawyer here who has ever tried a lawsuit knows that the presumption is that the man was trying to save his own life, and in order to get any benefit at all of the defense of contributory negligence it has got to be affirmatively established. Every lawyer who has ever tried a damage suit knows that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think I ought to yield to gentlemen to argue the case.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WALSH. For a question.

Mr. BLANTON. In the Georgia case the War Department recommended the payment.

Mr. WALSH. Furthermore, it seems that this driver was court-martialed for a violation of one of the Articles of War, namely, that he, by improper driving, did run over and fatally injure this citizen, and upon the court-martial he was acquitted.

Mr. JEFFERIS. The acquittal may have been on the ground that it did not come within the Articles of War, even though he did drive over the man.

Mr. WALSH. He was charged with a violation of the ninety-sixth article of war, but he was acquitted. Now, it may have been that the charge laid against him was not a violation of the article of war, but he was acquitted. My point is simply this, that I doubt whether now, at this particular time, we ought to establish a precedent and say here, sitting as a jury, supposed to be the custodians of the Public Treasury, that for this accident, which happened, from all the evidence, as the result of the act of a soldier of the Army while the country was at war, running down a citizen and injuring him so that he subsequently died, we ought to reach into the Treasury and pay $5,000. It is simply a gift, a gratuity.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Following that line, what are we likely to do in cases that will come up here? I have one where an Army driver, driving absolutely on the wrong side of the street on a public highway at full tilt, in the dead of night, ran down a man who was riding a motor cycle and cut off his legs.

Mr. WALSH. What we ought to do is this: If this Congress is disposed to grant relief in these cases, we ought to pass an act conferring upon the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear these cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield to me five minutes additional?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Let the Court of Claims make their findings of fact and report them to Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think it will be developed that in nearly all these cases the inquiries of military courts are conducted with a view of showing that the soldier was not to blame. Such a report comes in this case in spite of all the evidence that the man was driving at a full rate of speed on the wrong side of the road. Notwithstanding that, a court composed of soldiers found the other way.

Mr. WALSH. I suppose that if a soldier was driving an ambulance carrying a wounded comrade under orders to get somewhere as quickly as he could, and he happened to be on the wrong side of the road and struck somebody and broke his leg, the gentleman would say that because the soldier was acting in accordance with orders Congress ought to sit here as a jury and assess damages.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I will admit that if the country was under martial law and those things were permitted, that would present a different case; but in this instance what the man did was in violation of every county ordinance and State law.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but the gentleman wants to recall that when this accident happened this country was in a state of war, and that this soldier was one of the military forces of the United States. Now, there were a number of men in the military forces who were not fortunate enough, perhaps, to take out insurance, and who paid the supreme sacrifice.

Mr. JEFFERIS. I take it that if this man was killed by a soldier in battle nobody would ask for it. But the soldier was pursuing the part of a citizen in the street, and he ought to obey the ordinance, because there was no hurry-up order.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska that you can not separate the soldier from the military branch of the service by simply saying he was driving an ambulance, therefore was pursuing the part of a civilian. He was a part of the military branch of the service, and under the precedents and under the law there is no liability on the part of the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GARD. Will not the Chairman advise us as to how the time allotment now stands.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has 15 minutes, the gentleman from Ohio 29 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois 13 minutes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, to my mind, after going over the testimony in this case, there is no question but that Thomas McGovern was in his full rights on the streets of Omaha. We have a map showing where he stood and showing where the truck should have gone. The only question I am doubtful about is this: This is going to establish a new precedent where there is a question as to whether the man was guilty of contributory negligence in not taking proper precautions on the highway. I think the reason why the War Department has not made any recommendation is because this driver was on the wrong side of the street. I asked the War Department what regulations they made in regard to drivers of trucks, so that we might know whether the trucks run wild or whether they had any regulations requiring the drivers to operate in the different streets in the cities of the country. They told me that in all cases men were required to abide by the local laws of the place where they were driving.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Is it not a fact in this particular case the soldier was driving a Government car from where it had been repaired; that he was on the wrong side of the street, while McGovern was wholly within his rights?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is there not a fund in the hands of the War Department out of which they can adjust claims of this kind?

Mr. EDMONDS. I am not sure about that. There is in the hands of the War Department funds from which they can adjust certain claims, but whether this claim comes within that class I do not know. There is a limitation, I think, that no claim above $500 can be adjusted; and I do not think it would cover a case like this.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I know that they have adjusted certain claims.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think it does not apply to cases like this.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman has heard all the evidence in this case and is familiar with it, and I want to ask him, Would the widow of the deceased, in his opinion, have a good case?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think she would have an excellent case. Mr. Chairman, the only question we have brought before the House is for the House to settle the policy it wishes to pursue in this class of cases.

I would like to suggest to the House, in the settling of these cases, if it decides to pay a sum of money to these people, this widow and orphans of the man who has been killed by a man in the Army, would it not be well to put them under the war-risk insurance and give them the same sum of money that you would give the wife of a soldier who was killed in war? I do not know whether this sum would be proper or not. It may be that we ought to give less and it may be that we ought to give a larger sum.

Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, there has been some inquiry whether this party could recover against a private corporation. As to that I think I may safely say that there is no question whatever. It has been demonstrated without the slightest contradiction that this driver was on the wrong side of the street with the automobile; that was the proximate cause of the death. If he had not been there he would not have killed this man. It has also been demonstrated that the automobile did not have any light that anybody could see. If it had had a light, it is safe to say that the man would have avoided the danger. There are two instances of gross negligence. Any court would have to rule that that was sufficient ground to go to the jury. It has been suggested that the man was guilty of contributory negligence. Gentlemen, every judge and lawyer knows that there is no presumption of contributory negligence—that you have to prove it. If there was no evidence of it, the court would instruct the jury to disregard that defense. The presumption of law is that when a man is killed, he was doing his duty to protect himself, that the natural instinct of life was taking care of himself, and the court would so instruct the jury. Probably every lawyer here who has ever had a damage suit has had such instruction. So the presumption of law is that he is not guilty of contributory negligence. There is no evidence whatever that he was, and every lawyer here ought to see at a glance that there could not be any possible defense, and that a private corporation would have to pay.

But that is not the argument that is really made here. They go on and say that we ought not to donate the money. Within a few days we have donated $7,500 each to the widows of two Congressmen. Where is your law for that? Is there anyone crying out against that? What law is there that authorizes you to say to a Congressman's widow, "Take $7,500," and would say to a poor woman whose husband is killed by an agent of the United States, unjustly and improperly, "We can not pay you." I hope men will hesitate before they put themselves in such a position. Oh, they say, we have no precedent for this. Oh, yes; there are many precedents. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS], who has been down in the department for years, just directed my attention to one which I had not thought of for the moment. Some one was hurt in an elevator, and the Government paid him for it. A mere passenger I think. Congressman VINSON's case was one where soldiers were shooting at a target and killed a man, and this Congress passed a bill and gave $7,200 at the request of the War Department. It has been stated that this particular soldier was acquitted by a court-martial. So was that one—not by a court-martial, but by a board, and the higher officers decided that he was guilty of negligence. What is the difference between a widow in Alabama and one in Omaha?

In both cases there was gross negligence and in both instances the facts are such that the payment is justified.

That is not all. It has been suggested by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] that if you go to the War Department with a property claim they will pay you any minute. Is a little bit of property of more value than life and blood?

What could a woman have more valuable than her husband? You in this House passed a law a few months ago in which you authorized the Secretary of War, without any serious examination, without any judicial examination, to pay every unliquidated damage claim any contractor could ask him to pay, and you have turned loose something like $4,000,000,000 down there for the Secretary to hand out to anybody who has an unliquidated damage claim who can convince two or three clerks down there he ought to have it paid. Are you going to say to this widow that she shall not have $5,000, when you pay over to contractors great sums, when the contractors had not even written contracts, and have done what they did in violation of law—up to the amount of $4,000,000,000? You passed a law in the last Congress to authorize the Secretary of War to pay every peasant in France whose pig was run over, just as this man was by an American soldier, for the value of the pig. Are you going to tell this woman that her husband is not as good as a hog in France? You said that the War Department could take your money and pay any peasant in France for any damage done by an American soldier. The War Department sent that bill down here so that it included pay to Germans, for it said that pay should be granted to people anywhere in Europe. I noticed that fallacy—of course, it was unintentional upon their part—and had it cut out, but when you pass a law that a lieutenant in France can pay a peasant for a pig that a truck has run over, on what theory are going to argue that this woman should not be paid for her husband who was run over?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am in favor of the bill, but I would like to know how you arrive at the sum of $5,000?

Mr. LITTLE. It is the consensus of opinion; just like a jury.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the Government is responsible, more than that ought to be paid.

Mr. LITTLE. I thought so; but I was willing to compromise, just as a jury would.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And if this man had been a native of some other country, say, Italy or Greece, would not that country, through its consular agents, at once have made claim for damages for the man's life and have fixed a sum very much in excess of $5,000?

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, yes. Thirty or forty years ago down here in New Orleans we had to pay the Italian Government for several Italian citizens killed down there by a mob.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, anywhere.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes. We have to pay for everyone except an American citizen.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Is it not true that if Mr. McGovern had been in the service of the country in any capacity he would have been paid?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; his widow would have gotten a pension probably. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] indicated that he wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. My question related to the payment by the War Department for damages to property, and the gentleman from Maryland seems to have covered that.

Mr. LITTLE. You pay for everything, for a hog in France, for a prospect in this country, for a dead man in Alabama. There is no question of illegality about this. This case is proven absolutely. The amount is reasonable. Lots of verdicts are for more. It is a fair and equitable transaction, and as far as precedent is concerned, this Congress can afford always to set the precedent of doing right. You set it before in Vinson's case and in the case the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] suggested to me, and my recollection is that there are a great many of them. This does not set any new precedent. The Government of the United States has been doing right for a good many years. It takes care of property, it takes care of the lives of foreigners. Many of you remember about the Italians for whose lives we had to pay, who were killed in New Orleans.

Now, gentlemen, let us do right; let us not quibble about this. I do not want to waste the money of this Government; I voted against paying these mere unliquidated damages when the proposition came up here. I do not think any gentleman who voted for that would be consistent in quibbling about voting a few thousand dollars to this poor woman. Is not life in this country more valuable than property? Let us go ahead and do right. [Applause.] I yield the remainder of my time back.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks for recognition in his own right?

Mr. RUCKER. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for an hour.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I shall not use that hour; I will give some of it to the gentleman from Kansas before I get through. Mr. Chairman, this discussion to-day has taken a wide range. Some gentlemen present it purely from a sentimental standpoint, the equitable viewpoint; others present it from the legal standpoint. One is an appeal to our emotions and the other is an appeal to us as jurists or jurors who sit here solemnly to determine the value of human life and make compensation in money for such life. The gentleman who recently addressed the committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], cited a number of cases in which the Government has recently made compensation for lives which have been lost, but the gentleman well knows that in most of the cases, perhaps all of them, but most of the cases at least cited by him, the parties who were deceased were employees of the Government and paid under a law enacted by the Congress to take care of and give protection to men who are engaged by the Government in hazardous duties. There is no parallel whatever with this case. The Georgia case, some case from Georgia referred to—the most that can be said about that was that that had evidently slipped through without the kind of debate and consideration this bill is receiving, because that ought not to have been paid, in my judgment. Now, I will allow no gentleman to place me in antagonism or opposition to appeals, to wails of people who have been bereft of a husband. I respond in sympathy as much as any gentleman here, but we are not here to give expression to our personal sympathies. We are here to engage in the performance of a duty under a solemn oath. We must perform a duty, not do a kindness or extend a benefit or give a bounty out of public funds. Who pays that tax? It is not ours. We have no right from the purely sentimental standpoint to sit here and exhaust the Treasury of this Republic. We are called upon to determine whether or not the ordinances of the city of Omaha were violated by some soldier, a lieutenant, I believe——

A MEMBER. A corporal.

Mr. RUCKER. A corporal. My God, I have not seen a lieutenant, in my judgment, who has not violated the ordinances; most of them do; but must the Government of the United States respond in damages every time one of these fellows with straps on his shoulders drives too fast? Why, Mr. Chairman, as young and athletic as I am [laughter], it is difficult for us to-day, with the aid of two policemen here, to get over to the House Office Building without being run down by a machine, the most of them having "U. S." on it, too, and a colonel or major or captain frequently in it. My Lord, I serve notice now I will quit this Congress and be willing to pay the sum back for my loss if one of these people run over me accidentally or designedly. [Laughter.]

Mr. JEFFERIS. Does not the gentleman think Congress has been wasting money to protect us in walking across the street by hiring two officers to guard us?

Mr. RUCKER. I do not think it is a very lucrative salary or even they are receiving more pay than they are earning.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I desire to satisfy myself in regard to my vote on this bill. I understood the gentleman to say the illustrations presented by the gentleman from Kansas are in most cases where an employee of the Government had run down or killed accidentally some other employee of the Government.

Mr. RUCKER. In the performance of his duty.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman think the Government owes any higher duty in the protection of its employees than it does in the protection of the average citizen?

Mr. RUCKER. I think it may be properly said in a qualified way, yes, because many of the employees whom the Government engages are in a hazardous service.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman think the Government has more right illegally to take the life of the private citizen than it has to take the life of a Government employee?

Mr. RUCKER. No; the gentleman misunderstood my statement or I have been unhappy in my remarks. I have not said anything of the sort, because the Government ought not to take any man's life, of course.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The thought in my mind is this, that the Government has an equally high obligation to care for and avoid the taking of life or injuring of a citizen whether he be in the Government employ or in private employ, and that the obligation is just as high to avoid an illegal injury to the private citizen as to an employee of the Government.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I would like to proceed for a few minutes. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Texas think that the Government of the United States should be put under the obligation to obey the commands of municipalities who might make ordinances governing their local affairs, and, if so, is not that requiring the Government of all the people to obey the commands and laws and regulations of a very small part of them?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. To be clear and explicit in my view of the matter, it occurs to me that the agents of this Government, in doing any work or labor in any part of the United States, are subject to the same laws that agents or employees of anybody else are, and if they do an illegal act somebody ought to be responsible; that is to say, the United States as an employer ought to have the same obligations, responsibilities, and liabilities as any other employer.

And while it may be a burden, and this may be a precedent, and I do not like to set it by legislative enactment, I would rather pass this bill than deny justice; yet I would rather pass a law under which the courts of the country could determine in every case whether or not the claim was just.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, if the gentleman follows his theory to the ultimate conclusion, it will result in dispensing with the United States courts, because there will be no need for them. You could just go into the State courts in the several jurisdictions on the same basis as private citizens.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. On the contrary, if my idea is followed to the conclusion, we would establish a right to go into a Federal court and sustain a claim for an illegal act done by an agent of the Government, and such bills as this would cease to come before Congress.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In view of the expression last made by the gentleman from Texas, and in view of the fact that the passage of this bill would probably establish an iron-clad precedent before Congress in claims of this character, does not the gentleman think it would be a wise solution of this case to give the opportunity to the committee to frame a law conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine in a judicial manner all claims of this character?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I heartily agree with the gentleman. This is a case that is put in such way that it is up to us to say whether it is just or not, and our decision can not be made on the basis of the possibility of passing a wiser law, which may or may not ever pass.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to suggest to my colleague from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], that if you compel parties who have such claims to litigate to bring them before the Court of Claims in the city of Washington, say, a thousand miles from where they live, it would work a great hardship, and besides that the Court of Claims has no facilities for passing on such a claim. And if they were referred to that court there would not be a decision this side of judgment, because they have not the facilities. Now, if jurisdiction were to be conferred upon the United States district courts to hear this kind of a claim and to render a judgment, with authority to the Treasury of the United States to pay that judgment on certified copy of the judgment, some remedy would be offered. But as the law now stands it takes a special act of Congress to get any judgment, and the remedy suggested is practically out of the question.

Mr. RUCKER. I will conclude in a minute or two.

A suggestion has been made here that the Post Office Department and the War Department instruct the drivers of their trucks and machines to obey the ordinances of the city through which they pass—an absolute impossibility.

There is not a gentleman on this floor now who owns his machine here in Washington and has ridden thousands of miles in it that knows the regulations of this city. You know in a general way, but you do not know the difference in the different localities, the different sections or intersections of streets; and how could the driver of a truck passing through Washington learn more about the traffic regulations than a Congressman ever learned in 10 years?

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to say, in the first place, that the evidence shows that riding with this driver was an employee of a local automobile company, who ought to have known the regulations beyond any question. In the second place, the Post Office Department issues a card of instructions to its drivers in the different localities containing the laws of each locality.

Mr. RUCKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word with reference to the question of negligence. It does look to me absurd at this remote distance from Omaha, by paper testimony, without an opportunity to cross-examine a single witness, to undertake to determine that there is no contributory negligence in a case like this. The testimony, as I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], shows that the machine was going, according to the testimony of one side, from 15 to 17 miles an hour, and, according to others, from 6 to 8 miles an hour. Here is a footman passing along. The assumption is that these people were not cripples, but the deceased was a man strong in health; and it is fair to assume, in the absence of any statement whatever about it, that he was walking as men usually walk. That would mean at least 3 miles an hour. So that while the automobile was going 17 miles, the footman would go 3 miles, or one-sixth as fast. Hence, 6 feet would clear him of danger. If he had seen the automobile 15 feet away before it struck him, he could have freed himself from danger by one step or two steps.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. The gentleman should take into consideration the fact that the automobile was running practically noiselessly and under a misty condition, and coming from a direction which ordinarily it would not come from.

Mr. RUCKER. That may be true.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. The cross-examination of the Government officials showed that fact.

Mr. CANNON. The misty condition covered the deceased as well as the driver of the automobile.

Mr. RUCKER. In addition to that, the misty condition ought to admonish everybody to stop, look, and listen more attentively than if it was clear.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. There is plain evidence of liability for damage, but has that ever been claimed from the city of Omaha? Have they been asked for damages?

Mr. RUCKER. I think the city would be just about as liable as the Government. I do not think either one is liable.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. There is plenty of evidence that some one is liable.

Mr. TINCHER. I understand that Congress is the only tribunal that has any jurisdiction under existing law to pass on claims of this character. Now, that being true, in this case, having taken it through the usual channels and jurisdiction and conducted hearings, is it not up to Congress at this time to rather decide a policy for the future? Is not that the burden of our discussion at this time?

Mr. RUCKER. I think that is true.

Mr. TINCHER. And do I understand the gentleman, for whose opinion along these lines I have great respect, to favor the policy of this Congress passing a law permitting the granting of claims or some other tribunal passing on these cases instead of the Congress?

Mr. RUCKER. In answer to the gentleman from Kansas, I will say I do not want to commit myself in reference to the Court of Claims, because my experience with that court has been very unsatisfactory. This practice of sending out printed forms of interrogatories, with printed forms for answers, and then determining the facts, sometimes ascertains the facts and sometimes fails to ascertain them. But I am in favor of a policy which will make this great Government of ours deal fairly and equitably and humanely with all classes of people. But I want to warn gentlemen now, and among them the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], that this body has no jurisdiction. We may take jurisdiction, but there is no jurisdiction deposited in such a place as this. There is no precedent for it, and there ought not to be any precedent for it, and this ought not to become a precedent for future action.

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman means that the payment of a claim like this would violate the Constitution?

Mr. RUCKER. No; I do not think so.

Mr. TINCHER. Then Congress may have the inherent right to assume jurisdiction.

Mr. RUCKER. Congress may take jurisdiction and pass a law; but I want to say to you, think what you are doing. Some of you pretend that you want to go home—I do not know whether you do or not—some time in October or November. Some of you think you would like to be home next year. It will become absolutely necessary for many of you gentlemen on that side to be at home and to give close attention to your business affairs if you want to come back again. But if we undertake to open the doors and consider cases like this from all over this country I will serve notice on you now that we shall not meet the deficit by taxation; we can not; we will swell the volume of liabilities and make the burdens and duties almost intolerable on the people, and there will never be a year long enough in the next 20 to consider and pass upon the damage suits that will be brought by Members of Congress for their constituents before this great jury of Representatives of the American people.

Mr. JEFFERIS and Mr. CHINDBLOM rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. RUCKER. I will yield first to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I want to express an observation and then ask a question. I think too much stress has been laid upon the ordinances of the city of Washington. I think the gentleman from Missouri will agree with that proposition. But waiving that question aside, would the gentleman take the position that in a clear case of negligence on the part of the Government we should not take jurisdiction, as he puts it, of a case in which a claim is made for damages?

Mr. RUCKER. I do not want to commit myself with reference to a given case. I do not intend to put myself, as I said awhile ago, in an attitude where people can assume that I am unsympathetic for those who have been bereaved or have suffered injury. But I say we have a divided duty here. We have no right to establish here to-day a precedent which would take billions of money, in my judgment, from the taxpayers of this land.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. There may be some equitable plan, as suggested by a gentleman a moment ago, with respect to cases like this, where the Government activities are clearly at fault and the citizen is shown to be free from negligence, and compensation may be made for injuries of people at the hands of soldiers in the war. Something like that might perhaps be equitable and just, but I do not want to forecast what ought to be done.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Has the gentleman knowledge of many cases where soldiers have inadvertently run down and killed people?

Mr. RUCKER. There would be many, no doubt. I have heard in this debate of two old ladies in Texas who, I understand, were killed or badly hurt.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I was about to ask the same question as that propounded by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. JEFFERIS]. In view of the gentleman's statement that there would be claims amounting to billions of dollars similar to this, I would like to know from the gentleman whether or not there are people, like Mr. McGovern, who will be run down?

Mr. RUCKER. I hope the gentleman from Nebraska and the gentleman from Louisiana will not require that a man shall be assassinated or killed, because if he is injured you will come in and pay for his injuries, and there comes the tug of war again, because in every jurisdiction throughout this land for permanent injury compensation is always much higher than for death itself, because a man must live and bear and suffer from his injuries possibly for many years. It does not make any difference whether Government soldiers or employees of the Government have killed scores of men or not. If they have killed some and injured a score the debt may be bigger. I confess I was making a prophetic statement.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I hope not.

Mr. RUCKER. And while I have no claim to the gift of prophecy, I think the gentleman will live long enough to respect my opinion as a prophet to a greater extent than he does to-day.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is there any difference in principle between appropriating money authorizing the War Department to pay claims for damages to property and ourselves directly appropriating money for claims on lives?

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, the gentleman knows that those authorizations to which he refers were to cover a multitude of little matters that Congress could not be asked to consider individually, and therefore they were passed on to the War Department. But it will not do to pass on to the War Department the entire use of the purse of this Nation. Congress must not abdicate or abrogate its entire functions. We must do something in the discharge of our duties, and one of those duties at the present time, when there are so many pressing and meritorious and just claims against the Treasury—one of the highest duties that we owe is to see to it that we are not swept off our feet by mere sentiment and led to undertake that which will impose a burden and suffering upon the people of the Nation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I did not mean to suggest that we should refer these matters to the War Department, but I did mean to ask if there is any difference in principle between appropriating the money for damages to property on the one hand and appropriating money for life and limb on the other hand?

Mr. RUCKER. Unquestionably there is no difference in principle.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; I will yield. I will yield the gentleman time if he desires it.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Suppose Mrs. McGovern's cow had been killed. I suppose the War Department would have been compelled to pay her.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, the gentleman admits by his question he has been on both sides of these cases.

Mr. JEFFERIS. I ask that question in view of the action of Congress in appropriating money for property destroyed or damaged.

Mr. RUCKER. Let me ask the gentleman, would he not rather delegate to an official, to a Cabinet officer or one of his subordinates, the duty and the authority to settle for the value of an ordinary Nebraska cow than for a human life?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Yes; but that is not the case here. This is up to Congress.

Mr. RUCKER. I know; but I do not know why the gentleman asked me about a cow, if he does not want that comparison made.

Mr. JEFFERIS. If the Government is big enough to take care of cows, Congress ought to be big enough to take care of human life.

Mr. RUCKER. If the War Department has cared for the cow, then I am glad that the cow is cared for.

Mr. MANSFIELD. As long as the gentleman has brought up the cow question, I want to say that the War Department refuses to pay for live stock killed in target practice. I had a case of that kind, and the War Department refused to pay the claim. They deducted the amount, which was several hundred dollars, from the salary of the officer in charge, and we have had to force him to pay the claim.

Mr. RUCKER. I think the equity and justice of that is that a Texas steer, of course, does not know how to keep out of danger.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Texas men sometimes go into danger, too. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman from Missouri kindly yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. RUCKER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we are called upon here to-day to determine whether all of the people of the United States, acting through their Government, will aid and assist Mrs. McGovern, a widow and the mother of nine children, in bringing up those children and supporting herself, because of the death of her husband caused by and through the war and the inefficiency of one of its soldiers, or whether we shall be close-fisted enough to leave that duty to a comparatively few people in this country who are generous enough to come to her aid, her neighbors. That, in my judgment, is the one outstanding fact in this case. The woman has availed herself of the forms of law that we have given to her so far. She can not come into a court, for the courts would be without jurisdiction to try the case. She has come to her country, acting through the Congress of that country, and has asked it to repair the fault, as far as it lies in our power to repair that terrible fault, of one of the soldiers of this land in the greatest conflict that has ever come into its history. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] did not altogether place himself in absolute antagonism to the payment of $5,000 to this woman. As I understood him, he said that unless it developed that there was gross negligence upon the part of the soldier, or the person acting for the Government, he would hesitate to grant the relief asked for in this bill to this woman and her nine children. But permit me right here, gentlemen, to say something in connection with what has been said in reference to the sentimentality of this and other cases that may come before this Congress.

I hope it is not going to be the fashion in this country to sneer at sentiment as a great underlying motive that inspires us to do the holiest and the noblest things. Sentiment rises high above all reason and puts men on the battle field and causes them to sacrifice themselves for friends and family. And God grant that I may never live to see the day when sentiment will be ruthlessly trampled under foot and crushed out of existence in the life of this country. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] calls for evidence of gross negligence. Gentlemen, I am going to give him that evidence, evidence of gross negligence upon the part of this soldier, negligence of so gross a character as would cause him in a moment to give this woman not $5,000 but $25,000 to bring up her little girls and little boys as decent American men and decent American women. Long ago I heard it said that sometimes in a man's life one single expression will show his attitude toward life and his country better than all his other history. When you examine that statement, gentlemen, you will realize the absolute truth of it. The words "the die is cast" evidenced the character of Julius Cæsar when he crossed the Rubicon, better than all the other things that he had done in his lifetime. "Give me liberty or give me death" evidenced the character of Patrick Henry from his cradle. Similar expressions have at once painted the characters of men. I once heard a celebrated lawyer say that the character of that old Roman aristocrat, Pontius Pilate, and his sneering agnosticism, and his unbelief in everything, were clearly evinced by his expression to the Nazarene, as he turned and walked away, "What is truth."

I am going to avail myself of that principle in human existence which evidences the character of a man and his attitude toward life and toward his fellow men. Let me read to you something that will prove illuminating, and if it does not carry to your minds as it carried to mine the imputation of gross negligence that amounts almost to brutality, then I will have failed in my address here to you to-day. The evidence is that the driver of this vehicle said, "I don't see why the old fool didn't get out of the way." He referred to the fool who was lying prostrate, and about to cross the bourne from whence no old fool has ever returned. That was the brutal, outrageous, and atrocious statement made by the man who had put him to his death. You ask me to give you evidence that this man McGovern did not contribute to his unfortunate death, and the still more unfortunate circumstance that he left behind him a widow and nine children. Why, gentlemen, as I understand it, it is a common-law rule of evidence merely to require the owner to prove the death of his hog or goat or horse, and the burden is on the defendant then to show that the death was caused by the contributory negligence of the owner. In the case of an accident to a human being the rule is the other way, and he is required to prove that there was no contributing act of negligence upon his part. But where death ensues, the law mercifully steps in with an ameliorating feature, and you are not required to prove by a preponderance of evidence that the deceased did contribute to his own destruction.

Some one has said here, my friends, that we have shown a desire to protect property interests. Property interests ought to be protected. As I understand it, this Congress appropriated upward of $2,000,000 to pay the property interests of New Jersey for losses sustained as the result of explosions that took place there during the war. Mrs. McGovern is here prayerfully looking to you for $5,000 for the death of her husband, because of the destruction of the man whom she depended upon to give her support and to help her support the nine lives brought into existence by herself and her husband as the instrumentalities of nature. Talk to me about protecting property interests! For God's sake do not forget flesh and blood and the justice which would obtain in any court. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we are here to deal in equities rather than in legal technicalities.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. I understand the evidence in this case discloses that the driver was on the wrong side of the street.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I understand it so.

Mr. HERSEY. That is a legal proposition which every court in the United States has decided is negligence per se—to be on the wrong side of a traveled highway. If so, why should the United States try to avoid its own responsibility in this case?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I want to emphasize the equity involved in this case from that standpoint. That phase has been so clearly developed, so fully brought out, that I do not desire to consume any time in regard to it.

I wish to invite attention to the fact that in many instances Congress has acted in a manner similar to that proposed in this case. While I can not recall dates and names of cases that came before me as Auditor for the Treasury Department, I recall the fact in the main.

Here it is clearly disclosed that the misfortune followed an accident which occurred through a violation of the regulations of the city of Omaha. Here, perchance, a question of law might not come to the relief of the claimant as it would had it occurred under State law and clearly within the jurisdictional laws of the State. Will Congress, acting for the Nation, lay aside the equities in this case and say no? Will we even go to the extent of saying that we will not act upon this matter until we write a law sending all such cases to the Court of Claims? If so, this widow will never receive a penny. By the time you get around with that kind of business one or two generations may have passed away. Perchance the matter might be turned over to the Federal court with authority to hear and try the case. But we ought not to delay action in this case to provide for that line of procedure. It occurs to me that the equities are so clearly disclosed and the amount named is so clearly within reason that we ought to act on this matter in the affirmative now and then determine a general course of procedure afterwards. I am in favor of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to use a part of the time remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 29 minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, much of that which has been said evidences the wisdom of the constitutional division of our Government into the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, because there is not a man here who would not deeply sympathize with the person for whom relief is asked in this case and wish to afford her all possible relief under the law.

But we are a legislative assembly. We make the laws that determine the degree of the responsibility between man and man and between the Government and the individual. The question of liability under the law has always been determined, and always will be determined, by the courts and by juries acting under proper instructions from judges. To abandon that and bring a sympathetic case—and there may be many sympathetic cases—before a sympathetic legislative body and let it take the place of the court, judge, and jury is to nullify every American proceeding in the interest of justice.

Therefore I will propose an amendment to this measure, which I have prepared and sent to the Clerk's desk. I will ask the attention of Members to it that they may hear what I have prepared. After it is read I will discuss it for a brief time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all matter after the enacting clause and insert:

"That Mrs. Thomas McGovern or the authorized legal representative of Thomas McGovern, deceased, may sue the United States in the district court of the United States for the district of Nebraska under the rules and regulations of such court for damages causing the death of said Thomas McGovern, for the benefit of the widow and children of said deceased, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the authorized legal representative of Thomas McGovern, deceased, upon the same principle and measure of liability as in like cases between private parties and with the same right of appeal: Provided, That such suit shall be commenced within four months after the date of the passage of this act."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not offered now, but only read for information.

Mr. GARD. The amendment is read for information. The purpose of the amendment I will offer is to afford full, complete, and ample justice to Mrs. McGovern, or whoever may be the legal representative of Thomas McGovern, deceased, in the matter of his death caused by this enlisted man in the United States Army driving an Army automobile against him and killing him some time ago in the city of Omaha.

It gives the representative every right of presentation under all the rules of law, gives her the same right which one man may have against another, which any person might in private life have against another, the same right to present the evidence, the same right of appeal, and provides that the matter may be heard in the tribunal which has been created by law for the hearing of such matters and a judgment rendered after presenting the evidence and arguments of counsel and the charge in the court as to the law. This, it seems to me, is the proper way for us to proceed in this case, because I feel that the membership of this Committee on Claims do not desire to establish a precedent of responsibility on the part of the United States in cases of tort, and that is precisely what we are doing in this case.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of what the gentleman says, and is it not a fact that almost a similar proposition to what he has suggested occurs whenever a Government-owned ship collides with a private ship?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. That the Government then allows the private owner to sue in the district court?

Mr. GARD. Yes. I say that on the calendar now, Nos. 38 and 40, are bills introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HOLLAND] which are identical in the language of relief to the language of relief in the amendment which I propose. They are cases where damages were suffered by individual vessel owners by reason of the act of some employee of the United States, and the authority is given in those bills to the vessel owners to sue the United States and have a proper adjudication of the claim. That, of course, is a property right, and I realize that much has been said here upon the sentimental side regarding the loss of this man's life; and, as I say, every man here is, or should be, highly sympathetic. However, we are facing now a question of whether the United States of America, by the action of its House of Representatives, desires to commit itself to the policy of paying for the tort of an employee, a soldier or a civilian employee, under any sort of circumstances, because that is the result of the policy. This particular case may be and probably is a very meritorious one; but when once we establish a policy, when once we veer from the safeguards of the law and establish a policy based upon sentiment and on the natural desire of every man in the country to help the widow and the orphan, then we are establishing the principle which is dangerous, because it invades the authority already given and acted on for many years in the United States.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. He simply proposes to place this case in the district court?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. And allow the court to render judgment in the case?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Of course, the gentleman realizes that he is establishing a precedent that all cases in the future will be brought into the House——

Mr. GARD. And why not?

Mr. EDMONDS. And take the same course.

Mr. GARD. Why not? We say that John Smith owns a vessel, and the vessel is in New York or Norfolk Harbor, and through the fault of some Government employee the vessel is injured. John Smith may not sue the United States, but we give him the right to sue the United States in the proper court and have his claim adjudicated.

Mr. EDMONDS. But the reason for that is evident: That no committee of Congress could in any way hear the testimony in such a case and give any judgment upon it at all. In this case, however, it is possible for a committee of Congress to do so.

Mr. GARD. Oh, no; I do not think it is possible for any committee of Congress to substitute itself for a jury or a court.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. CLEARY. The gentleman does not mean to say that the vessel owner could sue the United States for damages to vessels at the present time?

Mr. GARD. Oh, no.

Mr. CLEARY. I know that he can not, because we have a lot of such cases.

Mr. GARD. I say that on this calendar are two bills authorizing suit against the United States in such cases.

Mr. CLEARY. But they are not yet passed.

Mr. GARD. They have not been passed, but we give them consideration and have given authority for the suit.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Does not the gentleman think the Committee on Claims and this Congress would be just as likely to reach a just determination as a jury would as to the merits of a case?

Mr. GARD. With all due respect to the gentleman and to the membership of the Committee on Claims, I do not, because the members of the Committee on Claims while engaged in the consideration of claims are not necessarily guided by the rules of law, the rules of evidence, the rules of responsibility such as govern private people in a case between private people, in the adjudication of their claims. The danger of it is just like what the gentleman says, that in a case like this of high sentimental value, it so appeals to the personnel of the Committee on Claims that they bring in and ask for consideration of a case here—the first of its kind so far as I know presented to the United States Congress—and the continuance of it will establish a policy which may be abused. That is the thing that I desire to impress upon the gentleman.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to place this in the hands of the Court of Claims and allow the Court of Claims to take evidence, and then report back to Congress, and then, in case we wish to establish a precedent of this kind we could do so.

Mr. GARD. My information is that the Court of Claims may not act in this case.

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, the Court of Claims can act if they are instructed by the House to do so.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] advises me that they can act only in cases of contract under the present law.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think that we can give them jurisdiction to act in a case like this.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. If the gentleman's amendment should pass and the executor or the administrator of the estate should sue in a court, and should find that the estate was insolvent, then the amount of money received on the judgment would go to a lot of creditors and would not go to the widow. Does the gentleman understand?

Mr. GARD. I understood what the gentleman said, and I am placing the responsibility of the United States upon the same plane of liability that would exist between two persons in private life.

Mr. HULINGS. I quite agree; I think it is all right, but I do think it should be a general bill, which I suppose we could not introduce here now otherwise, as a point of order would throw it out.

Mr. GARD. I do not think we could introduce a general bill or should.

Mr. HULINGS. A point of order would throw it out.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I do.

Mr. PARRISH. If the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio should be adopted, I would like to ask him what rule of law would be applied in the court in determining the liability. In other words, would the court charge the jury that if the sergeant who was driving this car was guilty of negligence that the Government should respond in damages?

Mr. GARD. I could not tell what the court would charge. I will say for the gentleman's information my amendment provides that it shall be tried upon the same principles and measures of liability as any like case between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal, so that the case would be precisely in line with every other case in the district court of Nebraska and the court would charge the law as existed in the State of Nebraska and as qualified by Federal enactments at that time.

Mr. PARRISH. As I understand the gentleman, in fact, it would be setting a precedent to allow liability in such case as this if it should be determined that the agent of the Government was guilty of negligence. Is that right?

Mr. GARD. Well, no; that may be a precedent; I do not know; but what I am complaining of is the establishing of a precedent by a legislative body and not by a jury acting under instructions of the court.

Mr. PARRISH. I think, though, the broader question—that is, the one that is uppermost in my mind and I think the one that exists in the minds of Members on the floor of the House—is whether or not the Government shall in such cases as the one now before us assume liability; and if so, under what conditions?

Mr. GARD. Certainly they should not assume an indiscriminate liability, and I call attention to this. If we start out here upon the principle of this general liability for torts, liability for accidents, we can not stop to base it upon the theory that a man in the military service hurts a man on the street and the Government should pay him, but we proceed upon the theory that the United States is responsible, not in a court, not before a jury, but here on the floor of the House of Representatives or in the Senate; that if the driver of a truck out here who delivers books from the railroad station to the House Office Building runs over a man on the street; or if a rural carrier in the course of his business, operating on some road in any State in the Union, runs over or injures a person, you are establishing the principle that all they need to do is to come to the Congress of the United States, introduce a bill for $5,000, $10,000, or $15,000, and the Congress, not acting as a legislative body but acting as a jury, passes on the merits of the case and says that the person shall have $5,000, $10,000, or $15,000, and says this money shall be paid out of the Federal Treasury.

Now, we all know, as a matter of fact—I do not claim any more merit than anybody else—we are all, if not eager, at least, acquiescent, in the use of other people's money, and we have been operating and have continually operated upon the theory that the Government shall pay for everything; no matter what it is, the Government shall pay; the rights of States, the rights of individuals, the rights of everybody are swept aside, their independent duties and obligations are swept aside, and we say the Government Treasury must pay for these things, and the matter of the approach to the Government Treasury is merely a matter——

Mr. PARRISH. I am in sympathy with the gentleman as to procedure, but what I am chiefly concerned about is to determine whether or not the amendment offered by the gentleman will set a precedent by which this Congress would be bound and by which the men who have these claims, as suggested by the gentleman's amendment, could go into the court, or ask this Congress for permission to go into the court, and then expect the right of recovery on the liability of the Government's agent?

Mr. GARD. I think it will be a precedent, but I do not see any reason why it should not be.

Mr. PARRISH. Under that precedent, for example, take all of those cases which have resulted in death, such as the shooting at Houston and destruction of property, and also at Brownsville and other similar cases. Does not the gentleman think that those people have the same right to come before the Congress and ask permission that those cases be put in the proper jurisdiction of the courts upon the same basis as this?

Mr. GARD. I think they would; and that is the danger of it, because once we open the gates, even to a case like this, admittedly a good case for damages, why, you throw wide the door for every sort of a case, good, bad, big, small, no matter what it may be, you throw wide the door.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I do.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The question here is, If we pass the gentleman's amendment, does it not afford a better opportunity for absolute justice in two respects? In the first place, it is not an ex parte hearing, but will have to be proved in court; and, in the second place, this Congress will be absolutely swamped if we undertake to decide these matters here.

Mr. GARD. Absolutely. I say it would seem to me that if the Congress abandons its right of legislation here as between individuals and legislation for the General Government as well, and seeks to place it upon the shoulders of a committee, and then transfer to a committee of the House, and then to the House itself, the burden of deciding damage cases, the House will be flooded with such cases, and you may not have an opportunity to hear anything else. And the things that will be brought in to influence Members of Congress to vote for this, and that, and the other are almost beyond comprehension.

I yield now to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY. In reply to the suggestion which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] made to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH] about opening up all kinds of suits of this character and deciding the rights of soldiers, would not the court, under the gentleman's amendment, have power in cases of that kind to determine whether those cases were in the scope and authority of the Government, and could not the court, under rules of law, determine all those questions much better than the House of Representatives?

Mr. GARD. I think so. I think if we would establish a policy of leaving our sacred moorings as a legislative body, and place upon our shoulders, willingly or unwillingly, the decisions of all the damage cases which may arise, either from the Military Establishment or the civil establishment of the United States, we will, as the gentleman from Texas has very well said, be swamped with such cases.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Ohio, if his amendment prevails, would it not act as a great injustice to Mrs. McGovern? The committee has recognized her claim. It is here; and if it is not considered, the case must begin anew, and probably she will lose many months in obtaining damages. I am in favor of the gentleman's amendment if it would relate to all the cases other than this special one. After she has appeared before the committee, not to pass it after it is favorably considered would act as a great injustice to her.

Mr. GARD. I do not think it would. In fact, I say to the gentleman in the utmost good faith that I think if this bill passes and this money is paid to this widow we will establish such a precedent for similar cases that we will be conferring benefits upon particular persons not enjoyed by the balance of the people. The law of the United States and the law of the several States is equal and exact for the high and the low, the rich and the poor. There is one kind of law, and there is one way to approach a decision in a damage case—by filing the petition in the court, having the issue joined, an examination of witnesses, and having the jury make a finding subject to rights of appeal. But there could be absolutely no injustice to Mrs. McGovern in such a case at all. If it was allowed to her it would be an injustice to 100,000 people in the United States.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I agree with the gentleman's philosophy; but in this case justice would not be meted to her.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Does not the gentleman recognize that sometimes a delay may amount to a denial of justice? Now, this woman has proceeded in an orderly and in the only way in which she could proceed up to this time, or until the amendment suggested by the gentleman shall be adopted in the House. This case may be acted upon without further delay, and then the gentleman can propose a law which would be approved by Congress, and the entire country would have notice to proceed in accordance therewith.

Mr. GARD. I am not arguing this case as a case in itself. I do not desire to argue the merits of this case at all or whether Mrs. McGovern should have the money or not. I do not proceed along that line. I proceed along the great, broad line of establishing a precedent here and of leaving what we have heretofore supposed to have been our duties under the Constitution and previous laws of placing ourselves in a jury box to act in a sympathetic manner upon such cases as may be presented.

Mr. DUNBAR. I will ask the gentleman who has proposed this relief or source of relief for the widow of this man who was run down and killed by an automobile operated by a soldier if he thinks that under her condition and circumstances in life it would afford an adequate opportunity to receive the justice that is due her? First, she would have to employ a lawyer to bring suit. There would be all the expenses attending a suit. She probably is a woman without funds. That lawyer would take her case on a percentage plan. Can the gentleman inform the committee that if she was to obtain a verdict in the court for $5,000, after paying her lawyer's expenses and after providing for the fees and the costs of the court, what would be the net sum that she would receive in all probability out of a verdict of $5,000? And then this additional question——

Mr. GARD. Let me answer one at a time. I have been trying to tell the House that I have not been considering the individual case at all. Of course, it would be impossible for me to tell what would be the proceeding under the case the gentleman has made known. I desire to impress anew—and if I have not already succeeded, my argument has entirely failed—that I am not arguing the merits of this case at all. I am arguing a principle as between the United States of America, the country we gentlemen represent, and its people, the people we represent.

Mr. LANHAM. Does not the gentleman think, in view of the many questions that come before Congress for consideration, that under the judicial procedure suggested and the amendments offered by the gentleman that justice may be done more rapidly and expeditiously, as a rule, than by congressional action?

Mr. GARD. I have not the slightest doubt of that. And not only judiciously and rapidly, but properly, for when gentlemen come down to consider things in their finality there would be no fair consideration here if we considered all of the claims that would be presented.

Mr. TINCHER. As I understand your amendment and the discussion on the amendment, you favor a policy in these cases of passing an act authorizing the plaintiffs to sue in the Federal court of their State?

Mr. GARD. In a proper case.

Mr. TINCHER. Would it be part of your policy to pass such an act, providing for the recommendation of the Committee on Claims in this House in each case?

Mr. GARD. I will say that the Committee on Claims, or some committee to whom the particular act was referred, should advise the House as to the merits of the particular case, and then the membership of the committee of the House, and the House ultimately, should determine whether the authority to sue the United States should be given the individual, and then suit could be brought.

Mr. TINCHER. Of course, I realize the gentleman is not considering this case. It is a question of policy.

Mr. GARD. It is more than a question of policy. It is a question of principle. I have no objection to calling it a question of policy, but it is broader and bigger than that. It is a question of absolute principle.

Mr. TINCHER. Of course, if your amendment prevails in this case there will be nothing to hinder the claimant from suing for the full amount of her damages and having a full hearing?

Mr. GARD. No. My idea is that the widow of this gentleman, or the legal representatives of Thomas McGovern, should be permitted to show that she suffered damages. If they can show a jury that she suffered damages in the sum of $5,000 or $10,000 or $15,000, I am perfectly willing that that sum shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to oppose the amendment at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not pending.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it takes three of us—the Clerk, the presiding officer, and myself, as I have 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized. He has 13 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. How much time has the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]?

Mr. RUCKER. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has 20 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. If I need more time I will ask the gentleman from Missouri to yield to me. I have 13 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I would be willing, if a subscription were taken up, to give $10 or $20 to this woman. It is a question of whether or not this is the proper way to proceed, and the safe way, and the just way. This bill is only a matter of $5,000, but this is the making of a precedent that will, if enacted, cost many hundreds of millions of dollars from the Treasury. I listened with great interest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD]. I always listen to him with great interest. He is a man of ability, of broad knowledge. Now, let us see about this. Are we a judicial body? No; this is a legislative body, but I do not know how many of us could qualify to sit on a jury if this claim was tried by a court. Now, I am sure the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], for whom I have great respect, could not qualify. If he were called to sit on a jury he would be ruled out. I do not know that I could qualify, because I think I am in the same condition as many other Members having constituents interested in such cases. I suspect that every man in this House, since the declaration of war—war across the ocean and war in the United States—has one or a dozen cases from his district like this. We would like to please our constituents and introduce bills and refer them to the Committee on Claims or War Claims and try them out.

Gentlemen, the consideration of this bill has taken a whole day. It has taken a whole day to try this one case before 430 Members of the House of Representatives, with a few absent, because there are two or three vacancies, I am sorry to say. [Laughter.] We would have to sit forever and a day if we undertook to make a precedent in our anxiety to please our constituents. It is perfectly proper that we should, if this House is to be the body which is to assess damages and hear cases of this kind, but you can not properly hear cases unless you have a chance to cross-examine, unless there is a day given, unless people are brought in who have knowledge, unless they are brought down and cross-examined, because if you could hear only one side of a case in the courts throughout the country, you would get bad verdicts as frequently as you would get good ones.

Now, I am not going to discuss the merits of this case. I am not going to say anything unkindly about the exceedingly able gentleman and legislator from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR], who is a great orator. I have great respect for him and very great respect for his ability, but it is not fair in this court that is trying this case for him to testify, or for the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] to testify, without a cross-examination. I have got a vote here, but I could not make all that speech about Julius Cæsar and Pontius Pilate and all those other people, you know. [Laughter.] Why, in spite of me I have more than once listened to the gentleman from Louisiana until my feelings were touched and the tears came into my eyes. You know there are two childhoods, the first and the second. I may be in my second childhood, and I can cry almost as easily now as I did in my first childhood. [Laughter.]

Now, as I said before, we have spent a day in the discussion of this case. Does anybody know what is the expense of running this House for a whole day? I do not know, but I guess it is more than $5,000. It is certainly of more importance to the country for us to consider under existing conditions general legislation and just legislation and sane legislation.

The gentleman who reports this bill and the gentlemen coming from this committee say frankly they want a precedent, because there are many other cases pending before the committee. They want to know what the precedent is to be. Now, there is just one way to find out what would be a safe precedent, and that is for the gentleman's committee to consider from the legislative standpoint a bill providing for the adjudication of these suits by the courts. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] has well said, I would not give the district court jurisdiction; I would give the Court of Claims jurisdiction. I would let them investigate and find all the facts. I would let them find the facts and report the findings and ascertain the damages, and then report to Congress for appropriation.

Well, you may say that would be slow work. I suppose it would be slow. Many things are slow. If such a bill should be adopted there would, of course, be limitations, because in any bill adopted or in any precedent made there must be a statute of limitations. Great heavens! How many lawyers are there in the United States? Out in Indiana if a man has good character he becomes a lawyer if he proves it and asks for a license. [Laughter.] I have great pride in Indiana; I grew up in that State. I do not know how many other States are so situated. But there are lawyers on speculation, and there are lawyers for fees, and there are people to work up cases and take fees such as they can get, and contingent fees, and so on. If we make this precedent the calendar will be loaded up, and bills such as this will be considered to the neglect of the public business.

I do not know. There has been no cross-examination in this case. It depends on affidavits. There has been no investigation whatever, except when this soldier was court-martialed and acquitted. There you are! I think we might well have general legislation, and I believe the chairman of this committee is perfectly competent to preside over a meeting of the committee to frame a bill that will cover such cases, so that when Uncle Sam pays he will pay in a real case after investigation. That is fair, is not it?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDMONDS. I should like to say that the Committee on Claims are to be congratulated on not having a lawyer for chairman.

Mr. CANNON. I will tell you what is the fact. I have heard the gentleman make his statement, and he talks about wanting a precedent, so as to know how to treat these cases. I have known men, and I should not wonder if the gentleman has a legal mind and is a good business man, well balanced, and from my acquaintance with him, if I had to pick out somebody to present my case, I would trust the gentleman, because if he could not bring it himself he could find somebody who could. So much for that.

Now, where do these cases come from that are pending? I will ask some Member to tell me how many are there? Are there a dozen, 20, or 30?

Mr. EDMONDS. I would not be surprised if there are probably 25 or 30.

Mr. CANNON. Introduced by Members of the House for their constituents. I will tell you right now that if I had a case of that kind in my district and should be asked to introduce a bill, and some affidavits were furnished, even though there was no cross-examination, there is no use in denying that if a constituent presented it I would introduce the bill, and I suppose I would cooperate with the other 30 who have already introduced bills, and then when we have made this precedent, we would come, all of us introducing maybe one, two, three, or four bills. Oh, gentlemen, I believe if there is no one who desires to make any further remarks upon this bill——

Mr. BLANTON. I want to offer an amendment. I want to follow the gentleman's suggestion that jurisdiction should be conferred on the Court of Claims.

Mr. CANNON. How long is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. It is a short one.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose the gentleman reads it.

Mr. BLANTON. May I have the Clerk read it for information?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield for the reading of the amendment for information?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the amendment suggested, for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLANTON: Page 1, after the enacting clause, strike out all of the balance of the bill and insert:

"That there is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims power and jurisdiction to hear and determine the facts concerning the claim of Mrs. Thomas McGovern for damages occasioned by the death of her husband, and to report to Congress findings of fact thereon."

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman examined the statute? Does that give full authority to let everybody have a day in court?

Mr. BLANTON. Only in this case. A point of order would be good against general legislation on a private bill, and that is the reason I have not offered an amendment proposing general legislation. There should be such general legislation with respect to all these war claims.

Mr. HULINGS. That is right.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] think that would be a proper amendment?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Why does not the gentleman offer an amendment empowering the Court of Claims to hear the case and render judgment thereon?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield me a little time?

Mr. RUCKER. I give the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think I shall use it all.

Mr. GARD. The amendment that I offered dealt more with details, providing for the measure of liability and the measure of damages and processes in the courts as between private parties, and I assume that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, for all legislative purposes, is probably as good as mine.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman modify his amendment by saying, "and after consideration report its finding to Congress"?

Mr. BLANTON. That is already in my amendment, the concluding clause reading:

And report to Congress its findings thereon.

Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me two minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I take it that if this matter were referred to the Court of Claims in this or any other case, the party would not be at any disadvantage with respect to any great amount of costs, because the Representative of that party would willingly appear before the Court of Claims, I take it, and see to it that the rights of the claimant were properly heard and adjudicated by that court. I would, without charging a single dollar in the way of fee, gladly appear and look after the matter for any of my constituents, and I am sure any other Representative would do likewise.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. Did I understand the gentleman aright to say that he would appear before the Court of Claims in behalf of a constituent?

Mr. BLANTON. I would.

Mr. RUCKER. They will not let you. They will not let you come in at all, unless you say that you do not come as an attorney.

Mr. BLANTON. If you come in there as a Congressman representing a constituent, I do not see how on God's earth they are going to keep you out. They would have a hard time keeping me out if I appeared for one of my constituents.

Mr. CANDLER. There is a Federal statute which forbids a Member of Congress to appear as a lawyer before any department.

Mr. BLANTON. As a paid attorney, yes. But I appear before the departments in Washington as a Representative almost every day, except Sundays and holidays, when I can not get in because the departments are locked up. On any other day besides Sundays and holidays you can not show me a department in Washington before which Members of Congress do not constantly appear.

Mr. CANDLER. Not as lawyers.

Mr. RUCKER. The Court of Claims is not a department.

Mr. CANNON. Under the statute they are not allowed to charge for it.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly not. Where is the Member of Congress who would charge a constituent anything in any such case? We daily appear before all departments of Government in behalf of our constituents, on business sometimes involving thousands and even millions of dollars, with our service rendered without any thought of fee, and in many instances we give our constituents the benefit of the very best legal assistance we are able to give. We appear for them not as paid attorneys but as their salaried Congressmen.

Mr. MACCRATE. Would the recommendation of the Court of Claims be binding upon Congress?

Mr. BLANTON. I assume that Congress would carry out the findings of the Court of Claims.

Mr. MACCRATE. There would be nothing binding on Congress; we would have the same power to examine again into the whole case.

Mr. BLANTON. We would know that the matter had been properly tried by a tribunal specially authorized and prepared legally to hear and try such matters on the law and the evidence. Congress is not prepared to pass on legal matters, matters of law, evidence, and equity in a case for damages. The Court of Claims is paid by the Government to do just that sort of work, and I take it that every Member of Congress would give due credence to the finding of facts by the Court of Claims. I dare say there is not a Member of Congress here who would not vote to uphold the judgment of the Court of Claims making a proper finding and award.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. There have been judgments rendered by the Court of Claims which are still pending; they have been certified to Congress for some 50 and even 100 years ago, and they have not been paid by Congress yet.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, somebody must have been derelict in their duty in not getting action. If there was a case from my district in which a constituent of mine was interested, with a favorable finding thereon from the Court of Claims, I think that Congress would hear something about it, and I should endeavor to get action.

Mr. CANDLER. I think that Members of Congress have done the same thing in regard to those claims.

Mr. BLANTON. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment I have offered is an improvement on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, which itself is good, and if my amendment is not adopted I shall support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], as one or the other should be adopted.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas had better be adopted rather than to pass this bill. I believe that the Committee on Claims should consider, prepare, and report to the House a well-considered bill to take care of this and such other claims of the same nature where it is claimed that the Government is liable.

Before the amendment of the gentleman from Texas is voted on, I wish to move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has not yet been read for amendment. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, before that is done I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say as one Member of Congress that I have not a claim before the Claims Committee or a request to introduce a special claim. I am interested in this discussion. It is a question of principle, and as the gentleman from Ohio said, we ought to take the time to iron it out.

I hope that no amendment will be adopted to this bill which will be, in effect, retroactive and would, in effect, turn this woman's claim back to be tried over again.

While it is said that there is not much difference between the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio and the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, both lawyers and both having been on the bench, one is to try the case in the Court of Claims that tries cases rather informally and the other refers it to perhaps the most thorough tribunal in the United States, the regular United States court.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I desire to ask the gentleman if after considering the two proposed amendments it is not a fact that my amendment leaves it to the court to determine whereas the amendment of the gentleman from Texas finally puts it up to Congress again to report on the findings of the Court of Claims?

Mr. TINCHER. The two amendments differ as much in principle and policy as there is difference between the present procedure and either of the two amendments. I believe that this case can be as fairly tried, with the 30 other claims that have grown out of the war, by the committee as they can be tried by anyone or any tribunal. I believe it is estimated that at the outside there are only 30 of these claims, and the committee can give the 30 claimants as fair and impartial a hearing as the district court or the Court of Claims.

But whether I am right or wrong, whether you want a special law or a general law permitting the Government to be sued on each and every one of these claims or permit the Committee on Claims to pass on them, no amendment should be adopted at this time which would be retrospective and make the woman try her case again. No one here says that her claim is not just and fair, and there is nothing to the argument that it is a dangerous precedent. This claim can be passed upon here, and then when the next claim comes before Congress if they want to adopt a new theory, a new policy, or pass a special law leaving it to the United States court or give them the right to go into the Court of Claims, Congress has a perfect right to do it. I believe that if there are only 30 claims, with what little knowledge I have of the procedure of United States courts, with what little experience I have had in the Court of Claims, I think that probably you will get speedier action and more exact justice if these cases are heard by this committee and passed by the Congress.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. I will.

Mr. DALLINGER. This Congress and preceding Congresses have repeatedly passed acts reported by the Committee on Claims granting compensation for injury to property. Does not the gentleman think that where life is concerned the Committee on Claims ought to have the right to act and the House to act upon such a case as this?

Mr. TINCHER. I do, and I think we have the right to do it.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. FRENCH. We ought to do one of two things, either provide a general law by which claims of this nature can go through the Court of Claims or the district courts, or else we ought to rely on the Committee on Claims as we would on a court. As it is, when we come into the House we find the time of the House taken and the time of the country, which is valuable, for legislation on claims of various kinds. My judgment is we should pay respect to the Committee on Claims, the same respect that is paid to the judgment of a court. Any Member of the Committee on Claims could well preside over a court, and yet at the same time we come here and spend hours of time, after the committee has carefully listened to evidence and sat upon the case and reported upon it. Our judgment can not be better than is theirs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me to ask a question?

Mr. RUCKER. I yield one minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Under our form of government, would the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] be in favor of amending the Constitution and clothing each committee of the House and the Senate with power to adjudicate?

Mr. FRENCH. I would not be in favor of that, but my first idea would be to provide some way by which claims of this kind could be adjudicated. If we refer this case to the Court of Claims or to the district court, what about the other 29 cases of somewhat similar character? We ought to have some general law by which this and other claims can go to the Court of Claims or to the district court and be heard.

Mr. CANNON. Then, the gentleman will vote with myself and the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FRENCH. If that would be the means of establishing this as a policy, I would be very glad to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time—five minutes—to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has not five minutes. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to suggest for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the amendment for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to be offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: At the end of the Gard amendment add: "Provided further, That the amount of such damages shall be limited to not more than $5,000."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I think in view of the fact that the United States Government would be a party to this suit and would have no one representing her except the district attorney, who would be involved in a great many other matters, and in view of the fact that sympathy for the party plaintiff would likely be created, there should be some limitation to the damages allowed. That is especially true in view of the fact that in some jurisdictions a man who has a considerable earning capacity may be allowed forty or fifty thousand dollars damages. Another objection that might lie to the way the Gard amendment is worded is the fact that the amendment provides that it shall be tried with the same principles and measure of liability as in cases between individuals. I submit that may differ in different jurisdictions. If the same rules apply as in the various State courts, which would be the principles that would apply in a Federal court in most cases arising between individuals, there would be certain defenses in some jurisdictions that would not exist in others. However, on the question of liability there should be a general law providing the basis of liability, and the defenses which might be pleaded, and these should be uniform all over the United States. My amendment, however, is simply for protection in this case. In certain jurisdictions recovery, for instance, is allowed not only for the damages caused by the loss of earning capacity but for the value of his services to his wife and in some instances for the care, culture, nurture, and education of children. Such damages might run up to forty or fifty or sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Why not allow the State limitations to govern as in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I would have no objection to allowing the State limitations to govern, but even that would permit much greater recovery in some States than in others. It seems to me there ought to be a specific amendment to the amendment which would either make the State laws govern or have general laws govern. But in any event, if you allow the case to go to the courts, with the United States party defendant on the one hand, the individual who is party plaintiff would have all the sympathy of the community, and would be likely to recover more damages than in a suit between private parties.

Mr. TINCHER. Does not the gentleman think $5,000 is a little small? Does the gentleman know of any State that has so small a limitation on a death claim?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I put it at $5,000 for this reason: Inasmuch as the United States Government is a party defendant, and inasmuch as it gives consent to the suit, I believe there would be much better chance for the plaintiff to recover in a case of this kind against the Government than there would be if it were between private individuals. Therefore, I think there should be a small limitation. In other words the certainty of recovery should be offset by a limitation of amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Thomas McGovern, the sum of $5,000 for damages suffered by reason of her husband, Thomas McGovern, being struck and fatally injured by a Government motor truck which was driven by a regularly enlisted soldier of the United States Army.

Mr. WALSH, Mr. BANKHEAD, and Mr. GARD rose.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has an amendment to perfect the text of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But I desire to offer a privileged amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I have an amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to move to strike out the enacting clause, which can only be done at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to strike out the enacting clause is a preferential motion, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the motion to strike out the enacting clause debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not take the gentleman from Alabama off his feet by a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman has five minutes in which to discuss his motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I regret I have not a little longer time to discuss the reasons which have caused me to make the motion to strike out the enacting clause. The range of this discussion here this afternoon shows that the consensus of opinion of members of the committee is that we are standing at the threshold of the adoption of an absolutely new policy with reference to the compensation of parties who might have been injured through the alleged negligence of persons in the service of the Government of the United States. Heretofore with possibly one or two debatable precedents this policy has not been recognized by the Congress. It is apparent, however, gentlemen, if it is entered upon that we are going to throw absolutely wide open the floodgates of controversy here before the Committee on Claims or the Houses of Congress to innumerable claims of this character involving enormous sums of money, and already, as has been suggested here, some 30 claims of this character are now pending before that committee. The argument of gentlemen has developed a wide variance of opinion as to the wisdom of entering upon this new policy. It seems to me that the wise course for this House to pursue before it embarks definitely upon the passage of bills of this character, which become accumulative precedents of the integrity of this policy, is that this matter should have careful and deliberate consideration involving the passage of a general bill covering all cases of this character. [Applause.] And the purpose of my motion to strike out the enacting clause, if adopted, means not indefinite but only reasonable delay in order to give the Congress of the United States through its proper committee or committees an opportunity to consider and frame general legislation covering cases of this character. My preference, simply from an offhand opinion, would be to confer jurisdiction upon the district courts of the United States, for reasons of economy and convenience to the litigants, as suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], rather than the Court of Claims, where every case that is brought is tried according to established rules of law and the merits of the case adjudicated in a regular established judicial tribunal of the United States. Now, while we confess and admit that the Committee on Claims or the other committees of the Congress are composed of men of integrity and intelligence, yet it is beside the mark to make the general admission that cases are tried before those committees as thoroughly and judicially as tried in the courts of justice, especially a court of the United States. And, gentlemen, with these ideas in view, with the tremendous importance of the ultimate policy that might be adopted at stake, and in view of the fact that it will not necessarily entail any hardship or any indefinite delay upon any claim which might be a just claim against the Government of the United States, it seems to me that every consideration of expediency and wisdom suggests that this great question of a general policy touching cases of this character should have consideration and action by the Congress under the provisions of a general bill affecting the merit of cases of this sort. I have offered the amendment I have with these ends in view, not for the purpose of defeating this claim—because it seems from a superficial examination as far as the evidence has disclosed here there may be a great merit in this woman's claim—but for the purpose, as I have suggested, of stabilizing the method of adjudication, for the purpose of seeing that every claim in the future shall have an absolutely real judicial determination. It seems to me that this matter is of sufficient importance to give pause before we establish a precedent here which will be referred to in all time to come as justifying the passage of all sorts of bills of a similar character. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MACCRATE and Mr. EDMONDS rose.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the committee [Mr. EDMONDS] desires recognition, and the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Claims very seldom has before it a claim that has any legal basis. We have to take up claims for torts against property and against persons. We have to take up claims where men have been injured while employed by the Government and no compensation has been allowed by law, and we have to decide whether we think the man, under the circumstances, is justly entitled to some compensation from this body. There is not so much difference between this case and those cases, except this, that these are cases where the man, a private citizen, has been injured by an act of some Government employee, and they have always been, for some reason or other, antagonized in this House; but yet at the same time, with the information that the committee can get hold of—and I think our information is fairly complete—we endeavor to try and do justice to these people. This case was one that was particularly appealing, and I want to say that in our examination we also go into the question to find out whether the man had money, whether he had insurance, whether he has any other compensation coming to him from a State board, and we endeavor in every way to protect the interests of the Government. Mr. McGovern, unfortunately, had no life insurance policy. He was in unfortunate circumstances and he let his policy run out three or four days before the accident. There is no question in my mind, after seeing the plans—unfortunately the House can not see those plans—that Mr. McGovern was in his full rights on the streets of Omaha. He was killed by an automobile that should have gone around the center prop in the street, as is required in many large cities, but probably on account of the fog, on account of the mist on the glass, the soldier did not notice that he was not proceeding in the proper manner; or if he did, it was incidental. If Mr. McGovern had left a large insurance policy, if he had been a man of wealth, we would not have given one cent——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why would not the woman have been entitled to compensation, even if he had had a policy, if he had a just claim against the United States?

Mr. EDMONDS. For the simple reason that there is no law on the statute books allowing the Government to pay for torts of employees. Therefore the act of the committee is one of mercy a great deal more than it is one of law. Now, we have in the last session and this session taken up this case. We have followed it probably as far as any court can follow it. We have the testimony of the witnesses and the testimony of the Government. The Government officials, of course, are not going to find their officer in the wrong if they can help it, but the testimony of the two individuals who were not in any way related to Mr. McGovern and who had no interest in the case whatever was that Mr. McGovern was in the proper place on the street and the automobile was not in the proper place.

Now, gentlemen, I leave it to you. We have done all that we could. If it is the desire of the House that bills of this character should go to the Court of Claims or some other court, I doubt whether the committee will raise any particular fight over it.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield for just a question?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. If we send a claim like this to the Court of Claims, why not send all pension claims to the Court of Claims?

Mr. EDMONDS. That is true, and I want to say if this claim is sent to any court the probabilities are that Mrs. McGovern's children will be grown up before they get any money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The question is on the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 57.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 1, lines 6 and 7, after the word "by," strike out the word "reason" and insert the words "the death," and in line 7 strike out, after the word "McGovern," the word "being" and insert the words "who was," so that the language will read as follows: "For damages suffered by the death of her husband, Thomas McGovern, who was struck and fatally injured," etc.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that the gentleman accepts the amendment, and therefore I desire to make one or two general observations in reference to this bill.

I notice that the jury have decided to embark upon this voyage and establish this precedent, but I want them to recall that an employee of the Navy was killed, apparently in line of duty, leaving a dependent parent, and that his life is worth $549.12; that a person, a police officer, who lost his life assisting the United States immigration officers in removing an insane alien, has his life valued at $2,500; but that when you get out into the great State of Nebraska and a worthy citizen is killed by a member of the military forces because the local ordinances of the city of Omaha say that the soldier was on the wrong side of the street, you climb up the grade and fix the value of the life at $5,000. I assume, although we have not yet reached the later stages of the Private Calendar, that the committee has arrived at instances where the value of life is $10,000.

Now, the gentleman from New York, in his harmonious and melodious undertones, suggests that probably that life was that of a Massachusetts citizen. I do not know as it was, but I assure the gentleman that if it was, the bill was introduced by some one other than myself.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON], I notice, has a bill upon the Private Calendar and seeks to interrogate me.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would not the name of the deceased indicate that he came from Boston?

Mr. WALSH. I do not know the name, because we have not reached the bill, as I stated at the outset.

But we are establishing the principle by this legislation that the great Government of the United States must be subject to the ordinances and by-laws of small municipalities, and if it can be established that a member of the service of the United States, military or civil, in performing his duty infracts the provision of a local ordinance, and somebody is injured or killed thereby, the Government must recompense his dependents. And I submit it is a wrong principle upon which to embark.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman believe——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I say I do believe. I do not know what the question was to be.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to know if the gentleman believes——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized in opposition to the motion.

Mr. DOWELL. Now, I desire to interrogate the gentleman from Massachusetts, and ask him if it is his position that the Government should not pay for the reckless killing of a private citizen by an officer of the Army?

Mr. WALSH. That is my position.

Mr. DOWELL. That we can permit the Army officers to go down the streets with impunity and kill citizens without being responsible for the damages?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, well, the gentleman knows if an Army officer recklessly tramples upon the rights of a citizen, there is recourse to the courts if it is criminal, and in this case the man who is said to have been negligent was court-martialed and was acquitted.

Mr. DOWELL. But the court-martial does not compute the damages he has sustained.

Mr. WALSH. No; the Committee on Claims does that.

Mr. DOWELL. And the Committee on Claims has passed upon the question that this was a reckless driving on the part of the Army officer.

Mr. WALSH. Well, they have not so stated in their report.

Mr. DOWELL. The report does make such a statement, or that is the conclusion of the committee. And it seems now that when the committee has passed upon that question we have no further to go than to find that the damages have been sustained, and if they have been sustained the Government should pay them.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. What damages would the gentleman recommend if the Committee on Claims had held that it was not reckless? Would it be $2,500?

Mr. DOWELL. If there was no carelessness on the part of the Government, there would be no damage at all. But in this instance the committee found that there was a reckless use of the automobile.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know upon what evidence the committee based their finding?

Mr. DOWELL. I do not, but I presume the committee did what it ought to do—secured the testimony—because it would not have arrived at that conclusion without making an investigation.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman read the report?

Mr. DOWELL. I have read through the report, and I have the conclusion of the committee, and that conclusion is sufficient to satisfy me that they have found that there was recklessness on the part of this officer.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has abundant and abiding faith.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That Mrs. Thomas McGovern, or the authorized legal representatives of Thomas McGovern, deceased, may sue the United States for the benefit of the widow and children of said deceased in the district court of the United States for the district of Nebraska under the rules governing such court for damages because of the death of Thomas McGovern, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine said suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the authorized legal representative of Thomas McGovern, deceased, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases between private parties and with the same right of appeal: Provided, That such suit shall be commenced within four months after the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. JEFFERIS. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska makes the point of order. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to be heard?

Mr. GARD. What is the point of order? Just making a point of order does not mean anything.

Mr. JEFFERIS. I think the gentleman's amendment is contrary to the entire scope of the bill.

Mr. GARD. Is that all that the gentleman desires to say about it?

Mr. JEFFERIS. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will be heard.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the bill is one, as the Chair knows, for the relief of Mrs. Thomas McGovern. It provides for an appropriation of a certain amount of money. The amendment I have offered provides for the relief of Mrs. Thomas McGovern, or the authorized legal representative of Thomas McGovern, by providing that the authority of the Congress of the United States is given her, on behalf of herself, as widow, and her children, to sue the United States because of the death of her husband and the father of her children. It seems to me it is germane, because this bill is for the relief of this person. The relief may be in one form or in another form. It is not essential, to make the matter germane to the bill, that it shall be the same relief as is carried in the bill but that it shall be germane to the issue raised, that it be germane to the object of the bill, which is for the purpose of affording relief to this woman because of the death of her husband.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true that your amendment provides for a legal remedy? In other words, it changes the law in this case, and provides that a suit may be brought in the courts? This claim now before the committee is to allow a certain amount as a claim against the Government. Your amendment is certainly not germane, because it merely provides a legal or technical remedy at law in the courts.

Mr. GARD. This is a matter, I take it, for the relief of this woman because of the death of her husband, who was injured, it is said, by an automobile driven by an enlisted soldier of the United States. The report says—and everybody agrees—that there is no legal liability for the torts of the agent, and that which we try to do under this law is simply a matter of grace, rather than of right, when we fix the kind of relief. To pay $5,000 is relief, but that which is incorporated in my amendment is also relief, since it confers upon the widow the unusual privilege of proceeding in a court of justice, where she now has not the right, to assert her claim on behalf of herself and her children for damages on account of the death of her husband.

Mr. DOWELL. But your amendment changes the law in this case.

Mr. GARD. There is no law.

Mr. DOWELL. There is none; but you are providing by your amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will address the gentleman from Ohio in the third person.

Mr. GARD. I make no point of that.

Mr. DOWELL. The amendment offered by the gentleman provides a change of law by which this case is brought into court. There is now no law on that subject, and she has no right to bring that action in court; but under this amendment, which is the enactment of new legislation, the gentleman from Ohio is seeking to enact new legislation, giving her authority to bring the action in court. It certainly is not germane to a claim which the House is acting upon. It has no relation to an action at law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. This is a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sum of $5,000 to the widow of the deceased—Mrs. McGovern. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio authorizes the legal representative of the deceased to bring an action, a proper action, in the district court of the United States for the district of Nebraska.

Mr. GARD. If the Chair will yield for a moment on that, the amendment I have in its amended form provides that Mrs. McGovern or her legal representatives shall bring the action.

The CHAIRMAN. Or her legal representatives. There is such a distinction between the bill and the amendment as has arisen in former cases and upon which many rulings have been made:

A bill to pay a claim may not be amended by an amendment directing that the claim be referred to the Court of Claims.

So that by analogy this being a bill to pay the claim outright can not be amended by referring the claim to the district court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 60 noes 16.

Accordingly the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

HEIRS OF ROBERT LAIRD M'CORMICK.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 6289) for the relief of the heirs of Robert Laird McCormick, deceased.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, how long is this bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. It is a very short bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I object. I think we ought to have the bill read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the heirs of Robert Laird McCormick, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $51.50 in full settlement of the claim of the said Robert Laird McCormick for cashing on insufficient indorsement Post Office Department warrant No. 11415, drawn April 28, 1887, to the order of Charles Perry for $51.50.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, this bill is for the relief of the heirs of Robert Laird McCormick, to legalize the payment of an improperly indorsed Post Office Department warrant. There is no objection to the bill on the part of the department. The warrant is still carried down there, and undoubtedly the heirs of Robert Laird McCormick should be paid this money. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], who would like to explain the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I take the time of the House only to explain an interesting case which shows something of the Government's delays. This particular bill has been on the private claims calendar in every session of Congress for three Congresses. It has been just about to be reached in every session, but until now never has been called up. Roll calls or objections or fights over other measures have prevented action on a measure to which no one could offer objection. As stated by the chairman of the Claims Committee, the bill provides authority for paying $51.50 to the McCormick estate on a post-office warrant dated April 28, 1887.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. Is this the famous cow case?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no; the cow case is coming later. There is no dynamite in this bill. [Laughter.]

This warrant was issued April 28, 1887, and the money was appropriated by the Fiftieth Congress in the Post Office appropriation bill of that year for the payment of that sum. That was 32 years ago. Mr. Carlisle, of Kentucky, was Speaker of the House, and Nelson Dingley, of Maine, was here, as were also Dockery, of Missouri, and Funston, of Kansas, father of the general—both famous men. William C. P. Breckinridge, the silver-tongued orator from Kentucky, was here in the House. Private John Allen, of Mississippi, was here, with his droll speeches and ready wit. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, now Senator, and the father of our own distinguished colleague, young BANKHEAD [applause], was a Member then. Bland, of Missouri, a famous and lovable man from the Middle West, was here.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And we have one here now. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, afterwards Speaker, and the father of our distinguished colleague, was here. [Applause.] Amos J. Cummings, the New York newspaper man, was here, at a time when newspaper men in Congress were more rare than now. Cummings was here, the patron saint and bail provider for all the Tammany braves who ever came down here and got into jail. [Laughter.] Benton McMillin was here. Uncle JOE CANNON was here, and had been here for about 15 years at the time this money was appropriated, 32 years ago, to pay this claim. [Applause.] Even then he was an old-time Member of Congress. Our present Speaker, Mr. GILLETT, and our last Speaker, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, both now regarded as old-time Members, had not then been elected for their first terms.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. DOWELL. Is the gentleman giving us a list of these names to show the reason why this claim was not passed at that time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no. This bill is to pay some money that they appropriated.

James S. Sherman, afterwards Vice President, was here; and Springer, of Illinois; and Joseph Wheeler, afterwards a prominent general in the Spanish-American War; and Roger Q. Mills, of Texas. [Applause.] Mills kicked down the door to break a quorum. How times have changed, but Texans even now are concerned about quorums. And LODGE, the brilliant Senator, was then in the House. [Applause]. And still another whom none will forget—Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, afterwards Speaker. [Applause.]

Of course Congress was not to blame because this sum of $51.50 was not paid in all these 32 years, but it has been, in a measure, for the last several years. Perhaps a better way would be to say that Congress should not be called upon to handle such matters of routine as this.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. What became of the money that was appropriated to pay this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It lies in the Treasury subject to payment upon the proper signature on this voucher, which can not be had.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Was the voucher never signed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The voucher was improperly signed, but will be paid when this bill is passed. The occasion for an act of Congress is this: Charles Perry, to whom this warrant was made payable, had earned this money by carrying the mail. He disappeared and was never afterwards heard of. His wife undertook to sign his name and then her name, and on that double signature a bank in Sawyer County, Wis., paid the warrant, presented it to the Treasury Department, and, of course, it was not accepted, being improperly indorsed. Then the bank went out of business and this United States warrant was laid away in the papers of Robert Laird McCormick, who moved to Tacoma. After his death this was found among his papers. Something more than five years ago it was sent to me with a request for an act of Congress to authorize payment. Its passage was recommended by the Post Office Department, and on every claims calendar day from that time to this I have sat on this floor with this bill in my hip pocket waiting for its number to be called. It is a little more than fifty-fifty; it is $51.50. At last it is called, and I hope it will pass. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It occurs to me that if the proper method had been followed this warrant could have been paid long ago. When it was drawn and failed of payment, at the end of the third year for which the appropriation was set apart, the amount of money appropriated to pay that warrant passed to outstanding liabilities to the credit of the person named in the warrant. If there was any irregularity in regard to the indorsement that could have been corrected by the regular procedure in the probate court and letters of administration could have come forward with the proper signature and the money would have been paid under the head of "Outstanding liabilities."

Let me cite a notable instance of this character. One of the United States Senators from the State of Indiana, the late Senator Turpie, had nearly $26,000 of his salary for his last term as United States Senator standing in exactly the same position as this warrant is now. After he died his heirs came forward and cashed the checks that were still available outside of the range of outstanding liabilities, made claim of $26,000, and I stated that account to pay the money to his estate.

This warrant stands on the same basis. Perchance this bill will expedite matters to some extent, and therefore I would not offer any objection to it. But the matter could have been adjusted long ago if it had followed out the regular course of such payments through a statement of account by the Auditor of the Treasury Department under the head of "Outstanding liabilities."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "the," strike out the word "heirs" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "executor or administrator."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I do that because of the form of the bill which might impose on the Secretary of the Treasury an almost impossible task of paying the small amount of $51.50 to what may be 40 or 50 heirs, whereas the payment should be made to the legal representative of the estate.

Mr. EDMONDS. I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. May I ask whether the committee is to be deprived of the good counsel and advice of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and, if so, for how long?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The Clerk will report the next bill.

PERRY E. BORCHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 646) for the relief of Perry E. Borchers because of losses suffered, due to destruction of property and termination of contract for services because of smallpox, while in the employ of the Navy Department in Cuba.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Perry E. Borchers, of Tadmor, Ohio, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $346.45, the amount of loss sustained due to the destruction of his personal property while in quarantine and to the loss of his position through termination, by the Navy Department, of his contract for services as superintendent of construction at the United States naval station, Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the figures "$1,195.85" and insert "$346.45."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, this bill is for the relief of the superintendent of construction at the naval station at Guantanamo, Cuba. Although Mr. Borchers asked for $1,195 the committee felt that there was no legal obligation on the part of the Government to pay that claim, but in equity we thought he was entitled to be remunerated for the value of the clothing and the expenses of travel to his home town, amounting to $346.45. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire any time; the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated the case. But I think when the committee found there was no liability for loss of wages on account of the contract that that part of the bill which sought to compensate him should have been stricken out and the bill made to compensate him for the destruction of the personal property while in quarantine. There is no allowance for contract.

Mr. BLANTON. May I suggest that it would be better to leave it in, otherwise if you strike it out he may come back in the next Congress and ask damages under these allegations, whereas if it is left in the bill it becomes in a way res judicata.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think perhaps the gentleman from Texas is right. The idea of the committee was that this was to be a complete payment.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection to it; I merely suggested that when the committee found there would be no liability on the United States on account of the contract that there should be an equitable liability on account of the loss of the personal property.

Mr. EDMONDS. It is a bonus, a gift of $341.45, and let that cover the whole claim.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me you insist on keeping in the allegation of loss of compensation, and that admits that he is entitled to something for the loss of compensation on account of the contract. Was there a contract? Was he a regular naval officer?

Mr. GARD. This man went down there under a communication from the Bureau of Yards and Docks in the Department of the Navy on December 13, 1915, to take the position of superintendent of construction of the naval station at Guantanamo, Cuba, at a compensation of $6.48 for each working day.

When he got down there he was thrown in contact in his living quarters with the smallpox, contracted the disease, and his personal goods and effects which he brought down from the States were destroyed by order of the quarantine officials. He was kept there such a length of time that he claimed that he should be compensated for the loss of the contract. In other words, when he recovered he was ready to take up the work, but the health authorities, out of a superabundant caution, refused to allow him to continue, kept him under strict quarantine, but allowed him to come to the States. They gave him no compensation except for the four or five days that he had worked. It seemed to me that when the committee made a finding of an allowance to him for his personal property only it should not have included language with reference to the loss of the contract.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. This damage is the cause of disease contracted by this claimant?

Mr. GARD. The element of damage as claimed by Mr. Borchers is this: He had been summoned to this place in Cuba and was placed in contact with a smallpox patient by reason of his employment. The smallpox he contracted, and when he recovered and was ready to continue the obligations of his contract they refused to allow him to proceed.

Mr. DOWELL. He was the superintendent of construction?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. In the employ of the Government?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is the Government liable for damages because he contracted a disease while he was in the employ of the Government?

Mr. GARD. Oh, no. It is not because he contracted disease. In fact, the question is not debatable, because the committee found that he was not entitled to anything on that account.

Mr. DOWELL. But the damage grows out of the fact, however, that he contracted the disease for which his clothing or something was destroyed.

Mr. GARD. He contracted the disease down there in the service, in line of duty, being placed in a position where he could contract it, and then his clothing and everything he had were destroyed.

Mr. DOWELL. If he is not entitled to anything by reason of a damage case on the part of the Government, why is the Government liable for damages to clothing which is based upon the same statement of facts?

Mr. GARD. I do not know, as a legal proposition, but I suspect this would be the reason on which the committee acted. I did not appear before the committee, and I do not know. The matter was presented by Mr. Borchers. I have no information about it save that I introduced the bill at his request. I suspect the element of damage by loss of property was much more easily arrived at than the amount of damage he would get by reason of his being refused to be allowed to carry out his contractual obligations as superintendent of construction.

Mr. HICKS. Is it not easy to assume that the destruction of his clothing was a general health proposition for the benefit of all others who might be in the neighborhood?

Mr. GARD. They destroyed his clothing and everything that he had.

Mr. HICKS. And it was the proper thing to do, it seems to me.

Mr. GARD. I suspect it was, under the circumstances. At least, as a health protection they thought it was the proper thing to do, and this committee thought that having destroyed his clothing he should be compensated therefor.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the gentleman was suggesting that the other claim should be determined by the courts. Is not this a claim that should go to the Court of Claims? Does not the same reason for sending the other claim to the Court of Claims exist in this case?

Mr. GARD. Oh, no.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there any difference?

Mr. GARD. Oh, yes. The other claim, as I tried to explain, is whether the United States is responsible for the tort of an employee or person in its military service. This claim is one whether the Government is responsible for property actually destroyed by the Government.

Mr. DOWELL. Then the gentleman would say if the committee had allowed anything because of damages to an individual it would have come under the same rule—personal injury?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think the gentleman has that a little wrong.

Mr. GARD. Oh, no; the difference is as wide as the poles.

Mr. DOWELL. The bill reads as follows——

Mr. GARD. One question arose as damages for tort, the unlawful act causing the death of another man, and this is the admitted destruction by the Government of one's property.

Mr. DOWELL. But if the gentleman will permit, the bill reads as follows:

The amount of loss sustained due to the destruction of his personal property while in quarantine and to the loss of his position through termination, by the Navy Department, of his contract for services as superintendent of construction.

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. The committee allowed nothing, as I understand it, for the loss of his position, but, as I understand the argument of the gentleman, if the committee had made such an allowance, then the rule that the gentleman applied to the other bill would apply to this, and it should have gone to the court.

Mr. GARD. No; I do not think so. I can see, and I suspect the gentleman can, a very wide difference between damages and responsibilities of the United States for things it actually does itself and things which some soldier or civilian employee may do and which we call by the legal name of tort.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. If I understand the gentleman from Ohio, where there was a tort, he would send it to a court to determine the amount of damages. That is the question of fact, but where it was not a tort he would not send it to a court. Is that the distinction he makes? If I understand the chairman of the committee, he says there is no legal liability in this case at all.

Mr. GARD. No; he does not do that.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Does the gentleman from Ohio in that case think we ought to vote for this bill, when there is no legal liability?

Mr. GARD. The gentleman has not said that, as I understood him. What the gentleman said was he thought there was no legal liability on the contract, and the other part arose by reason of the fact that the Government actually destroyed this man's clothing.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. The gentleman's understanding and recollection of the chairman's statement is different from mine. I understood him to say there was no legal liability whatever, only an equitable one.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. GARD. I have not the floor, but I would be glad to afford information.

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true in all cases of quarantine that under the laws of the various States the property is destroyed which would in any manner scatter the disease?

Mr. GARD. Well, if that is not true, it should be true.

Mr. DOWELL. Why should the Government pay this claim any more than other claims where clothing and property are destroyed?

Mr. GARD. There is no reason why this claim should be singled out before any other claim. It was presented as a proper claim and allowed by the Committee on Claims, which is all the reason I know.

Mr. DOWELL. Do I understand the gentleman to say there is no legal liability whatever for the payment of this?

Mr. GARD. The only liability is that found in the presentation of the claim and the consideration of the evidence by the committee and what is in this bill that creates a liability as any other liability. If there had been a legal liability, there would be no occasion for this character of legislation.

Mr. DARROW. This is for the destruction of clothing to prevent the scattering of the disease of smallpox. That is enforced, as I understand it, under all quarantine laws, and this is no exception. This is done in all cases. Then the question arises, the committee says there is no legal liability whatever, then why is this claim here and why is it presented to the House?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I will answer that. Mr. Chairman, this bill is to reimburse this man as superintendent of construction. He was employed in this country to go down and superintend the building of a building at the naval station at Guantanamo, Cuba. Unfortunately, after he had been there five or six days he caught the smallpox. He was laid up; the construction had to go on, was carried on by the department, probably, with some other superintendent of construction. When the man got well there was no work for him. After he had taken the smallpox, of course, they destroyed all of his clothing. It seemed like a peculiar hardship not to give him any redress at all. He had been employed by the Government; he had earned no salary; he had taken a long trip to a tropical clime; he had been exposed to smallpox.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; surely.

Mr. DOWELL. This claim provides for the payment of his traveling expenses home.

Mr. EDMONDS. From Washington.

Mr. DOWELL. Yes. In any event, when his employment ceased there was no obligation on the part of the Government to pay his traveling expenses one way or another, and I am unable to understand why the committee and how it could find that the Government, under any construction, should pay his traveling expenses to any place.

Mr. EDMONDS. My understanding is that the Government was under contract with him to send him to Guantanamo and bring him back. They did that in one of the Navy ships.

Mr. DOWELL. And that they performed?

Mr. EDMONDS. They performed that duty. When he came back here he was supposed to be returned home. That was my understanding.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman mean now that the Government had a contract by which he was to have his expenses paid to his home after his return?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think that is true, but I will not say that positively.

Mr. DOWELL. That would seem to me a very peculiar contract.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman will pardon the interruption. the information as disclosed on page 5 of the report as given by Civil Engineer Thurber, United States Navy, is as follows:

> Transportation from your home to Guantanamo and return will undoubtedly be paid by the Government. Will you please let me know whether or not you would accept this position if offered to you?

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for just one other question? If there is a contract, as the chairman of the committee suggests, for the payment of expenses to his home, then certainly this claim has no place before this House, because it is then the duty of that department to pay that claim, because there is a valid and binding contract. Now, if there is no contract, there is no obligation, and certainly we will be going a long way to start upon the practice of paying expenses of employees to their homes when there is no contract and no obligation on the part of the Government to pay it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The chairman of the committee has stated clearly on the floor to-day with respect to all these claims that there is no legal liability on the part of the Government.

Mr. EDMONDS. I say most of the claims that come before the committee——

Mr. DOWELL. Now, it is claimed that there is a contract by which the railroad fare and expenses to his home were to be paid?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think it is very propable that, owing to the fact that he did not complete his contract, the Government refused to pay his fare home, although they did agree to pay it.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. May I suggest if there were a legal liability for a claim the account should be stated in the department, and it is because of the absence of a legal basis that it would appear before the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is it exactly.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. If there be a legal basis for a claim, the law which authorizes the creation of an obligation offers the foundation for the settlement of the question by an accounting officer, and the submission of the certificate of settlement to the Committee on Appropriations for payment. Now, on that basis there would be a legal foundation, and it would then go to the Committee on Appropriations and not to the Committee on Claims. But where many of these cases arise, as they do in the course of the Government, where the equities are clear and well defined, the case can come to the Committee on Claims, and it passes upon the equity and submits the evidence, and Congress furnishes the legal basis for payment of the money.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. While there was not a legal liability, and in most of the cases presented to the Committee on Claims there would not be, because the Government could not be sued or make a contract or be liable in the same way as an individual, in this case there might be an obligation from the fact that the engineer, C. D. Thurber, of the Navy, who directed him to go to this place, said in his letter directing him to report at Guantanamo:

> Transportation from your home to Guantanamo and return will undoubtedly be paid by the Government.

An obligation might arise from that.

Mr. EDMONDS. The probabilities are that the man, not being able to complete his contract after arriving in Cuba, came back home and did not get the reimbursement for his fare. I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The bill was read for amendment.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Committee amendment: Page 1, line 6, strike out the figures "$1,195.85" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$346.45."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

AMHERST W. BARBER.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call up the next bill on the calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1377) for the relief of Amherst W. Barber.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Amherst W. Barber, the sum of $263.37, for the resurvey of 23 miles, 75 chains, and 42 links of township lines on public lands in the State of Colorado, executed by him and necessary to complete the lines of survey embraced in his contract No. 710, dated April 2, 1885.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized.

Mr. WALSH. So do I.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have not had the floor to-day. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, this is a claim for the sum of $263.37, for a resurvey made by a man named Barber in 1885, of some public lands in the State of Colorado. The claim has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, who has written the committee a letter saying that it is, in his opinion, a just claim against the Government.

When Mr. Barber presented his claim for the resurvey made, the amount claimed by him was disallowed, presumably for the reason that the funds to which resurveys were chargeable had become exhausted. It is a claim that Mr. Barber has had against the Government for 34 years. It has passed the Senate on several occasions, and was before the House throughout the entire Sixty-fifth Congress. Senator NELSON, who is the author of this bill, is very anxious to get it through, in view of the fact that Mr. Barber is in very poor health.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I understand the reason why it was not paid, to begin with, was because the appropriation or fund for such purposes was exhausted.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is what the Secretary of the Interior said.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Otherwise it would have been paid shortly after the work was completed?

Mr. KNUTSON. The Government adopted the work which Mr. Barber had done.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Was the gentleman who is to be the beneficiary of this bill employed by the department to do this work?

Mr. KNUTSON. No. I think that Mr. Barber at the time was assistant surveyor of the State of Colorado, and the Government employed him to do certain surveying under contract.

Mr. WALSH. Under contract with whom?

Mr. KNUTSON. With the Government, at so much. I do not know upon what terms surveyors work, but I presume it is so much per quarter or so much per section or so much per mile. Whatever it may be, the report shows that it was necessary in making the survey to make certain resurveys of township lines, and that the Government subsequently adopted the resurveys made by Mr. Barber.

Mr. WALSH. They paid for the original surveys, I assume. They were wrong, and now are to pay for the resurveys?

Mr. KNUTSON. There is nothing to show that the original surveys, which were wrong, were made by Mr. Barber.

Mr. WALSH. There is not much of anything shown in the report. The department recommends the bill. I am not opposed to the measure, but I am trying to ascertain whether the beneficiary of this bill made the surveys and also made the resurveys?

Mr. KNUTSON. I am frank to say that I can not answer the gentleman authentically on that, but I will say that there is nothing in the report to show that he made the original surveys.

Mr. WALSH. This claim has been pending for some little time, I understand?

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not know how long it has been before Congress, but it has been here for three years to my own knowledge, and in that time it has passed the Senate twice.

Mr. WALSH. And Mr. Barber is now in poor health?

Mr. KNUTSON. He is in poor health and in poor circumstances.

Mr. ALMON. The gentleman says the bill had passed Congress.

Mr. KNUTSON. If I said that I meant the Senate.

Mr. ALMON. The gentleman said "Congress" several times.

Mr. KNUTSON. I meant the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Amherst W. Barber, the sum of $263.37, for the resurvey of 23 miles, 75 chains, and 42 links of township lines on public lands in the State of Colorado, executed by him and necessary to complete the lines of survey embraced in his contract No. 710, dated April 2, 1885.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the bill be laid aside with favorable recommendation. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report to the House the bills that have been passed, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bills that have been amended and those without amendment be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the committee rise and report to the House sundry bills that have been under consideration by the House, some with and some without amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills be passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration sundry bills, had directed him to report the same back to the House, some with amendments and some without, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills do pass.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bills and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first one.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5348) for the relief of Mrs. Thomas McGovern.

With an amendment.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CANNON. It can not be done by wholesale, I guess.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. GARD. Yes. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Claims, with the instructions to report it back forthwith after striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting therefor the language which I submit.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARD moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Claims, with instructions to report it forthwith, after striking out all the matter after the enacting clause and substituting therefor the following:

"That Mrs. Thomas McGovern, or the authorized legal representatives of Thomas McGovern, deceased, may sue the United States for the benefit of the widow and children of said deceased in the district court of the United States for the district of Nebraska under the rules governing such court for damages because of the death of said Thomas McGovern, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine said suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the authorized legal representatives of Thomas McGovern, deceased, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such suit shall be commenced within four months after the date of the passage of this act."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill. This question, I will say to the Speaker, was raised in committee, and the point of order was sustained. If the Chair desires to hear arguments on the point of order I shall be glad to assign my reasons.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not care to hear the arguments. In the first place, if it was sustained by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the Chair would be very much disposed to follow that decision in any event; but there is a decision which has been called to the attention of the Chair which is exactly in point, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I am.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Claims, with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That there be, and is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims power and jurisdiction to hear and determine the facts connected with all claims against the United States Government based upon injuries sustained through the alleged negligence of agents and servants of the United States, occurring since April 6, 1917, and to make proper findings of fact thereon."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against that.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. HICKS. It seems to me this is almost in line——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time I admit that it is subject to the point of order, if the point is made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The previous question having been ordered, the question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, and pending that I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WALSH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state it.

Mr. WALSH. If the House should now adjourn, the previous question having been ordered on the bill, would the vote come on the bill immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning?

STRIKING CERTAIN MATTER FROM THE RECORD.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SEARS. On October 2, on page 6281 of the RECORD, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] made a motion to strike from the RECORD part of an extension inserted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL]. My inquiry is to ask if that motion has been disposed of, and if so, how?

The SPEAKER. That has not been disposed of. The gentleman from Massachusetts stated that he would wait until the gentleman from New York was present before he would call it up.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, another parliamentary inquiry. Is it possible to strike from the permanent RECORD remarks of gentlemen? As I understand it, after a certain number of days have elapsed the permanent RECORD is printed. Is it possible to strike from the permanent RECORD any remarks that have been included in it?

The SPEAKER. It would be too late if the RECORD had been printed, but about 10 days elapse before the permanent RECORD is printed, as the Chair understands.

The commissioners shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The term of each commissioner shall be three years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he succeeds. The commission shall at the time of its organization and annually thereafter elect a chairman from its own membership. The commission may make such regulations as may be necessary to carry this title into effect.

"All powers and duties of the commission may be exercised by a majority of its members. A vacancy in the commission shall not impair the right of the remaining commissioners to exercise all the powers of the commission. The commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed.

"SEC. 103. Each commissioner shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year, payable monthly. The commission shall appoint a secretary, who shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year, payble in like manner; and, subject to the provisions of the civil-service laws, it may appoint and remove such officers, employees, and agents and make such expenditures for rent, printing, telegrams, telephone, law books, books of reference, periodicals, furniture, stationery, office equipment, and other supplies and expenses as may be necessary to the administration of this title. All of the expenditures of the commission shall upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor, approved by the chairman of the commission, be audited and paid in the same manner as other expenditures for the District of Columbia.

"With the exception of the secretary, all employees of the commission shall be appointed from lists of eligibles supplied by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the civil-service law.

"SEC. 104. The assessor of the District of Columbia shall serve ex officio as an advisory assistant to the commission, but he shall have none of the powers or duties of a commissioner. He shall attend the meetings and hearings of the commission. Every officer or employee of the United States or of the District of Columbia, whenever requested by the commission, shall supply to the commission any data or information pertaining to the administration of this title which may be contained in the records of his office. The assessor shall receive for the performance of the duties required by this section a salary of $1,000 per annum, payable monthly, in addition to such other salary as may be prescribed for his office by law.

"SEC. 105. For the purposes of this title the commission or any officer, employee, or agent duly authorized in writing by it, shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy, any books, accounts, records, papers, or correspondence relating to any matter which the commission is authorized to consider or investigate; and the commission shall have power to require by subpœna the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all such books, accounts, records, papers, and correspondence relating to any such matter. Any member of the commission may sign subpœnas, administer oaths and affirmations, examine witnesses, and receive evidence.

"Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such books, accounts, records, papers, and correspondence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. In case of disobedience to a subpœna or of the contumacy of any witness appearing before the commission, the commission may invoke the aid of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or of any district court of the United States. Such court may thereupon issue an order requiring the person subpœnaed to obey the subpœna, or to give evidence touching the matter in question. Any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. No officer or employee of the commission shall, unless authorized by the commission or by a court of competent jurisdiction, make public any information obtained by the commission.

"SEC. 106. For the purposes of this title it is declared that all (a) rental property and (b) apartments and hotels are affected with a public interest, and that all rents and charges therefor, all service in connection therewith, and all other terms and conditions of the use or occupancy thereof, shall be fair and reasonable; and any unreasonable or unfair provision of a lease or other contract for the use or occupancy of such rental property, apartment, or hotel with respect to such rents, charges, service, terms, or conditions is hereby declared to be contrary to public policy. The commission upon its own initiative may, or upon complaint shall, determine whether the rent, charges, service, and other terms or conditions of a lease or other contract for the use or occupancy of any such rental property, hotel, or apartment are fair and reasonable. Such complaints may be made (a) by or on behalf of any tenant, and (b) by any owner except where the tenant is in possession under a lease or other contract, the term specified in which has not expired, and the fairness and reasonableness of which has not been determined by the commission.

"In all such cases the commission shall give notice personally or by registered mail and afford an opportunity to be heard to all parties in interest. The commission shall promptly hear and determine the issues involved in all complaints submitted to it. All hearings before the commission shall be open to the public. If the commission determines that such rents, charges, service, or other terms or conditions are unfair or unreasonable, it shall determine and fix such fair and reasonable rent or charges therefor, and / or fair and reasonable service, terms, and conditions of use or occupancy. In any suit in any court of the United States or the District of Columbia involving any question arising out of the relation of landlord and tenant with respect to any rental property, apartment, or hotel, except on appeal from the commission's determination as provided in this title, such court shall determine the rights and duties of the parties in accordance with the determination and regulations of the commission relevant thereto.

"SEC. 107. A determination of the commission fixing a fair and reasonable rent or charge made in a proceeding begun by complaint shall be effective from the date of the filing of the complaint. The difference between the amount of rent and charges paid for the period from the filing of the complaint to the date of the commission's determination and the amount that would have been payable for such period at the fair and reasonable rate fixed by the commission may be added to or subtracted from, as the case demands, future rent payments, or after the final decision of an appeal from the commission's determination may be sued for and recovered in an action in the municipal court of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 108. Unless within 10 days after the filing of the commission's determination any party to the complaint appeals therefrom to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, the determination of the commission shall be final and conclusive. If such an appeal is taken from the determination of the commission, the record before the commission or such part thereof as the court may order shall be certified by it to the court and shall constitute the record before the court, and the commission's determination shall not be modified or set aside by the court, except for error of law. If any party applies to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shows to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceeding before the commission, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the commission and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as the court may deem proper. The commission may modify its findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which shall be conclusive, and its recommendations, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original determination, with the return of such additional evidence. In the proceedings before such court on appeal from a determination of the commission, the commission shall appear by its counsel or other representative and submit oral or written arguments to support the findings and the determination of the commission.

"SEC. 109. The right of a tenant to the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel, or apartment, existing at the time this act takes effect, or thereafter acquired, under any lease or other contract for such use or occupancy or under any extension thereof by operation of law, shall, notwithstanding the expiration of the term fixed by such lease or contract, continue at the option of the tenant, subject, however, to any determination or regulation of the commission relevant thereto; and such tenant shall not be evicted or dispossessed so long as he pays the rent and performs the other terms and conditions of the tenancy as fixed by such lease or contract, or in case such lease or contract is modified by any determination or regulation of the commission, then as fixed by such modified lease or contract. All remedies of the owner at law or equity, based on any provision of any such lease or contract to the effect that such lease or contract shall be determined or forfeited if the premises are sold, are hereby suspended so long as this title is in force. Every purchaser shall take conveyance of any rental property, hotel, or apartment subject to the rights of tenants as provided in this title. The rights of the tenant under this title shall be subject to the limitation that the bona fide owner of any rental property, apartment, or hotel shall have the right to possession thereof for actual and bona fide occupancy by himself, or his wife, children, or dependents, upon giving 30 days' notice in writing, served in the manner provided by section 1223 of the act entitled 'An act to establish a code of laws for the District of Columbia,' approved May 3, 1901, as amended, which notice shall contain a full and correct statement of the facts and circumstances upon which the same is based; but in no case shall possession be demanded or obtained by such owner in contravention of the terms of any such lease or contract. If there is a dispute between the owner and the tenant as to the accuracy or sufficiency of the statement set forth in such notice, as to the good faith of such demand, or as to the service of notice, the matters in dispute shall be determined by the commission upon complaint as provided in section 106 of this title.

"SEC. 110. Pending the final decision on appeal from a determination of the commission, the commission's determination shall be in full force and effect and the appeal shall not operate as a supersedeas or in any manner stay or postpone the enforcement of the determination appealed from. Immediately upon the entry of a final decision on the appeal the commission shall, if necessary, modify its determination in order to make it conform to such decision. The difference, if any, between the amount of rent and charges paid for the period from the date of the filing by the commission of the determination appealed from and the amount that would have been payable for such period under the determination as modified in accordance with the final decision on appeal may be added to or allowed on account of, as the case demands, future rent payments or may be sued for and recovered in an action in the municipal court in the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 111. The determination of the commission in a proceeding begun by complaint or upon its own initiative fixing fair and reasonable rents, charges, service, and other terms and conditions of use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel, or apartment shall constitute the commission's determination of the fairness and reasonableness of such rents, charges, service, terms, or conditions for the rental property, hotel, or apartment affected, and shall remain in full force and effect notwithstanding any change in ownership or tenancy thereof, unless and until the commission modifies or sets aside such determination upon complaint either of the owner or of the tenant.

"SEC. 112. If the owner of any rental property, apartment, or hotel collects any rent or charge therefor in excess of the amount fixed in a determination of the commission made and in full force and effect in accordance with the provisions of this title, he shall be liable for and the commission is hereby authorized and directed to commence an action in the municipal court in the District of Columbia to recover double the amount of such excess, together with the costs of the proceeding, which shall include an attorney's fee of $50, to be taxed as part of the costs. Out of any sums received on account of such recovery the commission shall pay over to the tenant the amount of the excess so paid by him and the balance shall be paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia: Provided, That if the commission finds that such excess was paid by the tenant voluntarily and with knowledge of the commission's determination, the whole amount of such recovery shall be paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 113. If in any proceeding before the commission, begun by complaint or on the commission's own initiative, and involving any lease or other contract for the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel, or apartment the commission finds that at any time after the passage of this act but during the tenancy the owner has, directly or indirectly, willfully withdrawn from the tenant any service agreed or required by a determination of the commission to be furnished, or has by act, neglect, or omission contrary to such lease or contract or to the law or any ordinance or regulation made in pursuance of law, or of a determination of the commission, exposed the tenant, directly or indirectly, to any unsafe or insanitary condition or imposed upon him any burden, loss, or unusual inconvenience in connection with his use or occupancy of such rental property, hotel, or apartment, the commission shall determine the sum which in its judgment will fairly and reasonably compensate or reimburse the tenant therefor. In any such proceeding involving a lease or other contract, the term specified in which had not expired at the time the proceeding was begun, the commission shall likewise determine the amount or value of any bonus or other consideration in excess of the rental named in such lease or contract received at any time directly or indirectly by the owner in connection with such lease or contract. The tenant may recover any amount so determined by the commission in an action in the municipal court of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 114. Whenever under this title a tenant is entitled to bring suit to recover any sum due him under any determination of the commission, the commission shall, upon application by the tenant and without expense to him, commence and prosecute in the municipal court of the District of Columbia an action on behalf of the tenant for the recovery of the amount due, and in such case the court shall include in any judgment rendered in favor of the tenant the costs of the action, including a reasonable attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court. Such costs and attorney's fee, when recovered, shall be paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 115. The commission shall, by general order, from time to time prescribe the procedure to be followed in all proceedings under its jurisdiction. Such procedure shall be as simple and summary as may be practicable, and the commission and parties appearing before it shall not be bound by technical rules of evidence or of pleading.

"SEC. 116. Any person who with intent to avoid the provisions of this title enters into any agreement or arrangement for the payment of any bonus or other consideration in connection with any lease or other contract for the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel, or apartment, or who participates in any fictitious sale or other device or arrangement the purpose of which is to grant or obtain the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel, or apartment without subjecting such use or occupancy to the provisions of this title or to the jurisdiction of the commission, shall upon conviction be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or by both.

"SEC. 117. The commission shall prescribe standard forms of leases and other contracts for the use or occupancy of any rental property, hotel, or apartment and shall require their use by the owner thereof. Every such lease or contract entered into after the commission has prescribed and promulgated a form for the tenancy provided by such lease or contract shall be deemed to accord with such standard form; and any such lease or contract in any proceeding before the commission or in any court of the United States or of the District of Columbia shall be interpreted, applied, and enforced in the same manner as if it were in the form and contained the stipulations of such standard form. Upon the request of the commission the owner of an hotel or apartment shall file with the commission plans and other data in such detail as the commission requires, descriptive of the rooms, accommodations, and service in connection with such hotel or apartment, and a schedule of rates and charges therefor. The commission shall, after consideration of such plans, schedules, data, or other information, determine and fix a schedule of fair and reasonable rates and charges for such hotel or apartment; and the rates and charges stated in such schedule shall thereafter constitute the fair and reasonable rates and charges for such hotel or apartment. The commission's determination in such case shall be made after such notice and hearing and shall have the same force and effect and be subject to appeal in the same manner as a determination of the commission under section 106 of this title.

"SEC. 118. No tenant shall assign his lease of or sublet any rental property or apartment at a rate in excess of the rate paid by him under his lease without the consent of the commission upon application in a particular case, and in such case the commission shall determine a fair and reasonable rate of rent or charge for such assignment or sublease.

"SEC. 119. The public resolution entitled 'Joint resolution to prevent profiteering in the District of Columbia,' approved May 31, 1918, as amended, is hereby repealed, to take effect 60 days after the date of the confirmation by the Senate of the commissioners first nominated by the President under the provisions of this title; but a determination by the commission made within such period of 60 days shall be enforced in accordance with the provisions of this title, notwithstanding the provisions of such public resolution. All laws or parts of laws in conflict with any provision of this title are hereby suspended so long as this title is in force to the extent that they are in such conflict.

"SEC. 120. The sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated and made immediately available to carry out the provisions of this title, one-half thereof to be paid out of money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated and the other one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 121. If any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this title shall be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder thereof, but shall be confined in its operations to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

"SEC. 122. It is hereby declared that the provisions of this title are made necessary by emergencies growing out of the war with the Imperial German Government, resulting in rental conditions in the District of Columbia dangerous to the public health and burdensome to public officers and employees whose duties require them to reside within the District and other persons whose activities are essential to the maintenance and comfort of such officers and employees, and thereby embarrassing the Federal Government in the transaction of the public business. It is also declared that this title shall be considered temporary legislation, and that it shall terminate on the expiration of three years from the date of the passage of this act, unless sooner repealed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"To amend an act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' approved August 10, 1917, and to regulate rents in the District of Columbia."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8624) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' approved August 10, 1919," submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the amendments of the Senate, namely:

On amendment No. 1: To this amendment the House recedes with an amendment, which amendment changes "the first paragraph" to "section one," which involves only a matter of form or phraseology, and adds: "That this act may be cited as 'The food-control and the District of Columbia rents act,' Title I.—Food-control act amendments," the purpose of which is for convenience and separating the food-control act amendments from the District of Columbia rents.

The House recedes on amendments 2 to 10, inclusive. The changes resulting therefrom involve only matters of form and phraseology.

On amendment No. 2: This amendment strikes out "be, and the same."

On amendment No. 3: This amendment strikes out a comma.

On amendment No. 4: This amendment strikes out "so as."

On amendment No. 5: This amendment changes "the" to "such."

On amendment No. 6: This amendment strikes out "entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' approved," and adds "of."

On amendment No. 7: This amendment strikes out "be, and the same."

On amendment No. 8: This amendment strikes out a comma.

On amendment No. 9: This amendment strikes out "so as."

On amendment No. 10: This amendment changes "And provided" to "Provided further."

On amendment No. 11: This amendment is the Senate amendment pertaining to rents within the District of Columbia. The House recedes with an amendment which is a comprehensive substitute therefor.

Section 101: This section contains the definitions. The term "rental property" includes all buildings and the land appurtenant thereto within the District of Columbia. This term also varies the Senate amendment by covering vacant lands rented and all service furnished in connection with any rental property. Such service thus becomes an element in determining the fair value of rental property for the purpose of fixing the rent therefor. The terms "hotel" and "apartment" are similarly defined. The conference amendment further varies the Senate amendment by covering business property and by providing a definition of "service." The Senate amendment definitions of "true value," "controversy," and "jurisdiction" are omitted as unnecessary.

Section 102: This section creates a commission of three members not engaged in or connected with the real estate business in the District of Columbia. The members are to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for terms of three years. The Senate amendment qualifications of two years' residence within the District is omitted.

Section 103: This section provides an annual salary of $5,000, payable monthly, for each commissioner. Provision is further made for certain specified expenditures by the commission and the audit thereof. The Senate amendment provided an annual salary of $6,000 for each commissioner.

Section 104: This section provides that the assessor ex officio becomes an advisory assistant to the commission. The assessor receives an additional salary of $1,000 per annum for such additional duties instead of $2,000 as provided in the Senate amendment. The section further varies the Senate amendment by providing that every officer or employee of the United States or the District of Columbia shall, upon request from the commission, supply it with any data or information which is contained in the records of his office and which pertains to the administration of the title.

Section 105: This section provides that duly authorized officers and employees of the commission shall at all reasonable times have access to any books, records, or papers relating to any matter before the commission. The commission is given the power to issue subpœna for the production of such books, records, and papers, and for requesting the attendance of witnesses. The district courts of the United States are to enforce such subpœnas. The section varies the Senate amendment by providing that no officer or employee of the commission shall, unless authorized by it or by a court, make public any information obtained by the commission.

Section 106: This section declares that rental property and hotels and apartments are affected with the public interest, and that all rents and charges therefor, and all services in connection therewith, shall be fair and reasonable. The provisions of the section vary the Senate amendment, which provides for the determination of the commission of fair and reasonable rents, charges, services, and other terms and conditions of a lease or contract upon complaint of the tenant or owner, by permitting the commission to make such determinations upon its own initiative, and by allowing the owner to complain when the tenant is in possession under a lease or contract which has been extended by operation of law or which has been modified by the commission. Such determinations shall be made upon notice and hearing to all parties interested. The provisions of the Senate amendment are further varied by a provision that any determination of the commission must be observed by all Federal courts and courts of the District of Columbia in any collateral action.

Section 107: This section provides that determinations of the commission fixing a fair and reasonable rent or charge upon complaint shall be effective from the date of such complaint. The tenant may collect any difference by deductions from future rent, or by suit in the municipal court of the District of Columbia. This section in a measure is a substitute for a provision in the Senate amendment to the effect that the tenant could recover damages for any unreasonable rent collected under a lease or contract made subsequent to September 15, 1919, even though such collections were made previous to any determination by the commission that the rent or charge collected was unfair or unreasonable.

Section 108: This section provides that appeals from the commission's decisions are permitted to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia for error in law. The commission shall provide counsel in any such appeal to defend its determination.

Section 109: This section continues the Saulsbury resolution, save that the tenant holds possession, not under the terms of the expired lease or contract only, but under such terms subject to modification upon complaint by the owner to the commission under section 106. This section varies the Senate amendment, which permits the owner to recover his property when required for the bona fide occupancy of himself, or his wife, or dependents, by providing that any dispute as to the good faith of any such requirement shall be determined by the commission.

Section 110: This section provides that the commission's determination shall remain in force, despite the taking of an appeal, until such appeal is decided. These provisions were not present in the Senate amendment.

Section 111: This section provides that any determination of the commission shall apply to the rental property, apartment, or hotel involved, despite any change in tenancy or ownership thereof, until the commission modifies such determination in a future proceeding. These provisions were not present in the Senate amendment.

Section 112: This section penalizes the collection of rent in excess of that fixed by determination of the commission, by permitting the commission to sue the owner in the municipal court of the District of Columbia for double the amount so collected, together with costs and a $50 attorney's fee. The tenant shall receive that part of the excess which he paid the owner involuntarily. These provisions were not present in the Senate amendment except insofar as the Senate amendment provided a criminal penalty for a violation of an order of the commission.

Section 113: This section provides that the commission may assess any loss suffered by a tenant due to a willful withdrawal of service by the owner or the exposing of the tenant to any unsafe or insanitary condition, or the imposing upon the tenant of any additional burden or unusual inconvenience, or the collection from the tenant of any bonus in connection with any existing lease. The tenant may recover such amount by suit in the municipal court of the District of Columbia. These provisions were not present in the Senate amendment.

Section 114: The commission upon application of the tenant shall recover for such tenant any sum due him as the result of any determination by the commission. These provisions were not present in the Senate amendment.

Section 115: This section provides that the procedure of the commission shall be simple and summary and shall not follow technical rules of evidence or pleading.

Section 116: This section provides a criminal penalty of $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, for any person who enters into any agreement or arrangement for the payment of any bonus in connection with any lease or other contract or who participates in any fictitious sale or other arrangement to avoid the provisions of the title. These provisions were not present in the Senate amendment.

Section 117: This section gives the commission the power to provide for and require the use of standard forms of lease. The section further requires that hotels and apartments file with the commission plans and schedules of rates and charges. The commission may make collective determinations of the reasonableness and fairness of the rates and charges of all rooms or apartments in any hotel or apartment in a proceeding similar to that under section 106. These provisions were not present in the Senate amendment.

Section 118: This section prohibits subletting at an advanced rent or charge without the consent of the commission. This varies the Senate amendment, which prohibited all subletting without consent of the owner or of the commission.

Section 119: This section repeals the Saulsbury resolution 60 days after the confirmation by the Senate of the commissioners first nominated by the President. All portions of the landlord and tenant law directly in conflict with the title are suspended so long as the title is in force. The Senate amendment provided for the repeal of the Saulsbury resolution 30 days after the act took effect.

Section 120: This section provides an appropriation of $50,000.

Section 121: This section provides the usual provision as to the effect of holding unconstitutional a portion of an act.

Section 122: This section declares the war power is one basis of Congress's authority for enacting the title and that the title is temporary legislation. The section further bases the title upon the power of Congress to prevent any embarrassment to the Federal Government in the transaction of public business resulting from rental conditions dangerous to the health of and burdensome to Federal officers and employees and persons whose activities are essential to the maintenance and comfort of such officers and employees.

On amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill: To this amendment the House recedes with an amendment, which adds "and to regulate rents in the District of Columbia."

G. N. HAUGEN,
J. C. MCLAUGHLIN,
THOS. L. RUBEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, in considering the Senate amendment, which deals with rents in the District of Columbia, it was found necessary to redraft the amendment, and in order to make it workable and accomplish what was sought to be accomplished in the amendment it was necessary to exceed the authority of the conferees. I wish to state at the outset that the amendment suggested to the House is, in my opinion, subject to the point of order. The point of order has been reserved, so that the question may be given consideration and, possibly, suggestions made which may aid the conferees in case the point of order is insisted upon.

The amendment as it came to the committee created a commission of three, for a term of two years, with a salary of $6,000 a year, the assessor of the District being made an ex officio member, and his salary being increased $2,000. The amendment suggested by the conferees creates a commission of three at a salary of $5,000 a year, and the term of office being three years, the salary of the assessor being increased $1,000, the continuance of the act being three years instead of four, as provided by the Senate.

Section 101: This section contains the definition. The term "rental property" includes all buildings and the land appurtenant thereto within the District of Columbia. This term also varies the Senate amendment by covering vacant lands rented and all service furnished in connection with any rental property. Such service thus becomes an element in determining the fair value of rental property for the purpose of fixing the rent therefor. The terms "hotel" and "apartment" are similarly defined. The conference amendment further varies the Senate amendment by covering business property and by providing a definition of "service." The Senate amendment definitions of "true value," "controversy," and "jurisdiction" are omitted.

Section 105: This section gives the commission access to books, papers, and so forth, necessary for any proceeding before it, and a power to subpœna papers and witnesses. No change except that the order to enforce any such subpœna should be obtained upon application to the Supreme Court of the District, instead of the court of appeals, and that no officer or employee without the authorization of the court or of the commission may make public any information obtained.

Section 106: This section declares that rents, charges, services, and terms and conditions of a lease or of a contract shall be fair and reasonable and that the commission may make such determination upon complaint or upon its own initiative. This complaint may be made by the tenant in any case and by the owner in the case of a lease extended by the Saulsbury resolution or by the provisions of this act or in the case of an existing lease modified by the commission. It also declares that all hearings shall be public. It varies in this respect, that it affords the owner an opportunity to complain and have determined for him a fair and reasonable rent in the above cases and that the hearings shall be public.

Section 106: This provides that any determination of the commission shall be observed in any proceeding, such as an eviction proceeding, before any court.

Section 107: This provides that the determination of the commission shall be effective from the date of complaint. The tenant may collect or deduct from rent the difference. This varies the Senate amendment, which provided that determination of the commission in respect to any lease made after September 15 should date back to the beginning, so that the lease makes it retroactive.

Section 108: This section provides that appeals from the commission should be made to the court of appeals. The commission must provide counsel in any such appeal to defend its determination. The court of appeals passes only upon errors in law. (Same as in the Senate amendment.)

Section 109: This section prevents discriminations and eviction of tenants by giving the tenant right to possession over the old terms, but subject to modification by the commission upon complaint of the owner. The Saulsbury resolution continues possession by giving the owner no opportunity to readjust the terms of his lease.

Section 110 (new): The commission's determination shall remain in force despite the taking of an appeal until such appeal is determined upon by the court.

Section 111 (new): The determination of the commission continues to apply to any property despite any change in the tenant or owner until such determination is modified in a future proceeding by the commission or the court.

Section 112 (new): Penalizes collections of rents in excess of the rate fixed by the commission by permitting it to sue in the municipal court for double the amount of such excess collection, together with costs and $50 attorney fee.

Section 113: This section provides that the commission may assess any loss suffered by a tenant due to a willful withdrawal of service by the owner or the exposing of the tenant to any unsafe or insanitary condition or the imposing upon the tenant of any additional burden or unusual inconvenience or the collection from the tenant of any bonus in connection with any existing lease. The tenant may recover such amount by suit in the municipal court of the District of Columbia. These provisions were not present in the Senate amendment.

Section 114 (new): The commission, upon application of any tenant, may sue on his behalf to recover any amount due him as the result of any determination of the commission.

Section 115: Procedure shall be simple and summary. Criminal penalty for violation of an order is stricken out.

Section 116: Provides for a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, and a penalty for bonus, fictitious sale, or other arrangements to get around the provisions of this act.

Section 117 (new): Provides for a standardization of leases, and provides that upon the request of the commission, hotels and apartments must file plans and schedules of rates, and the commission shall determine a fair and reasonable rate or charge for such hotel or apartment.

Section 118: This varies the Senate amendment, which prohibited all subletting without the consent of the owner or the commission.

Section 119: Repeals the Saulsbury resolution 60 days after confirmation by the Senate. The Senate amendment was 30 days after the passage of the act.

Section 120: Appropriates $50,000. Same.

Section 121: Continues the usual provision as to the effect of holding unconstitutional a portion of the act.

Section 122: Declares temporary legislation three years. Basis is war power, and power to prevent embarrassment of Federal Government due to conditions dangerous or burdensome to its employees, or to persons whose activities are essential to the comfort and maintenance of such employees.

Three bases of constitutionality: (1) War power; (2) property affected by a public interest because of the extraordinary conditions and so can regulate rates; (3) power of the Government to operate, and thus not have profiteers embarrass it by making it difficult for the Government employees to live at the Capital, which is the seat of such operations.

I have referred briefly to the bill and will yield to others who may care to discuss the amendments. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to say at the outset that I have only words of commendation to the committee for what they have done, but it strikes me that they have omitted to do the biggest thing that is troubling us in the District of Columbia on the rent proposition. I believe the most pernicious individual who exists to-day is that individual who corrals the commodities of life, whether it be the house in which you live or the food that sustains life, who corrals that article and charges an exorbitant price for the same. [Applause.] In this particular case I refer to the sublessor. I have had some experience in going about this city in trying to find a home in which to keep my little family. I visited no less than 50 or 60 apartments. The prices that they ask for a little four or five room apartment is twice as much as it is in New York City or Chicago, and on investigation and in going to the bottom of the thing I have discovered in every single instance it is not the individual who has his dollars invested in the property with whom you deal, but almost always some irresponsible agent who has leased the property prior to this time and now he is holding it out for subleasing. I should like to pass this bill with an amendment so as to kill the sublessor of this city instanter. [Applause.] As this bill is drawn the sublessor has tenure of life for three more years. As this bill is drawn the owner of the property surrenders his control as to who shall occupy it; and I do not believe this Congress has gone so far astray or has become so blinded to the sacredness of property rights that it is willing to surrender a man's control of his property to an irresponsible sublessor for a period of three years. I can cite you instances in this town where I tried to find a home for myself where the owners of the property have had arbitrarily taken over from them the control of their property, and have had arbitrarily forced upon them a contract of lease to an irresponsible sublessor for 30 apartments in this apartment house, and this sublessor is paying $65 a month and has furnished those apartments with a lot of cheap furniture, and I will guarantee to furnish every single apartment she has in there at $500 per apartment, and I will make money, and this woman is subleasing those apartments for $175 a month and is having them filled by transient trade when she can not fill it with permanent renters. I am in sympathy with the commission to regulate the price of rents, and I know that the proponents of the bill will come in and say to us, well, this commission and this bill prevents subleasing for any more than the amount paid by the lessor unless you get specific permission of the commission. Now, I grant that is true in this bill, but I ask you men, most of whom are attorneys, how long will it take the legitimate owners of this property of which I am speaking—and it is only a specimen of a condition—how long do you think it will take them to get control of their own property away from this sublessor if they have to go through the hands of the commission and then it is carried on appeal to the courts of the District of Columbia?

Why, they will be in control of that property for a longer time than this law is written for—three years. Whereas, if we have the opportunity of writing an amendment into this bill—and I will read the amendment I would like to have written in, not destroying in one single iota the purposes of this bill. In section 118, where it refers to the sublessor, I should like to have written in the words "without the consent of the owner," and write, after the word "apartment," "no tenant shall assign as lessor or sublet any rental property or apartment without the consent of the owner." It then should read, "shall not be in excess of the rate paid by him under his lease without the consent of the commission." In other words, it would leave the control absolutely in the hands of the commission the same as it already stands. It does it differently in that it gives the owner of apartment houses the control as to who shall live in them. It does not give the owner of the apartment the right and the authority to dispossess the occupants to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I yield gladly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman's amendment were adopted, would it not prevent the one who operates a boarding house to sublet a room in the boarding house without having written consent of the landlord or owner of the property?

Mr. BEGG. I will reply to the gentleman and say this, that no man occupies or rents a legitimate boarding house that is leased to-day unless his lease gives him that permission. If I rent a property for a family residence, and the man converts it into a boarding house, I maintain that the sacredness of property rights ought to permit me to dispossess him at the end of the contract period I have rented it for.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the position taken by the gentleman were enacted into law, would it not make it impossible for housing the number of people in private residences that are now being housed in them? Would it not put many people into the streets?

Mr. BEGG. I think not. I can see nothing in that that would do anything other than the one thing I would like to see. I would like to see the death blow wielded to the subleaser when this law is passed. That is the only person I am after.

Mr. MACCRATE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MACCRATE. I would like to suggest at this point that the provision you refer to has been the cause of the worst cases of profiteering in New York, where the lessor has refused to let his tenant sublet to some one else. That is the best way for the profiteering landlord to become a dictator.

Mr. BEGG. In reply to the gentleman from New York, I can say this, that I can not see, with this commission we have established, how the landlord can refuse to sublet property that is an apartment property, or how it can possibly work any hardship or be the cause of exorbitant profiteering, for the simple reason that you are maintaining your commission here to fix rents. I am not for destroying the commission. I want the commission to fix rents. That is not the proposition at all. All I want to do is to get the profiteer, who, in most cases, is the subleaser.

Let me show you what happens when a subleaser has control of a number of apartments against the owner's will, if you please. The contract being forced upon the owner of the property is not a contract, according to the definition given to us in all the books of law, to the effect that a contract means the mutual agreement of two minds getting together on a proposition for a specified time. That is not the condition in this city to-day with these subletters under the law as it is written, because the owners of the buildings do not want to sublet; they do not want to dispossess the bona fide people that are in there, if they are the right kind of people. But I maintain, and I believe you will agree with me, that if you are leasing your house we are going far enough when we say you shall have the price fixed, but I believe we are going too far when we say to the property owner, "You shall have no right to discriminate as to the kind of people that live in your building."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, may I have a couple of minutes more?

Mr. HAUGEN. I would be very glad to grant it, but there is such a demand for time——

Mr. BEGG. I would like to have two minutes more.

Mr. HAUGEN. Go ahead.

Mr. BEGG. Here is what happens: The subleasers are not caring at all about the damage to the property. All they are after is the rent. In order to keep every one of those apartments full all the time, they will rent to anybody who comes along. Now, if you have rented property at home, you know that some tenants will turn that property back to you in as good repair as it was in when given to them, while other tenants will take that property and the damage they will do to it will offset all the income that you have received from it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. BEGG. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Are these sublessors holding over under the Saulsbury law?

Mr. BEGG. They are. I am not after the occupants of the house; I want that understood. But I am after cases where the owners of the property have had the control taken away from them by the sublessor, and who is in control of a number of new houses in this town, and is filling them with all kinds of riffraff just so they pay the rent. The moral tone of some of these apartments has been lowered, and the caliber of the house has been degraded, and all because the owners have no redress or recourse. If they take it up with the occupants, they say, "We are not renting from you. What are you going to do about it?" I say that it is a pernicious proposition to take the control of the property away. You are not dispossessing the rightful occupant, but the man who has got his dollars invested and who ought to have something to say if property rights mean anything in this country any more.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] is right in saying that much of the evil that exists in the city of Washington to-day grows out of subleasing and the matter of subletting property in its many phases, and it was thought best by the committee, and I am sure the Members of this House will agree with the committee, if they will give full consideration to the matter, that the only wise thing to do is to put it in the hands of a commission to control to the extent that it ought to be controlled; certainly to give the commission jurisdiction over it.

Now, many of the things that the gentleman from Ohio spoke about and of which he complains will not be reached by his amendment, but they can be cured, if they exist, by the commission, under the authority given it in this bill.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Pardon me. I can not yield. I have only five minutes.

The gentleman contends that the landlord, the owner, shall be permitted to determine who shall live in his premises. That is entirely true in the first instance. If more than one applicant appears for his property, he can choose between them. But after that, when one is located in the property, there ought to be and there must be under conditions existing here, some limit to the authority of the landlord to choose whom he shall rent his property to.

If a more desirable person personally should come along and wish to possess the property that a tenant now has, if the gentleman's amendment were adopted it would enable the landlord to choose between the one now in and a new one more agreeable to the landlord; so the gentleman is wrong in saying that the landlord should be permitted to determine who shall occupy his property, except in the first instance, when he undoubtedly should have that right, and he has it under this bill, and every lease can contain a clause to that effect. But when he rents property the commission has the right to determine and have authority to determine whether or not the tenant complying in every respect with the terms of the lease shall be permitted to remain. Any other law would make this proceeding practically ineffective.

One complaint that the gentleman from Ohio makes, not so much in what he says here, but if I may be permitted, if it is courteous for me to do it, in what he has told me in private, is that the landlord shall be permitted to determine who shall occupy his property. An instance he gave, where five girls are occupying a five-room apartment, each girl occupying one room. The gentleman contends that there are a number of single rooms throughout the city and that these girls should be driven from the apartment where they are together, and each must occupy a single or a separate room wherever it may be found, and that that apartment, suitable for occupation by a family, should be vacated by those five girls, and that occupation of it should be permitted to the one who goes in with a family.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I can not yield now. My time is just expiring. I think that that would bring about troubles and evils, the nature of which and the seriousness of which will occur to everyone who thinks of it. I know of nothing better that can be done for the welfare of those girls than that they shall be permited to get together in an apartment, to be company for and a protection for one another, and if the landlord shall be permitted to determine who shall be his tenant, except in the first instance, all the evils existing now would be continued, and many safeguards would be removed. This matter should be put in control of the commission.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be notified when I have consumed five minutes.

Mr. Speaker, the conference committee which has had charge of this report has worked very diligently and very carefully. We have tried our best to bring a bill into this House which will take care of the rent situation in the District of Columbia and protect the tenants in the District of Columbia and at the same time be as fair as possible to the property owners in the District of Columbia.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] is absolutely mistaken when he says that we have not made adequate provision to take care of the subrenting proposition.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUBEY. I can not yield. I have only five minutes.

Mr. BEGG. It seems to me the gentleman might yield to a question.

Mr. RUBEY. I decline to yield. I say that we have taken care of the subrenting proposition. He says that this is a good bill, but that we have not taken care of that one thing. He would like for us to put back with the owners of the property the right to subrent. That is where it is now. That is where they have it now. And they have the right when they make the lease to give authority to subrent. We say that the subrenting is the greatest evil in Washington to-day. We want to get rid of it, and we say here that there shall not be any subrenting at a rate higher than that paid by the tenant himself in the first place, without the authority and the permission of the commission. We are not going to say that the owner shall say what that shall be, because there are instances, I have no doubt now, wherein the owners or agents of apartment houses have seen to the leasing of those apartment houses and the lessors are subrenting those apartments and dividing up with the landlord. We do not want that sort of thing, and we do not want anything in this bill that will take away from the commission the right absolutely to settle the question of the subletting of property.

Mr. BEGG. How long will it take you to get rid of your subleasing under your bill?

Mr. RUBEY. It would take no longer under the provision we have written here than under your provision, simply by amending it by inserting a provision that the owner shall have the right instead of the commission.

Mr. BEGG. If you put mine in, you will get rid of them the day that the law passes.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman is absolutely mistaken. But, if the gentleman is right, you will get rid of them under this provision the very next day. We are trying to protect the people who are here working for the Government. There are over 100,000 employees in the District of Columbia to-day, and they are here, and they are absolutely necessary to the conduct of the Government.

I had a letter the other day from a young man in my district who says, "I have been offered a position at $1,340 a year in The Adjutant General's office. I want to know from you whether or not I can live in the District of Columbia on $1,340 a year, and bring my wife along with me." I was compelled to write to him and tell him that he could do it only with the most rigid economy, and I doubt if it will be possible for him to come here and live in the District of Columbia on that compensation and take care of himself and his wife.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman answer an inquiry right here?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. [Mr. TOWNER]. The gentleman has consumed five minutes.

Mr. RUBEY. I have not time. I would like to yield, but I must yield to other gentlemen on this side who desire to be heard. I must decline to yield to the gentleman at present. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], who has probably given this subject more attention than anybody else in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am thoroughly in accord with the thought which is embodied in the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], but I am against the amendment for the reason that the bill already makes provision for the emergency which his amendment covers.

In the first place, the property can not be sublet without the consent of the owner. That is always taken care of in the lease. If the tenant sublets under the provisions of this bill without the consent of the owner, or without following the directions of the commission, he does not come under the protection of this measure.

I refer to section 109, and because I have such a short time I will read only a part of it:

> And such tenant shall not be evicted or dispossessed so long as he pays the rent and performs the other terms and conditions of the tenancy as fixed by such lease or contract, or in case such lease or contract is modified by any determination or regulation of the commission, then as fixed by such modified lease or contract.

That clearly shows that if the tenant violates his contract with the landlord to sublet he can then be evicted. There may be cases where the landlord will not agree that his tenant may sublet, where it may be absolutely necessary for the housing of Government employees that his house be made subject to subletting. Therefore I think the committee has acted most wisely, indeed.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Just a question.

Mr. STEAGALL. Does the bill absolutely save the point with reference to the subleasing of property so as to make it certain that no property will be idle, where nobody can use it? In other words, I have observed cases where the tenant sought to sublet property, and the landlord would not allow it. That is the case in Washington to-day. There are a number of houses that have been idle all this year, where the tenants could not use and were not allowed by the owner to sublet the property.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Under this bill, in a case of that kind, the commission can compel the subleasing of the house.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman allow me to submit a brief question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; but I hope the gentleman will make it as brief as possible, as my time is limited.

Mr. SMALL. I wish to know if the bill meets a condition of this kind: Where one is searching for an apartment and the owner has a vacant apartment, but they can not agree upon terms. Can a case of that kind be submitted to the commission?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The question not only can be submitted to the commission, but the commission can take it up of its own motion and fix the rent.

Mr. SMALL. And having fixed the rent, the landlord must rent it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And having fixed the rent, both the landlord and the tenant are bound by the ruling of the commission.

Mr. SMALL. By entering into an agreement?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; or, rather, by complying with the terms fixed by the commission.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; but do not make it any longer than you can help.

Mr. BEGG. It is a question and not an argument. I am serious about this. How soon can a bona fide owner of property get rid of a sublessor under this law? All I am asking is for some kind of an arrangement whereby it can be done at once. I will grant that eventually they can do it through this bill, but the commission will not be appointed for two months, and then they have to be confirmed by the Senate, which may take six months. Then, after the commission has made a decision it may have to go through all the courts in the District. Would it not take three years, the full life of the bill, to relieve a bona fide owner?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not think so. If the tenant violates any provision of the law or regulations of the commission he does not come under the protection of the bill.

As I was about to say, I do not agree to the proposition that this is subject to a point of order. If the point of order is made I am going to challenge anybody to show wherein the bill does not treat of the original subject matter of the Senate amendment in every respect.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield just for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will defer until we get further along with the discussion.

Mr. CRISP. I want to say to my friend that it is impossible now to make a point of order, because that must be made before you start on the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. BEGG. No; I reserved a point of order, and the gentleman gave me permission.

Mr. STEAGALL. In answer to the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I fear I am not going to get a chance to argue the proposition.

Mr. STEAGALL. Just an answer to the inquiry he made.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will get his own time to answer that.

Mr. STEAGALL. I call your attention to the fact that an appeal does not operate as a supersedeas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is quite correct.

I wish to say that if I had prepared this bill I would not have written it in this way. Already the threat has been made by the spokesman of the real estaters in the District of Columbia that they are going to enjoin the commission herein provided for. The bill which I prepared and which at the last session passed the House undertook to obviate that very thing by meeting all this trouble with an income-tax provision. The collection of a tax can not be enjoined. For that reason I preferred the income-tax provision rather than the commission; but now we are not going to have any bill unless we get this one, and it is as good a bill as can be written with a commission in it. Everything will depend upon the commission. It will be as good or as bad as the commission. Therefore we can only hope that we will get a commission—and I have no doubt we will now get one—that will do its duty. If this should be amended in any respect, it must go back to the other body. It has run the gauntlet of the other body and has narrowly escaped mutilation, and we should not open the doors once more to have this bill amended in any respect which will harm it. I believe that there is a disposition, somewhere at least in the District of Columbia, to hurt this bill if it is ever opened up to amendment. Therefore I hope this body will take this conference report just as it is written, in order to prevent its being interfered with somewhere else and interfered with not for the good of the Government and its employees.

It has been said that the bill is not constitutional. I believe it is, and I believe that the courts are going to so hold, because it is based upon the emergency of providing for the carrying on of governmental functions. The bill says that it is made necessary for the reason that the employees of the Government must be housed and fed; and it goes further than that and protects those who house and feed them.

Further answering the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], the bill relates to hotels. Take the Willard Hotel, for instance, or any of the big hotels in Washington. They are not operated by the owners. The owners lease them to those who operate them. Therefore if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] were inserted, necessitating the consent of the owner before any sublease is made, we would be in constant trouble, because those who are running the hotels are themselves tenants, and they become subleasers when they let a room or any other part of the hotel or of an apartment which is not operated by the owner thereof.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman permit a brief question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Does the gentleman think a hotel is operated in America under a lease which does not provide for leasing the rooms to guests?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the lease does not provide for it, common sense does.

Mr. BEGG. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have not seen a lease in the District of Columbia that did not contain a provision that the tenant should not sublet it without the consent of the owner. There is no necessity for the amendment; and, as I have said, its adoption would do more harm than good.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The commissioners are selected from the District of Columbia?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; they are to be selected from anywhere in the United States.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Thank God.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Some gentleman has suggested, I have forgotten who, that it is quite important to know that the operators of the big apartment houses in the District of Columbia to-day have sublet a great number of apartments in one building to one person, knowing that that person was going to sublet them. In one big apartment house, I am reliably informed that one woman has rented twenty-odd vacant apartments and has furnished them. The owner of that apartment knows that the woman does not want them all for her own use. The landlord must know, because he is an observant business man, that these apartments are being let for profiteering purposes.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. A case of collusion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is a case of collusion. I have been told that the girl that stands at the cashier's desk in one of these apartment houses has more than a dozen apartments rented in that house. The sublessor collects the value of the furniture from the tenant, who pays for it over and over again every year, but never gets title to it.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. If my amendment is incorporated, which I understand it can not be, would not that be pinning the responsibility right on the owner of the property instead of permitting an opportunity of this kind, and you still have the commission to say whether he should charge $65 or $165? In this way they can duck and get telephone girls to act as agents, but they could not under my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Under the provisions of this bill they can not duck.

Mr. BEGG. Absolutely they can. Read section 118 and you can sublet as often as you want.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It can not be done without the consent of the owner or the consent of the commission.

As I said, I would not have written the bill as it is, but I have seen the failure to get any law on the subject, for more than two years, while thirty-odd thousand clerks have been driven out because they could not get reasonable accommodations. I think we had now better take what we can get, and this is the best we can get. [Applause.]

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I am not concerned in the ad hominem arguments that have been made to-day. But I believe this bill to be thoroughly unconstitutional in every way, and therefore I would not support it under any circumstances. It is an invasion of the rights of property that the Constitution does not authorize. To say that Government employees must be housed does not carry with it the right to say to the citizen that he shall furnish the housing at such figures as a commission may fix. You may take private property for public uses and public purposes, but I deny the right under the Constitution of this Congress to take private property of a citizen and turn it over at figures fixed by a commission in the interest of another citizen.

When you have said that the man who owns a piece of property has no longer the right to control it, no longer the right to say who shall occupy it, no longer the right to say what the price shall be, it is such an invasion of the private rights and interests of a citizen as comes directly in conflict with the provision of the Constitution that guarantees the protection of property in this country.

It is a beginning of that system of legislation, the fixing of rates and prices about everything that you will find the most dangerous and pernicious that has ever been undertaken. There should be general laws controlling all things, but when the Congress goes down to the private citizen and says you shall handle your property this way, that you shall fix this price and no other, Congress has assumed an undertaking that it can not very well carry out.

I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the best interests of this country require that life, liberty, and property under the Constitution shall be protected by the Congress, and you shall not pass any of these Bolshevik laws affecting the property rights of the people of this country. If I own a house, have I not the right to say who shall go into it; if I want to rent it, shall I not have the right to say what the price shall be; if I want to leave it vacant, have I not the right? What right have you under the Constitution to destroy the rights of property which the law gives the citizen? It is an infamous suggestion. [Applause.]

In the three minutes I have I can not discuss this bill nor the constitutional limitations on the powers of Congress in time of war or peace on the questions involved. The mere statement that no power can be found in the Constitution to force the citizens of the District of Columbia to make unwilling contracts as to the use of their property ought to be sufficient for all just men to oppose this measure. Congress can not impair, by express terms of the Constitution, the obligations of contracts in the State, and under the spirit of the Constitution it can not make contracts for the private citizen to accommodate another private citizen in the District of Columbia, however desirable it might be to reduce rents. If it can be done as to rents, it can be done as to all things; and you become the masters and not the servants of the people, and you rule the District as only masters can rule slaves.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that I do not agree that the conference report, as far as it relates to the rent amendment, is subject to a point of order. It seems to me that it is clearly within the rules of the House giving the conferees jurisdiction under a long line of decisions. The Senate passed the rent amendment to this bill, which had never been considered in the House of Representatives, and the whole subject matter was before the conferees. They had the right absolutely to change the provisions as passed by the Senate, as long as they kept on the subject matter, which was the question of rents in the District of Columbia.

It takes no particular argument to convince the average Member of the House that the rent situation here in the District of Columbia should be remedied, if it is possible to do so. It is common knowledge that during the last two years rents have been raised generally over the District and in a great many cases to an unconscionable extent. The only question is how or what is the remedy to be applied. It seems to me that the conferees on this bill have done remarkably well. After a good deal of consideration on the subject I reached the conclusion that the best that could be done would be to appoint a commission after the manner of this bill, and leave it with the commission to fix the rent within the District of Columbia either upon its own initiative or upon complaint being made to the commission. The principal point after fixing upon that policy, it seems to me, is to make sure that the commission has the power to do what we want it to do—that is, to fix the rent—and for the most part I believe this amendment as reported by the conferees gives the commission that power.

The President is not limited in any way in his choice of members to go on this commission, except that they shall not be owners of rental property within the District of Columbia. Otherwise there is no limitation upon the President in making his selection. I feel like congratulating the conferees upon the result of their work. I believe that they worked faithfully and hard, with a bona fide desire to present something here to the House that would do the business.

It seems to me that the arguments of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] have been sufficiently answered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY]. Nobody can sublease his apartment for a greater amount than he is paying the owner without the consent of the commission. There is not going to be very much abuse of the subletting phase of the rent situation in the District with that provision. There are a great many people here, Army men and others, who rent property, who probably ought to be allowed to sublease if they are assigned to some other jurisdiction.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me two minutes more?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. They ought not to be allowed to profiteer with their lease, however. On the other hand, they ought not to be made to suffer. This gives them the right to sublet in case they go away for the amount they are paying the owner, and if they have furnished the apartment, then they can get a reasonable increase by going to the commission for that purpose.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] raises the constitutional question in respect to this legislation. I do not suppose that there is any of us here who is absolutely certain about the effects of legislation of this kind or of its constitutionality, but here is the situation: It might be possible for the property owners within the District of Columbia to so raise their rent that it would be impossible for the Government to get employees to come to the District to perform the Government business. Would anyone say if such a situation should arise that the Congress would not have the power to fix reasonable rents within the District, inasmuch as Congress has absolute jurisdiction within the District on legislative matters? I want to say that if this bill is enjoined and is found to be unconstitutional, as far as I am concerned, I shall be glad to cooperate with the membership of the House to see to it that a bill is passed that is constitutional.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman think that the bill passed at the last session by the House with the income-tax provision is certainly constitutional?

Mr. MAPES. I think it meets the constitutional requirements, but I have not thought that it was desirable legislation, but I think it is constitutional.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I believe a point of order is pending. May we have that disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Iowa to say at the beginning of his remarks that he conceded this to be subject to the point of order. The Chair is not aware what the point of order is.

Mr. HAUGEN. It was subject to the point of order because we had added matter.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, the point of order has got to be made first.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Ohio state his point of order?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the conferees have gone outside of their jurisdiction and have included new matter, in that they have taken in rents of lands and services.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman specify in what particular?

Mr. BEGG. I will take first section 118. They have absolutely taken away all control of the individual over his property, and they so admit in their statement, in which they say:

> This section prohibits subletting at an advanced rate of charge without the consent of the commission. This varies the Senate amendment, which prohibited all subletting without the consent of the owner or of the commission.

They have absolutely taken away all the rights of the owner in this bill that they are submitting, and it is not the result of a compromise or a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the Senate amendment was a general bill relative to leasing of property, and that the House struck out all of the Senate amendment, disagreed to it, and that the conferees have substituted a new amendment. Of course, this new amendment must necessarily differ from the Senate amendment, and the Chair is stating this so that the gentleman may direct his argument to it. It seems to the Chair that the House conferees would have the right, so long as they dealt with the general subject, to put in propositions that were not in the Senate amendment. That is the Chair's general view. The Chair would be glad to hear any suggestions along that line.

Mr. BEGG. May I ask the Chair a question for my own information?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BEGG. Do the House conferees have authority to rewrite a new bill and bring it back here, a bill that has never been subject to discussion or amendment in the House?

The SPEAKER. There is opportunity now for discussion.

Mr. BEGG. If there is opportunity for amendment, I shall withdraw my point of order.

The SPEAKER. There is opportunity for amendment by voting down the conference report.

Mr. ANDERSON. The House deliberately voted away its right to consider this bill——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. BEGG. Not for the present. If I withdraw this point of order, is it in order to make a motion to recommit the bill to the conferees with instructions to bring in this amendment that I should like to have incorporated? I am perfectly willing to abide by the majority and be voted down. That matters nothing to me; but if that is not in order, and I have no opportunity, then I shall insist upon the point of order and abide by the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair at first blush does not think the gentleman has that right.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. The Chair is correct. Under the rulings of the House you can move to recommit a conference report provided the other House has not acted. If the other House has acted, then the conferees are discharged. The other House has acted.

The SPEAKER. Exactly.

Mr. BEGG. Then the only recourse will be for me to insist on the point of order. Is that correct?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not called upon to say as to that.

Mr. BEGG. It is the only parliamentary way I have. Well, the Chair asks for a specific reference. In section 160 is incorporated other services which were not included in the same bill in connection with public hotels and apartment houses, and in the same section it says that, "Unfair provision of a lease or other contract for the use or occupancy of such rental property, apartment, or hotel." I believe those two cases, Mr. Speaker, are illustrations of incorporations of additional matter. The other claim I base the point of order on is that the title of the bill brought in by the House conferees incorporates matter not incorporated in the original Senate title, in that it provides for rentals of public lands in section 108 as well as service in connection with public buildings in section 106. Section 101 also contains specific reference to subject matter not specified in the Senate bill. That in connection with paragraph 118 are the three places I base my point of order on, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Ohio that lands are brought into the bill, and that lands were not contemplated in the original bill, I wish to suggest that the word "land," in the matter which is now before the House, is in further description of the premises. The original Ball bill dealt with houses, and it provided for fixing the rent of the houses without any provision whatever to give the landlord any return on the land on which the house stands. Therefore, as I say, the use of the word "land" may be only a further description of the building. Now, under the matter which is before the House it is made quite clear that the landlord shall be entitled to some compensation for the land also on which the building stands, and it may not broaden the bill except it is a further description.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. BEGG. How does the gentleman explain this term in section 101 of the conference report where it says, "This term also varies the Senate amendment by covering vacant lands rented, and all service furnished in connection with any rental property"? It does not say anything about buildings in there at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this point of order is not to be decided upon the statement made in the report. It is to be decided upon the language of the bill itself, and if the point of order were to be decided upon what different conferees have said about it, or if the point of order were to be decided upon what some conferees over in the other body have said about it, I do not know at all where we would land; because, upon reading the RECORD, I find that the conferees in the other body, in answering questions put to them by Members of that body, have, unintentionally, of course, misstated the provisions of the bill. In determining this point we are not committed by the report, we are bound only by the language of the bill; and so when the word "land" is used in it, it is no departure from the original feature because the land must go with the building which it stands upon, as I have said several times before.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

The SPEAKER. Did the original Senate bill say that the term "rental property" means any building; is that where the word "land" was inserted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am not the framer of the bill, but if it were left to me to select the place, that is the place to which I think it would apply.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not understand the Chair. The Chair is simply inquiring whether in the Senate bill, or perhaps he had better inquire of the gentleman from Ohio who makes the point of order—the Chair understood the gentleman from Ohio made the point of order that the word "land" was inserted in section 101?

Mr. BEGG. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. That was not in the Senate bill at all. Does the gentleman state that the word "land" is not in the Senate bill at all?

Mr. BEGG. The word "land" was not in the Senate bill. This bill refers to "vacant land" and services, both of which were not mentioned in the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state to the Chair where the word is used?

Mr. BEGG. In this bill, sections 101 and 106, I mentioned a minute ago.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can give the words as they appear in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to hear it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Section 101 "The term 'rental property' means any land or building or part thereof in the District of Columbia rented or hired."

The SPEAKER. And the House made the insertion?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The language inserted is, "land or" and "the service agreed or required by law or by determination of the commission to be furnished in connection therewith."

Mr. BEGG. The House amendment, if the Speaker will pardon me, uses the word "vacant land."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That expression is not used in the bill, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair wished to ascertain. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And as to the word "services," Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has picked that out at another place. Now, in the original Ball bill, on page 1, beginning with line 5, the following language is used:

> The term "rental property" means any building or any part thereof in the District of Columbia rented or hired for dwelling purposes, and the furniture or furnishings therein.

Among things that are to be furnished are heat, light, and water. So this amendment explains what furniture and furnishings are. Therefore, I contend that it has not departed from the substantial character of the original Ball bill.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, in furtherance of that very point, in section 101, the definition of the term "rental property" means any land or building rented or hired, and services agreed to or required by law, or by the determination of the commission to be furnished in connection therewith but does not include a hotel or apartment. The term "hotel or apartment" means the building and the land, as you will see in the paragraph below. I contend that the Senate amendment dealt only with the term "hotel and apartment," meaning building and land, but did not treat the subject of land as treated in this report.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the conferees have kept within the subject matter of the proposition that was submitted to them. The Senate passed the so-called Ball rent bill as an amendment to the pending bill, and the whole subject of rents in the District of Columbia was before the conferees, and we ought not and can not properly go into an overnice distinction of the meaning of the words in deciding whether the conferees kept within their jurisdiction or not.

One of the most recent decisions of the Speaker on this subject was on the bill which was up in the last Congress that prohibited the printing of German-language newspapers without certain restrictions. That matter went to the conference committee, and the conferees brought back a report including all foreign languages, and Speaker CLARK, in a careful decision, and after a long argument on the matter, decided that the conferees were within their rights and said in that decision that the same rule for the conferees did not apply as to germaneness as applied to the consideration of bills in the House originally or in the Committee of the Whole, and said that as long as they kept within the subject matter that was properly in dispute between the two Houses it was not for the Speaker to decide that they exceeded their jurisdiction. I quote from the decision of the Speaker:

The conferees, for some reason unknown to the Chair, and it is no part of the Chair's business to inquire into the reason why, or whether they acted wisely or unwisely, have included along with the German-language papers other foreign-language papers. In the House, if that had been offered as an amendment, the Chair would have ruled it out without any ceremony; but we are not operating under the rules of the House as applied to House bills, when originally considered in the House, on conference reports.

They have lugged in the espionage bill, and the Chair's own judgment about it is that they would have done better to have shut out the reference to the espionage bill and to have inserted the words desired, but that is a question of taste. Whether the legislation is wise or unwise the Chair thinks that the conferees' substitute for Senate amendment 127 is germane and that the conferees did not exceed their authority in that regard, and overrules the point of order.

I wish to direct the attention of the Chair to another decision, relating to the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman cite the case?

Mr. MAPES. It is on page 473, section 942 of the Manual. The House inserted a proviso on the Army bill:

"Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended at any Army post which the Secretary of War has decided or may decide to abandon in the interest of the service."

The Senate struck that out. The conferees then inserted a proviso on the same subject, appointing a commission to inquire into and advise the Secretary of War, or anybody seeking information upon that subject, what Army posts should be abandoned; and the rest of the proviso is simply detail thereof. It has been repeatedly held—I do not know by how many Speakers, but by more than one—that in a case like that, where there is no departure from the subject matter—and the subject matter in this case is the abandonment of Army posts, and the reciting of 25 Army posts was simply a detail—a commission might be appointed. The Chair calls attention to one case where a bill was brought in providing for the construction of a public road. The conferees changed that so as to appoint a commission for a survey of the public road. That was held to be in order. The subject matter of this amendment or proposition is the abandonment of Army posts. The matter that the conferees put into it is simply a detailed arrangement of how to get at abandoning the Army posts.

Inasmuch as the pending conference report deals entirely with the subject of rents within the District of Columbia, it seems to me it would be improper to limit the conferees in their consideration of that subject in a way that the gentleman from Ohio contends. And as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has well said, when the Ball bill included buildings it must necessarily have meant land also; and if I understood the gentleman from Ohio correctly, he said the term "building" meant the land that goes with the building.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the principles applying to this situation may be readily stated. Of course a conference committee can not add matter to that which is actually in issue, but sometimes it is not so easy to determine precisely what is in issue. When the real thing in issue is the method of dealing with some subject matter, then the conference committee enjoys very large powers with respect to including in its report various new details that strictly speaking were not in terms in issue between the two Houses, but it can not add a new subject matter. If the controversy is over items, the conference committee can not add a new item. For instance, in a claim bill, if the House affords relief to A and B, and the Senate affords relief to C and D, then the conference committee, when the subject matter is committed to it, can not add E to the parties relieved respectively by the House and the Senate, for to add E is to go outside of the matters actually in controversy. But when a whole subject matter is stricken out, as for instance, when an amendment in the nature of a substitute for an entire bill, is added by the Senate then the conference committee possesses very large powers in respect to reporting a method of dealing with the subject in controversy that may be different in details from the contents of the House bill, and of the Senate amendment, but which appropriately belong to the plan, or solution presented by the conference committee. As I understand the situation that is presented to-day, new matter was added by the Senate to the House bill, which matter was not agreed to by the House. Hence the conference. The conference committee offers a solution, or treatment of the subject matter, which differs in various particulars from the Senate amendment, which was wholly rejected by the House; but no new subject matter has been added. This, as I understand, is the situation. If I am correct in this, then the conference committee has not exceeded its limitations, those limitations being to deal with the subject matter, or matters committed to it, and not to add new matter.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Chair would like to suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that the only trouble that the Chair has is this: The Senate put on an amendment dealing with buildings. Then the difference between the House and the Senate was as to the rental of buildings. Now, any details or any procedure about that would be unquestionably in order, but it troubles the Chair a little inasmuch as it seems that the House has inserted a provision so that it applies not only to buildings but to land, and in the conference statement, which is supposed to represent the views of the conferees, they refer to land. That is a different subject.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Land outside of buildings?

The SPEAKER. That is what the conferees say in their statement. That is the phase of it that is troubling the Chair. The Chair would be glad of any suggestion on that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the Chair yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would like to ask the Chair whether or not——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not expressing a ruling now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The Chair will pardon me, then, in submitting a question without asking for an answer. I would like to submit this question: When a man rents a house does he not, by that lease, acquire control and possession of all beneath it, even to the middle of the earth, and even to the skies above? When he leases a house does he not necessarily lease the land on which it stands, and is not the land appurtenant thereto? Consequently can you separate them? In other words, can you make this anything more than descriptive?

The SPEAKER. That is the question. The Chair would like to suggest this for argument by gentlemen: It seems to the Chair under the bill as reported by the Senate it only applied to buildings. Now, under the bill as reported by the House it says the term "rental" means any land or buildings. Therefore if there were vacant land without any building on it, under the report of the conferees it seems to the Chair that that clearly would be subject to the provisions of this act—the land without the building.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, may I direct the Speaker's attention to this thought? In the first place, I do not know of any vacant land that this bill would apply to. But, aside from that, the building is not the important part of this provision. It is any land or building rented or hired. The purpose of this amendment is to regulate rents. It is not a question of the building or the land, but any building that is rented or hired, that this commission has authority over, and it is a question of rent entirely that this commission is dealing with. It is not dealing with anything but rent, and whether a building or piece of land is rented or hired is the important thing in this bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman think if a piece of land were rented it would be subject to this provision?

Mr. MAPES. I do not know as to vacant land. But the duty of the conferees is to improve the language, to make it so clear that anybody who reads the bill will know what it applies to. I do not think the conferees should be limited to that extent.

Mr. BEGG and Mr. SMALL rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the Chair should recognize somebody who has not yet been recognized by the Chair. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, let me submit this thought: The bill originally used this language:

The term "rental property" means any building or any part thereof.

That language necessarily implies or includes also land. In the conference report this language occurs:

"Rental property" means any land or building.

If the word "and" had been used instead of "or," unquestionably the point of order could not be sustained.

Now, the Chair in construing the point of order will deal with it liberally, with the desire to overrule the point of order if it can be done consistently. Courts frequently transpose "or" to "and" or "and" to "or" in order to effectuate the meaning as appears from the general context. Therefore, if it appears that the point of order would not be sustained if the conjunctive word "and" had been used, the Chair will likewise overrule the point of order, although the word "or" is used. The Chair should sustain the action of the conferees if it be possible to do so consistent with the rules of the House. So that I submit that when the point of order depends upon such a slender thread, and where the whole context of the bill has no reference to the rental of vacant land exclusively, but where the text of the entire bill has reference to the renting of buildings or parts of buildings or apartments or hotels, under those circumstances the Chair would not sustain the point of order.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, may I be heard on the point of order?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, in advancing an argument in support of the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio, I do not want it thought for a moment that I am expressing an opinion upon the legislation contemplated. As a matter of fact, I am in sympathy with the spirit of it, but I do desire to address the parliamentary situation. If it could be shown that the addition of the words inserted by the conferees merely clarified the terms—amplified the definition by which it would be easier and more certain to reach conclusions upon provisions already included—I doubt if a point of order would lie. But that is not what has been done. New conditions have been included, and the scope of the bill has been enlarged beyond what was contemplated in the Senate amendment. By the insertion of the words "land or" in section 101 a new provision has been added, for by reading the proposed act the commission would have jurisdiction over "any land" in the District of Columbia. That is not the simplification or definition of an administrative detail; it is new subject matter. I doubt if the original intention of Congress was to take cognizance of "any land," such as swamps, vacant lots, and woods. I believe the purpose was to regulate housing conditions and not land on which no buildings stood. Yet, by the words added, the commission can deal with "any land," not land pertaining alone to the buildings erected thereon, but any land in the District of Columbia, and therefore it seems to me that by the addition of those words, which the report confesses may include vacant lands, the conferees have exceeded their functions. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I contend that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, let us get at the reason for this rule. The reason for the rule that the conferees can not add any new matter is that the House appoints the conferees as their agents to settle disputes between the two Houses, and the House desires to restrict their agents to the matter in controversy which the House has designated them to represent the House in.

Now, in this case, what is it? The Senate adds a provision, in the nature of an amendment to this bill, dealing with the subject of rental property in the District of Columbia. Now, we must consider, for the purpose of this argument, the Ball rent amendment as a separate statute, and that statute is dealing with the question of rents in the District of Columbia. Now, one of the cardinal rules of construction is to get at the old law, the evil in it, and the remedy sought to be applied. Now, the Senate considered the existing condition here, and that was the question of the rental of property within the District of Columbia. They were not specifying vacant lands or houses. They were dealing broadly with the question of the rental of property within the District of Columbia.

When that bill came back to the House, the House disagreed to it. That was as though it were a separate bill, with all after the enacting clause stricken out. On such a bill, with all after the enacting clause stricken out, when sent to conference, the whole subject matter is at issue between the two Houses, and the conferees can deal with that whole subject matter. When the House refused to agree to this Ball amendment, it seems to me, it was tantamount to disagreeing to the whole proposition and putting the whole subject matter in conference between the two Houses.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the conferees must be allowed some latitude in adjusting these differences. If the conferees of each House are required to adhere to what their House has done, there never can be an adjustment of it. Therefore, the conferees can consider the whole subject matter and see if they can reach an agreement to bring the minds of the two Houses together.

It seems to me clear that it was the intention of the Senate amendment to deal with the whole question of rents within the District of Columbia—dealing with houses, lands, and the whole subject matter of rents—and when the House disagreed to it that put the whole subject matter in conference between the two Houses; and it looks to me as though the common sense of the proposition is that, the question of rentals being the one involved and that the conferees were to dispose of, this provision does not exceed their authority, but is in order under the rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. GARRETT, and Mr. WALSH rose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield. "Come one, come all!"

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the title of the original Ball bill is to create a rent commission for the District of Columbia.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. We will say that the rent commission has taken jurisdiction of an apartment house and has exercised jurisdiction for some time, and it then burns down. Does it lose jurisdiction? Because there is still a contract existing, and the tenant might desire to erect a tent or temporary building.

Mr. CRISP. I think if the commission had original jurisdiction, it would not lose it.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. It becomes vacant land then, does it not?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, if the language of the conference report were such that it showed clearly that the legislation was to apply only to lands upon which buildings stand, the argument just made by my good friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] would, I think, be well taken. But the conference report is not so worded as to confine the activities of the rent commission to lands upon which a building stands. There are agricultural lands in the District of Columbia. However much this legislation may be desired it is probably more important for the future of legislation that the rules of the House touching conference reports shall be strictly observed. I do not think there is any escape from the conclusion that the words "land or" inserted in the bill at the place at which they are inserted and in the connection in which they are inserted broaden this legislation to an extent beyond that which either the Senate or House had in mind or considered. Therefore this amendment proposed by the conferees was not in disagreement.

What has the Senate considered and what has the House considered? Buildings, says the Senate amendment. That bill is returned to the House. The House technically considers it by disagreeing to the Senate amendment—disagreeing to what? Buildings.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield, if it will not interrupt his argument?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that the conferees could not have eliminated the definition of rental property altogether?

Mr. GARRETT. I think they could. That was in disagreement between the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the question.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Massachusetts asked if "the gentleman from Tennessee" did not think that the conferees could have eliminated the definition of rental property altogether, to which "the gentleman from Tennessee" answered that he thought they could, because that was in disagreement. I do not see just where that particular point is applicable, however, to the argument that I am now making. If it has an application, I would be glad if the gentleman from Massachusetts would indicate it.

Mr. WALSH. If I understand the argument the gentleman is making with reference to the definition, it is that by adding something in the definition of rental property the conferees have gone beyond the scope of their authority, because they have included a new subject matter.

Mr. GARRETT. Which has not been considered by either body.

Mr. WALSH. Which has not been considered by either body; but if they had eliminated the definition of rental property altogether and simply used the words "rental property" without the definition, does not the gentleman think that the bill as then drawn would have applied?

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman has added another element.

Mr. WALSH. No. I am asking the gentleman, if the term "rental property" were not defined, would it not apply to what the conferees are now making it apply to by the addition of this language?

Mr. GARRETT. If the effect of an elimination would have been such as to broaden the legislation so as to bring in matters that had not been considered in either House, then I do not think it would have been in order. I do not think that the conferees can add new subject matter. That is fundamental. The reason for it is well understood, and I think they have added new subject matter here. I think if this law shall be passed as this conference report provides, it will extend its operations to property never considered either in the Senate or in the House.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the conferees had stricken out the words "for dwelling purposes," the term "rental property," would have included any building, or any part thereof, and we would have accomplished the very thing we are now accomplishing, except as to land; but we thought the proper way to do it was to do it openly and fairly, stating exactly to the House what the conferees had done; that is, that they purposed to include land and all buildings.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Iowa has been entirely fair to the House, of course, as he always is. What the gentleman from Iowa and his colleagues had in mind was to extend this law so that it would apply to the land upon which the building stood.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will be candid with the gentleman. It includes all land. The information before the committee is that much of the land in the District of Columbia is bringing an annual rent equivalent to 50 per cent of its value. The purpose of the conferees was to include all land, and the committee deemed the proper way to accomplish it was by stating the facts as we have.

Mr. GARRETT. As to the question of policy, that is a matter which the House has not considered. The conferees have considered it, and I have all confidence in the conferees. I am not complaining of the legislation.

Mr. HAUGEN. We submit the legislation, and put it up to the House. It is now up to it whether it will accept it or not.

Mr. GARRETT. It has to accept or reject the proposition as a whole. So far as I am concerned, I have not the slightest objection to the bill going back to conference, then let the committee present a concurrent resolution authorizing the conferees to add such matters as they deem necessary to give the law full force and effect, and it will give the House a chance to consider the legislation when the concurrent resolution is presented.

What I am saying is not based upon objection to the legislation, but is said because of the importance of having the House consider the legislative propositions and pass upon them, which they do not have the opportunity to do in this conference report.

Mr. HAUGEN. There is no question but that every amendment is germane to the question in issue. The question is, Have the conferees exceeded their authority in adding land; next, in adding services? I think it could be held that the land on which the building is situated, and that the services are included with the buildings. We have included other lands. I have contended from the beginning and still believe that adding land is subject to a point of order. I want to be fair with the House, and I have stated what the conferees have intended by the amendment. The gentleman from Ohio may withdraw the point of order, which would give an opportunity to include the land, or he may insist on the point of order. If the point of order is sustained the bill will go back to conference. Then it would be in order to move to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think the chairman of the committee is entirely right that all kinds of land, occupied and vacant, are within the provisions of this bill. But I have not been able to concur with the chairman that the inclusion of the land makes the report and bill subject to a point of order. This is a rent bill, and anything within reason can be brought in so nearly similar to what has been put in as it would seem to me to be germane and ought not to be held subject to a point of order. I think the gentleman from Iowa has been frank, that he is correct in saying that the word "land" takes in vacant land that has no connection with the building.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The Speaker asked me a question some moments ago which involved a question of fact. Lacking knowledge of this fact I was unable to make answer at the time. Since then I have sent to the document room for the original House bill No. 6824 with the Senate amendment, known as the Ball amendment. I find the following provision in the Senate amendment:

The term rental property means any building, or any part thereof in the District of Columbia rented or hired for dwelling purposes, the furniture and furnishings therein.

Looking to the conference report I find that it says "rental property means any land, or building in the District of Columbia."

I must say in view of the situation as it now appears that this amendment of the phrase "rental property," as made by the conference committee was in excess of the authority of the committee. It is precisely like a precedent that I recall that was decided several years ago. The House undertook to legislate as to use of certain vehicles by Army officials using in the paragraph the words "personal use." The Senate added several amendments to the paragraph and it was committed to conference. The conferees added the words "or official," to the word "personal." When the report was brought into the House, it was held after discussion the addition of these words was in excess of the authority of the conferees, and the point of order to the report was sustained.

The principles that I stated relating to the pending point of order were correctly stated. Up to that time I had heard nothing in the debate that caused me to think that the conference report had violated the rules with respect to the authority of the conferees, but in view of the fact that the conference committee has materially enlarged the definition of the words "rental property," as shown by a comparison of the Ball amendment with the conference report I must now say in response to the question heretofore asked me by the Speaker, that the conferees have exceeded their authority, and the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. FESS. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether under the interpretation of the Senate amendment it would extend to vacancies on which there is no building?

Mr. GARRETT. Indeed I think so, and I am fortified in that opinion by the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the senior member of the conference committee, in which he just stated that it was intended by the conferees to include all land in the District. It includes truck gardens in the District, agricultural lands, and everything, I have no doubt.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman does not think that the language of the bill excluded the garden that is attached to the building?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not think so, and, as I say, I am fortified in that opinion by the statement just made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. FESS. I agree with the gentleman's contention.

Mr. GARRETT. I wish to reiterate, Mr. Speaker, that I am not discussing this question with reference to the merits of the legislation, but I am discussing it wholly with reference to its importance as a parliamentary proposition. Under our present practice perhaps the gravest responsibility that rests upon the Speaker at any time is in passing upon questions with reference to conference reports, because conference reports are the last stages of legislation. Therefore it is of extreme importance that we shall be guided carefully by the rules of the House. It is because of this, and because of this only, that I have ventured to interpose these remarks upon the point of order.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether, in his opinion, under the Senate amendment in section 9 it would not have been possible to bring before this commission a controversy affecting the rent of lands which were not improved?

Mr. GARRETT. To what language does the gentleman refer?

Mr. IGOE. I refer to the following language:

That any lessee, sublessee, tenant, or hotel guest claiming to be damaged by any lessor or sublessor or hotel proprietor, or owner, by reason of any unfair or unreasonable rents or charges—

And so forth.

There is no reference there——

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, I think it would be in order, as I stated at the beginning of my argument, for the conferees to amend by including the lands upon which the buildings stand.

Mr. IGOE. But this does not anywhere mention the words which are defined in the terms "rental property."

Mr. GARRETT. I think it would be limited by the definition. I think that would be limited by section 101, which gives the definition.

Mr. IGOE. I am speaking of the original Ball bill, and I am reading from section 9 of that bill.

Mr. WALSH. That is not included here at all.

Mr. IGOE. I was told it was.

Mr. GARRETT. That was in conference, let it be said, and I answer the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] that necessarily that would, in my opinion, be limited by the definition given in section 101, which is the immediate matter now under discussion.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, just a word or two in reply to the contentions made by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] who, as we all appreciate, is one of the best parliamentarians in the House. In construing the effect of the action of the conferees upon a point of order made that they have exceeded their authority, the Chair is not limited to the mere language which is under fire through the process of the point of order, but he must take into consideration the entire context of the Senate amendment which has been the subject of this controversy, which result in the matter being sent to conference.

Upon the contention of the gentleman from Tennessee, because the Senate amendment gave a certain definition of rental property, the conferees should not add to that definition nor subtract from it. Of course that proposition is not tenable. Gentlemen in construing this definition get up and read to the Chair that the term "rental property" means "any land or building or part thereof in the District of Columbia," and most of them stop there. That is not the definition of rental property. The definition of "rental property" is as follows, as agreed upon by the conferees:

The term "rental property" means any land or building or part thereof in the District of Columbia rented or hired and the service agreed on, required by law or by determination of the commission to be furnished in connection therewith.

So it is not simply defining "rental property" to mean land or buildings. It is hitched up and conjoined with the service agreed to be furnished therewith or required by the commission. I read further:

The term "service" includes the furnishing of lights, heat, water, telephone or elevator service, furniture, furnishings, window shades, screens, awnings, storage, kitchen, bath and laundry facilities and privileges, maid service, * * * making all repairs suited to the type of building or necessitated by ordinary wear and tear.

Clearly under that definition where the "rental service" means not only the land, buildings, and services, vacant land can not be included, and neither can agricultural land be included, because under the definition, which includes lands, building, and service, they do not need maid service for agricultural lands nor elevator service.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman mean to indicate "service" necessarily means all of those?

Mr. WALSH. All or any of them.

The SPEAKER. Suppose it is water. Vacant land might need water.

Mr. WALSH. But, Mr. Speaker, its says—

* * * and any other privilege or service connected with the use or occupancy of any rental property, apartment, or hotel.

If the Chair will read the entire Senate amendment and the entire report which the conferees have submitted upon that amendment, he will see that the whole purpose of this is to control and regulate the use of property for dwelling purposes. It is not an agricultural bill, it is not a bill to regulate the use of vacant lands, but the conditions of the bill when construed will show that it is for the control of the renting of property which is being used for dwelling purposes.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Do I understand that the gentleman means that before this law would apply to a building that there must be some sort of service connected with it?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no; I do not contend that at all, but I say that the definition "rental property" includes not only the building and the land but service agreed or required by law or by the determination by the commission to be furnished in connection therewith, so it includes not only the land and the building but the service, such as elevator service, light, heat, water, furniture, furnishings, and so forth.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman will permit, if service must be connected with it, then take the case of an individual who has a private residence and employs no servants or no services are furnished him by the owner or lessor of the property, then, if I follow the gentleman's reply correctly, this law would not apply to that residence at all. If it does apply to where there is no service, then would it not apply with equal force to vacant land where there is no service?

Mr. WALSH. Of course, if the gentleman makes that contention and stops there with section 101 of the bill. But you must take all the sections into consideration, and the Chair, in my humble judgment, should decide what is the general purpose of this bill, what is sought to be accomplished, and what was put into controversy when it was sent to conference. The point that was put into controversy was rent conditions in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman from Tennessee desires to ask further——

Mr. GARRETT. No.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the term as it is is the term which defines the limitation of this legislation, the authority which the conferees had, then the conferees could have dealt in this bill with the question of the rent of dress suits or the question of the rent of a saddle horse, or the question of the rent of a plug hat, or any other thing to which rent could apply. But the bill does not cover rents in the sense of the rent of anything. It covers rent in the sense of the term "rental property" as qualified by the definition; that is, rent from buildings, and, perhaps, by some stretch of imagination and of language, rent of land which is appurtenant to the building and necessarily must go with it.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the gentleman from Minnesota is serious in making any such contention as that. The main scope and purpose of this bill is rental conditions in the District of Columbia. Now, I submit it is fair for the Chair to construe what would be the situation if the term "rental property" was not defined in the bill, if the words "rental property" were simply used without a definition, and certainly it would include the land on which buildings were erected.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. WINGO. On the proposition of the object of the legislation. The gentleman says it was "rental condition." Was it not "housing conditions in the District of Columbia" and not land or rent, but housing conditions?

Mr. WALSH. Well, the two are synonymous. I do not know of any housing conditions being furnished free of charge or where rental——

Mr. WINGO. There is quite a distinction between housing, rental, and land.

Mr. WALSH. So the rental of vacant or agricultural land certainly is not included. Now, there is one general rule which is followed in considering conference reports, found in section 6424, volume 5, Hinds' Precedents:

Where the disagreement is as to an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the entire text of the bill, the managers have the whole subject before them, and they exercise a broad discretion as to details.

Now, that is the general rule. That is what happened in this case. This food-control bill came in here with what is known as the Ball amendment on it, an amendment of some 12 pages and dealing with one comprehensive subject, namely the rental conditions of property in the District of Columbia. That whole matter when the House disagreed to it was put into controversy. It was one amendment, not various amendments according to sections, which the conferees have agreed upon, and that whole matter was put into controversy, and the Senate in their definition of rental property says it shall include—

Any building or any part thereof in the District of Columbia rented or hired for dwelling purposes, and the furniture or furnishings therein; but does not include hotels or apartments.

That matter was in controversy. Now, I submit that the conferees are not bound by that definition, that they could not have stricken out any part of a building in the District of Columbia, and that they are not precluded from including something else in the definition, provided it is germane for the general purpose of the legislation sought to be enacted. Now, if the matter had been before the House, and the amendment had been offered to include "land" in this Ball amendment, I submit it would have been germane; but, Mr. Speaker, if it were not germane and could not have been offered in the House is not conclusive that it should not be inserted by the conferees.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If a bill providing for the regulation of apartment houses and residences were under consideration, and the gentleman from Massachusetts were in the Chair, and some Member should offer an amendment providing that it should also regulate the leasing of farm land, would the Chair hold that that was germane?

Mr. WALSH. Well, I probably might not hold it germane, but I submit that——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am quite sure the gentleman would not if he were in the Chair.

Mr. WALSH. But I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that he very well knows that even though that were not germane the same rule does not follow as to conferences when the matter has been put in disagreement as this was where they disagreed to the entire amendment. They have broad discretion as I have read here, and it has been followed ever since conferences have been the custom between the two Houses.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But, if the gentleman will permit, does that discretion permit them to include matters that would not have been germane when the matter was considered in the body that appointed the conferees and was entirely outside of the matter that had been considered by the conferees?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no; it would not permit them——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is not that what has been done?

Mr. WALSH. No. I have been trying to show to the Chair that that is not what has been done here at all.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. For a question.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The gentleman from Massachusetts has given us the idea that this does not refer to farm lands but lands that are necessary in connection with the use of a building. It might be a tract of land through which a sewer was constructed, and therefore necessary, and it might embrace considerable land. I just suggest that.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. BRIGGS. This Ball amendment, when it came before the House and when the matter was sent to conference, contained only a reference to buildings, but the conferees of the two Houses were dissatisfied with that definition and were not willing to accept that when it was intended to deal substantially with real estate.

Mr. WALSH. The House was dissatisfied with it, because they disagreed to the Senate amendment and sent it to conference.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is it not a fact that if the conferees had seen fit to give no definition at all of rental property, and it would have been left to the court to construe, that in all probability they would have construed it as relating to real estate, which would have included lands as well as buildings?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman's suggestion, Mr. Speaker, is an entirely pertinent one. The House disagreed to that and that definition was in controversy, and so within the scope of consideration by the conferees. I simply wanted to recall to the Chair the precedents cited by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. The first case, in which Fort D. A. Russell was concerned, is in section 942 of the Manual, a very carefully considered case, in which the decision, I think, was written and considered for the Chair by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], and the other case was one which came up in the last session with reference to foreign-language newspapers.

Now, because the conferees include some other subject matter in a definition, it does not necessarily follow, Mr. Speaker, that they go beyond the scope of their authority. And while it is very important that conferees should confine themselves to the limits of the matter in controversy, it was equally important that when conferees have agreed and have brought in legislation and confined themselves to the subject matter of the legislation, have not gone afield from that and introduced new matter into the legislation or new propositions which have no relevancy or connection, it was equally important that measures should not be sent back to conference upon points of order unless it is perfectly clear beyond question, in the opinion of the Chair, that they have exceeded the authority under the rules of the House and that they have injected into the controversy matters which were not in dispute when the legislation was committed to conference. And while I am opposed to this bill, and if opportunity is presented shall vote against it, I do not see, from the suggestions and contentions made, that it can be well argued that the report is subject to a point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, just one more word. The question seems to revolve around whether or not the original Ball bill dealt with the land as separate and apart from the land upon which a house stands.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has referred heretofore and now refers to the original Ball bill. Of course he should confine the reference to the Senate amendment, which probably is the original Ball bill, but the original Ball bill is not connected with the discussion whatever. It is the Senate amendment, which comprises the original Ball bill properly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Looking, however, to the original Ball bill, I desire to invite attention to the fact that on page 11 of that bill, section 13, the Saulsbury resolution is dealt with. The Saulsbury resolution is a part, and a great part, of the subject matter with which the original Ball bill dealt.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman allow a question? The Chair does not understand whether or not the Senate amendment is the Ball bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The Senate amendment to the Ball bill also deals with the identical subject, the Saulsbury resolution, and the Saulsbury resolution contains this language in the first part of it—

That until the treaty of peace shall have been definitely concluded between the United States and the Imperial German Government, unless in the meantime otherwise provided by Congress, no judicial order, decree, or judgment for the recovery or possession of any real estate in the District of Columbia—

And so forth.

Then the Saulsbury resolution concludes with this language:

That the term "real estate" as herein used shall be construed to include any and all lands, any building or any part of any building, house or dwelling, any apartment, room, suite of rooms, or any other kind of structure whatever on land situated in the District of Columbia.

Therefore, while the original Ball bill in that way did deal with "land" separate and apart from houses, the Senate amendment does the same thing. Therefore when the conferees come to deal with it they deal with the Saulsbury resolution, which defines what "real estate" is, and that is not only the houses, but it is the land, whether vacant or otherwise. Therefore the conferees have not exceeded their authority by including the word "land," because the Saulsbury resolution, which is in the original Ball bill, and which is also in the Senate bill, deals with real estate, and "real estate" is defined in the resolution.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman recall for the moment that the Senate resolution specifically repeals th Saulsbury law, and the conference report specifically repeals the Saulsbury law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The original Ball bill repeals the Saulsbury resolution after 10 days. The conference report repeals the Saulsbury resolution 60 days after the first commissioners shall have been confirmed by the Senate; and then provides, substantially, that the protection given to the tenants under the Saulsbury resolution shall still obtain until another status has been established.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair is not ready to rule, I would like to submit a few observations. I do not care to if the Chair has made up his mind.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman want to argue that it is in order or not in order?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Then to save time the Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair appreciates the importance of sustaining a conference report, and the Chair has been anxious from the beginning here to be able, preserving his mental integrity, to rule that this conference report was in order. But presuming the authority of the rules of the House is more important than the inconvenience of sending a bill back to a conference, the Chair stated in the beginning of the discussion the difficulty which occurred to the Chair, hoping that that difficulty would be met and removed by argument. The Chair regrets to say that that difficulty still confronts him and seems insuperable. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] stated correctly that the question at issue is whether the conference report has gone beyond the subject matter of the Senate amendment. The Senate amendment dealt with rents, but at the very beginning it practically stated in a definition the precise subject with which it dealt, saying "The term 'rental property' means any building or part thereof in the District of Columbia." That seems to the Chair to be the subject of the Senate amendment.

Now, the conferees, it therefore seems to the Chair, were limited to that general subject. They might diminish it. They might take away from it. But the law is well settled that the conferees can not introduce any new subject. Anything in connection in the way of procedure referring to the subject matter would be allowed. But the difference between the Senate and the House was that the Senate dealt with buildings or parts thereof, and the House, by disagreeing, refused to deal with anything, so that the conferees, it seems to the Chair, were limited in their jurisdiction between legislation affecting buildings and no legislation at all. They could introduce any matter germane to buildings, but they could not go beyond that. They introduced the new subject "land." The Chair is disposed to think that if they had said "land connected with buildings" it might have been in order, but the chairman of the committee very frankly stated that it was the intention of the committee to include land entirely separate from buildings. It seems to the Chair that if the House had not some distinct purpose in view, the word "land" would not have been inserted. It broadens the scope of the Senate amendment by an entirely distinct subject matter, it seems to the Chair; and so the Chair feels constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of ascertaining the judgment of the House I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas moved to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion is made to lay the appeal on the table. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion to lay the appeal on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its disagreement and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House insists on its disagreement and ask for a conference. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to inquire if the conference committee will attempt to bring in a report that will be in accordance with the rules of the House?

Mr. HAUGEN. I stated in my remarks at the outset that it was quite difficult to bring in a workable bill without its being subject to a point of order.

Mr. DOWELL. But the chairman of the committee stated when he brought in this report that he did not think it was in order. He stated that when he brought it in. It seems to me that the conference committee ought not to be subject to bringing in a report that is not in accordance with the rules.

Mr. HAUGEN. The conferees are the agents of the House for the purpose for which they were appointed. It is the duty of the conferees to act in accordance with the wishes of the House, and it is the duty of the conferees to bring in any matter that is proper and which meets with the wishes and sentiment of the House. If the House had an opportunity to vote on the proposition, I dare say 90 per cent of the Members would vote to include the land. But that is neither here nor there.

Mr. WALSH. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is action on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] that the House insist on its disagreement and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HAUGEN, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan, and Mr. RUBEY.

DUTY ON MAGNESITE ORE.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5218.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 5218. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill 5218, with Mr. ANDERSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 5218, the magnesite ore bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 5218) to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of magnesite ores and manufactures thereof in the United States.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to occupy his time now. There will be only one more speech on this side.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in connection with current discussions of industrial unrest and the rights of labor, and the widespread controversy over the question of whether or not police officers or other public officials whose sworn duty it is to uphold the law should affiliate with any federation or association which approves the strike as one of its tenets, I desire to call the attention of the House to a unique organization formed in the city of Pittsburgh which to my mind successfully answers the question so far as police officers are concerned. I refer to the Fraternal Order of Police, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does this deal with the subject of the inclination on the part of police organizations to affiliate with other organizations?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. It is opposed to such affiliation.

Mr. BLANTON. It is opposed to affiliation with any other organization such as would tend to bring about a sympathetic strike?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. It is an independent organization entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I will not confine my remarks entirely to the bill under consideration. If the Republican Members will permit me, I want to make, for a few minutes, a little heart-to-heart talk with them, and see if we can not take each other into our confidence. In the first place, I wish to ask this question of the majority leader and other Members on the Republican side: What are you considering this bill for? Why have you been considering the tungsten-ore bill and the chemical-glassware bill and the surgical-instrument bill and the zinc-ore bill, and all these other little local tariff bills? Now, let us be honest with ourselves, and let the Republican leaders be perfectly candid with their own side.

Have you been considering these bills with any idea of their becoming laws? Why, no. Will you not admit that? Does any one of you believe that the bill which we are now considering will become a law at this session, or will even be considered by the Senate at this session? Why, you do not. You know it will not be. You know, and you knew when you reported these little popgun bills—so termed by Senator PENROSE—out of the committee, that the Senate was going to ignore each and every one of them. Now, what did you do it for? Why have you been taking up the time of the House for weeks in considering such bills? Did you do it to help some Republican who was the author of a bill or some Republican from one of the States or districts interested particularly in the industries "protected" in the bills to get back to Congress? I do not believe you will admit that. Or did you do it just to kill time, to "make out" to the people that you are doing real business in Congress? Will you not admit at once that that is really the reason why you have been considering these bills? Now, you know this bill is not going to be considered in the Senate at this session, or at the next session, or at the short session of this Congress. Why not be frank with your own side? I want to show either that the Republicans in this House are absolutely and utterly inefficient in conducting business in the House; that they are absolutely incapacitated for legislation if they are sincere in supporting this bill in the belief that it is really going to be passed or considered by the Senate. This bill pertains only to one little industry in one or two counties in Washington and one or two counties in California, mostly in one or two little sections in Washington. The total amount invested in this "great" Northwest-corner industry is less than $3,000,000. The whole turnout of the industry, with the big prices now prevailing, is only about $4,000,000. The entire industry employs less than 1,500 people. The bill itself is only a page and a quarter in length. Yet it has taken this Republican House, with 45 majority, four days to consider it, and we have not finished general debate yet. It will take at least another day.

Well, now, gentlemen, if the Republicans of the House are really sincere and anxious to facilitate the passage of wise and beneficent legislation and believe this bill is such, then it is proof positive of their absolute incapacity to legislate. [Applause.] Is not that so, between us? There are over 4,000 items in the tariff act which Republicans in the campaign swore to the people that they were going to revise or attempt to revise if they gave them the power to do it by electing a Republican House. At the rate at which we have been "speeding" on this bill it will take 53 years for this Republican House, working 300 days, eight hours a day in each year, to revise the tariff and keep their promises. [Laughter.] It does seem to me that almost any really candid, intelligent Republican will admit that his party in the House is incapacitated for legislation, or else you are just using these bills to kill time and fool the new Republicans of the House, as well as the people. I think you Republicans have some capacity to pass legislation sometimes, and you have made a pretty good record this session until you began to fiddle with these popgun bills. You have record enough to adjourn and go home, and I am going to show you that you ought to adjourn and go home, and that you can finish up everything of value you propose to consider in the House this session in one week's time if you go to real work and stop taking up the time of the House in fooling with bills like this which you know will never be passed or even considered in the Senate.

I say you have made a pretty fair record, but all the good record you have made has been by and with the counsel and assistance of us Democrats here. [Applause.] You started out by passing the woman suffrage amendment. The President urged that. The Democrats cooperated with you, and by good Democratic counsel and assistance you were enabled to carry out the President's urgent request on the subject. You have amended the vocational-education law by and with the counsel and aid of all the Democrats.

You were able by our counsel and cooperation to add just, wise, and beneficent amendments to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance act by which greater relief and protection were granted to our disabled soldiers. With the advice and assistance of the Democrats, you have passed legislation turning the wires back to the owners. Of course you promptly passed the appropriation bills, with the counsel and cooperation of the Democrats. You have passed, with the advice, assistance, and cooperation of the Democrats, laws for the enforcement of the prohibition amendment, and we should finish up the conference report on that matter early next week.

By the urgent insistence of the President of the United States and the cooperation of the Democrats, you have passed some wise antiprofiteering provisions. You have, with the aid of the Democrats, passed an act restoring the rate-making power to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, gentlemen, I say that is a pretty good record for Republicans, but it is a record that you could not have made without our help. The very minute you gentlemen ignored the advice of the Democrats you went off fiddling on little local tariff bills. I am going to show you, by the highest authority in the country, that these bills are futile, that they are vain, that they are nothing but "popgun" bills. Just as soon as you began to rely on yourselves and declined to invoke our counsel and cooperation you got to passing measures here that Senator PENROSE, the leader of your party at the Nation's Capital, criticizes and disapproves. So useless and senseless and unwise are these tariff measures you are passing that he has given you notice that the Senate will utterly ignore them.

If you take my advice—and it is not the advice of a Democrat or a Republican, but just as a Member of this House, to Members of the House—we will pass upon the report on the budget, conclude these conference reports, and then we will adjourn the House—the Senate will permit us to do so, and it can under the Constitution. We will adjourn the House sine die until the first Monday in December, and all of us will go home. We can finish up the business, all that is proposed, except these little hot-air bills that are brought in here to kill time. We can do that by next week. [Applause.] Now, let us wind up this business of killing time and go home, or else let us begin to legislate on matters that are worth while. Do one or the other.

I want to read to you what this distinguished gentleman and leader of your party says. Here is an interview that he gave—a very carefully prepared interview. I took it from the Indianapolis News. As a prelude to the interview the News says:

According to Senator BOIES PENROSE, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, there will be no revision of the tariff nor repeal of the present revenue law by this Congress.

I want to congratulate myself, and I believe I can congratulate Mr. PENROSE, that he and myself at one time in our lives agree on some point with reference to the tariff. [Laughter.] I think it is auspicious of the dawn of a brighter and better day for the Republic when Senator BOIES PENROSE and myself agree on anything with reference to the tariff. [Laughter.]

Let me read from the interview, and I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to pay particular attention.

It is not likely that the question of a general tariff revision will come up until after the next presidential election.

We agree on that. The Republicans have not the courage to go before the people in the next election with a concrete tariff revision. The only criticism I would like to make of this statement of the distinguished gentleman is that he proposes that the Republican Party shirk the responsibility of a tariff revision by having such revision go over until after the next general election. He is attempting to throw that responsibility on the Democrats. [Laughter.] He knows that the patriotic electorate of the country are going to return the Democratic Party to full power at the next election. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The responsibility, therefore, will be on us as it was in 1913 to revise and readjust the tariff in accordance with the changed conditions.

The gentleman says in the interview:

Nearly all of the protective tariff publicity agencies, such as the Protective Tariff League and the Home Market Club of Boston, oppose tariff revision at this time. Similar views have been generally expressed by business men all over the country, in written communications.

Has not that been my position all the time, in opposing these single-item tariff bills, that this is no time to revise the tariff; that conditions are so uncertain and abnormal that no one could tell anything about costs here and abroad; no one could tell what are the proper rates; but that we should wait until there is a readjustment of conditions? I find, according to the Senator, that the Senator and the Home Market Club and the Protective Tariff League and the business men agree with the position we Democrats took, two months or more ago, when you Republicans began your senseless "popgun" bills. I tried to convince Republicans of the House that this was the sensible, wise position. But I made no impression here in the House. But after two or three months statesmen like Senator PENROSE and the business men of the country have become thoroughly convinced that we were right about it and have come to take our position.

I did not have a very high opinion of the wisdom and beneficence of these tariff bills that the Republicans have been reporting out of the committee and voting on in the House and I severely criticized and condemned them. Now Senator PENROSE agrees with me, and, besides, he has quite a contempt for such bills. He says:

An effort has been made to secure the passage of a few so-called popgun tariff bills through the House of Representatives, and these bills are now pending in the Senate before the Senate Finance Committee. Generally speaking, the members of the Finance Committee are not overenthusiastic concerning this kind of piecemeal tariff revision.

I never expressed contempt for your bills. I never express contempt for your efforts. I simply declared they were unwise and unjust and the rates you had made were extortionate, and all that. But here is the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, the leader of the Republican Party of the United States, who has such a contempt for your bills that he calls them "popgun bills," "piecemeal-tariff legislation." He courteously notifies you that there is no chance of their being even considered by the Senate Finance Committee. Then he goes on to show how unwise are the provisions and how little study and thought and investigation were given to these bills. I feel like resenting his criticism in behalf of the Republican membership of the Committee of the House. [Laughter.] He says that "in case of a general invasion of the American market by a revival of the international trade these popgun bills would fail their purpose." That is what I have been telling you all the time, but you would not believe me. [Laughter.] The statesmen over there in the Senate did. He says further:

In some cases these bills fail to pay any attention to the necessity of compensatory duties on articles connected with the production of these manufactured and raw materials.

Now, have I not said here a dozen times in the debates on your "popgun bills" that you did not know anything about them; that you had not given any thought or made any investigation as to whether these bills were proper and wise and what the result of their operation would be or whether they balanced with other provisions of the tariff act? Have I not said a dozen times here that the only thing the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House wanted to know about these bills was what do these tariff barons want in the bills and that you put in exactly what they wanted and demanded? And I could point out, if I had the time, mistakes and blunders along the line suggested by the Senator that would make every Republican member of that committee, every Republican in the House that has been voting for these bills, look ridiculous.

Now, you must remember, gentlemen, that these criticisms by the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Republican leader of the Nation are tenfold more stinging than any criticism I have ever heaped on these bills. I treated them with perfect seriousness and tried to point out how dangerous they were, how unjust they were, how unfair they were, and how many millions of dollars would be taken from the pockets of all the people and put into the pockets of a favored few in order to enrich them. I never expressed, as Senator PENROSE does, any contempt for the bills at all.

Now, let us see if we can not get down to real business, do something worth doing, or get away from here, gentlemen, and be quick about it. These bills are not going to pass. Why fiddle away the time here on these bills that will never be considered in the Senate? You have taken four days of the time of this House on this little bill, and we will not finish it to-day, but will have to take the fifth day.

Why fiddle away on these bills when you know you have notice from headquarters that they are not going to be considered—not one of them—at this session or the next—not until after the next general election? What are the big questions before this House on which the Republicans of the House have not shaped or announced any policy? Maybe you have done the best you could, but you have not been able to agree among yourselves on a policy on the great questions that Congress must consider, and that this Congress ought to have the courage and wisdom to consider. Why wait and put the entire responsibility over on us Democrats after the next general election? [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are perfectly willing to take it, but are ready to consider them now.

The Republicans have no soldier policy, none in the world. You ought to let the soldiers know at once what you are going to do—whether or not you will commit the Government to a moneyed or commercial obligation to those who emerged from the World War uninjured, sound in mind and body. No bill has yet been introduced on which you will dare state your position. You do not expect to have the House consider a soldiers' bill at this session, so do not keep us here upon the theory that you are going to consider one.

You have no merchant-marine policy. You do not intend to announce one at this session. You do not intend to even introduce a merchant-marine bill at this session. So we ought not to be kept here for that.

You have no labor policy. Conditions are not such that you could, perhaps, shape one now. Do not keep us Democrats and Republicans here for that. That is a big question, but it is so big that you are afraid to take it up this session.

You have no policy in regard to a permanent military organization. You do not expect to have one at this session. Why, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has practically announced that they will not even begin preparing such a bill until the next session of Congress. You expect no bill on that, so you ought not to keep us Democrats and Republicans here on the pretext of an Army-reorganization program. You are not going to touch it in the House at this session.

You have no immigration policy, and do not expect to touch the question of further immigration restriction at this session. You know that during the war there were situations, and there are now situations, that demand that there should be restrictions. You know you can not keep us here on the pretext of passing any bill respecting immigration.

I understand the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has been most diligent in consideration of the best and wisest railroad policy when the roads are returned to the owners. I am not criticizing you for delay with respect to this. You may report out the railroad bill, but are you going to consider it in the House this session? You ought to do it, if possible, but you know that you are not going to try to pass it at this session. We Democrats stand ready to consider it with you now, but you do not propose to do it. So now please tell us why are you keeping the House in session, killing time with these squirt bills?

What is there to keep us here any longer than next week, during which we can conclude the conference reports and report out and consider the budget proposition? I have given you all of the reasons why we ought not to stay here for the consideration of the popgun tariff bills. You know that you are not going to consider in the House at this session the big important questions before the House and the country. But suppose you did do it, and you showed no more capacity for facilitating legislation with respect to important measures than you have shown in this page-and-a-quarter bill, this little magnesite proposition. Why, it would take you months to pass any of them if we Democrats did not show you how to do it. Let us be fair and square with ourselves and with each other and with the public. If we are going to take up and consider any real question of national importance, let us get at it and stop this folly of keeping the House in session considering popgun bills that have no chance of becoming law. If we are not going to consider these measures of public importance, let us dispose of the conference reports and the budget proposal and adjourn and go home, so that we can make our arrangements for the long session beginning in December. That is the practical and wise thing to do.

Now as to the magnesite bill under consideration. The rate of three-fourths of a cent a pound, or $15 a ton, on magnesite in this bill, at prices in normal times, would equal 150 per cent ad valorem. On magnesite bricks it would equal 110 per cent. Practically no bricks were imported under the existing rate of 10 per cent ad valorem. A gentleman whose company is one of the largest manufacturers of such brick testified before the committee that 5 per cent ad valorem would be sufficient to keep them out. Magnesite, dead-burned and calcined, in paragraph 2, is the essential thing the advocates of the bill want to keep out. One industry in the State of Washington, the Northwest Magnesite Co., produces about 75 per cent of the magnesite used by the steel and other metal companies. Such companies use about 80 per cent of the magnesite used in this country; that is, they use the bricks made from the magnesite. Magnesite was on the free list under the McKinley Act, the Dingley Act, and the Payne-Aldrich Act, and we kept it on the free list under the Underwood bill. Now, at one jump, from the free list of all of these acts, this bill proposes a specific duty that would amount in normal times to 150 per cent ad valorem!

The import value of magnesite before the war was $10. The three-fourths of a cent per pound provided in the bill is $15 a ton—150 per cent ad valorem. In round numbers that amounts to $3,000,000 that they are going to make somebody pay to help enrich this industry in Washington, the Northwest Magnesite Co., and a few smaller companies in California. This Northwest Co., if the bill becomes law, will swallow every one of them and have an absolute monopoly of the industry. On dead-burned or calcined magnesite the rate proposed is $15 a ton. It is estimated that the consumption in the United States will be about 175,000 tons a year. At $15 a ton it would mean $2,625,000 a year which the proponents of this bill would put into the treasury of the Northwest Magnesite Co., that has less than a million dollars invested in its plant, and a few other smaller companies.

Why, it is in evidence that the president of the Northwest Magnesite Co. told an officer of the American Refractories Co. that his company could produce it at between $10 and $12 a ton. Yet they give it a tariff of $15. On bricks made of magnesite the Payne Act levied a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem. With such a rate practically none were imported. The Underwood Act imposes a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem. Practically none came in at that rate. But this bill proposes a rate that will equal an ad valorem of 110 per cent, based on prewar prices. The rate in this bill—that is, the committee amendment—is three-fourths of a cent a pound and 10 per cent ad valorem. A thousand bricks weigh from 10,000 to 12,000 pounds. This will make the rate from $75 to $90 per thousand. The prewar import price of such bricks was about $80. This makes, therefore, the specific rate in the bill equal to a little over 100 per cent, based on normal prices; add to this the ad valorem of 10 per cent in the bill and the total rate will be 110 per cent ad valorem. The Payne-Act rate was 25 per cent, the existing rate is 10 per cent, but the rates in the bill amount to 110 per cent ad valorem, based on normal prewar prices. And this in face of the fact that one of the largest manufacturers of such brick in this country testified that, in his opinion, 5 per cent ad valorem would be almost prohibitive.

I am not going to waste my time in appealing to the reason of Republicans or to their sense of justice in the hope of getting any Republican opposition to this bill. Why, I did that last Friday when we had up the dyestuff bill. [Laughter.] It looked like any man of reason would have voted against that bill. Even Republicans here on the floor gave reasons why any intelligent Republican should vote against it. It did no good. [Laughter.] So there is no use now in appealing to their reason or their sense of justice in this matter. It does no good. But I must confess that I did have some hope of having many of the Republicans vote against that dyestuff bill. I did not have much, however. I said in the beginning of my remarks on that bill that the Republicans were like the jointed snake, that if you break it to pieces in the morning by sunset it would get together, and predicted that, however much they seemed divided, when the vote should come the cohesive power of tariff plunder would bring them together. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When I saw Uncle JOE FORDNEY stand here that Friday and say at the top of his voice that a bill with a licensing feature such as was in that bill was "un-Republican and un-American," I said to myself, "FORDNEY will never vote for the bill. It is too un-Republican and too un-American for him." I said, "He will be with us." But, lo and behold, when the vote came, FORDNEY voted for the un-Republican and un-American bill which he had just denounced. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Because I could not vote with the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. I thought the gentleman might vote for the beneficent motion to recommit, but I did not expect the gentleman to vote for something that was "un-American and un-Republican."

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. FORDNEY. Did the gentleman vote for the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; I thought the gentleman from Michigan and myself, from his speech, were going to vote together against the bill. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have about 10 more minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from North Carolina be extended for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Why should not I have had hopes. My friend DALLINGER, of Massachusetts, had made a speech severely denouncing the licensing feature of the bill, and my hopes grew. Then my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS] made a 30 or 40 minute speech, a splendid speech, against the bill as it was. He showed how un-Republican it was; he showed what a handicap the bill would be to the industries of the country, and my hopes kept increasing. Then my friend GARLAND, of Pennsylvania, the great protective-tariff State of Pennsylvania, made a speech against it, and showed how un-Republican and how un-American and how unjust to the manufacturing interests of this country that bill was. And then my friend Dr. FESS, of Ohio, the chairman of the Republican congressional committee, came in and capped the climax by denouncing it as a repudiation of every principle of Republican protection, and my hopes kept growing. I awaited the roll call on the bill. My ears were attuned to the call of every name. I was in a way counting on Uncle JOE CANNON. He had just expressed on the floor grave doubts as to how he should vote. But "CANNON," the Clerk called, and "aye" was the answer. [Laughter.] I turned to see what was happening, and then "DALLINGER," "aye"; "BURROUGHS," "aye." My hopes began vanishing; my heart began to sink. [Laughter.]

But I still had a little flickering left. FORDNEY had not been called. I knew he would vote against it just as he had talked a few minutes before. I sat erect awaiting his name and to hear him shout out "No!" The Clerk called "FORDNEY," and the answer came "Aye." [Laughter.]

I thought I would faint, but then I recovered and said: "Well, I know there is one Republican that will never give in. He of all Republicans will vote just as he spoke. That's my good friend, Dr. FESS [laughter], of Ohio, chairman of the national Republican congressional committee. No sort of party lash can pop him into line." [Laughter.] He is going to vote with us, thought I, because just five minutes before the vote came he stood right here, and he never was more enthusiastic and earnest in his denunciation of a Democratic bill than he was in denouncing this Republican bill. He had said, "This bill is un-Republican; it is un-American." And more: "If we Republicans vote for this license feature in the bill, we will be repudiating every Republican doctrine of protection that we have ever professed to have or ever preached." And still more: "We Republicans in the last campaign promised the people if they would give us this House"—and he was chairman of the Republican congressional committee—"that we would repeal these license commissions and unshackle the business of this country. And now, the very first opportunity we have had to keep our pledges, this bill makes us Republicans eat our very words and violate our pledges."

I certainly knew that Dr. FESS, with all his manhood and high spirit, despite the Republican machine and the party cudgel, would vote with me and his conscience against that bill. My contemplation of Dr. FESS's vote left one little lingering spark of hope in me. But the boys came around and said, "KITCHIN, they are going back on you." [Laughter.] I said, "Yes; but Dr. FESS will not go back on me." [Laughter.] Then the name of Dr. FESS was called, and—and—he answered "Aye." [Laughter on the Democratic side.] My heart went right out of my breast into my shoes, and darkness spread all about me. [Renewed laughter.]

Gentlemen, let us never again have hopes of Republicans voting against a tariff bill. [Laughter.] Of course, I expected that Uncle JOE CANNON and Uncle JOE FORDNEY and Dr. FESS and all these other gentlemen were going to vote like they talked. But when the time came to round up "the boys," just before the vote was taken, the House machine knew that if these Republicans voted in accordance with their speeches, MOORE of Pennsylvania and we Democratic patriots over here would defeat that "un-Republican," "un-Democratic," and "un-American" bill. But just before the roll call began I saw Uncle JOE FORDNEY running around—they knew they were going to be beaten if they did not get to work—with a bull whip in his hand, popping and slashing it over the heads of the Republicans. [Laughter.]

Uncle JOE CANNON had one, and with that famous left arm he was making it sizzle around his colleagues. MONDELL was swinging the party cudgel right and left amid the dodging heads of the protesting Republicans. No herd of cattle on a western ranch were ever more effectually "rounded up" than the machine and bosses were rounding up the Republicans. In the commotion I said, "Where is Dr. FESS, the chairman of the Republican national congressional committee?" I looked again, and, lo and behold, I saw him going about among the Republicans with a lady's little riding whip, which leader MONDELL had given him [laughter], tapping and tickling the Republicans in the side [laughter], whispering, "Get together, boys, get together; Republican tariff at stake." [Laughter.]

And when the vote was recorded there were only 10 manly Republicans over there who voted "no." [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, do not let us ever hope again over Republican divisions when the stake is tariff plunder. [Laughter.] Gentlemen, to me there is no sentiment in the words, "Hope springs eternal in the human breast." [Laughter.]

I want to suggest before I get through that all of you are interested in the high cost of living, and you have been talking and talking about the high cost of living and the way you are going to reduce it for a month or more. Have you thought about how, by these popgun bills, if they should become law, you are reducing the high cost of living? By these bills your method to reduce the cost of living is to increase the price of articles to be bought. By the tungsten bill you increase the price—it makes no difference who pays it in the first instance; the people must finally pay it—$5,000,000 or more. Somebody count it up as I go. By your chemical and optical-glass bill you put $3,000,000 annually more on the people. On surgical instruments you increased the price $5,000,000 annually. As to zinc-ore price, you have increased it over $15,000,000. The people have got to pay that $15,000,000. As to pearl and shell buttons, the bill that the Hon. Pearl Button GREEN pushed through the House will add at least $5,000,000 yearly.

Mr. FORDNEY, in his remarks on the bill, said it would increase the cost 20 cents to each person in the United States, or $10,000,000 a year. But it is down to $5,000,000. The dyestuffs bill, if it becomes a law, will increase the cost of the products affected by it at least $15,000,000. Now, this magnesite bill will make an increase of about $3,000,000. That is something like $40,000,000 or $50,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. That makes $51,000,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. My statistician here says $51,000,000. [Laughter.] And if you Republicans keep on with these little popgun bills that you have before the Ways and Means Committee, the amount of increase of the cost of living will be $100,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY took the floor amid applause.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have listened to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], as I always do, with a great deal of interest. He always creates merriment when addressing the House. He said in the beginning of his speech that he was going to confine his remarks to the bill. He spoke for 1 hour and 10 minutes, and used not more than 5 minutes of his time in speaking to the bill. That is about as close as he comes to confining himself to the subject matter of the bill when it is a tariff bill. However, the gentleman is very interesting.

This bill, in my opinion, affects one of the most important industries in the country, in which more labor is employed than in any other industry in the United States except the railroads. More people are employed in industries where this product is an important item of use than in any other industry in the United States. Yet the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] says it is a little popgun, air-gun, squirt-gun bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I know the gentleman would not want to misquote me. I did not say that myself. I was quoting what the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, the Republican leader there, BOIES PENROSE, said, and every time I said it I had quotation marks around it, every time. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman referred to the bills that have been passed by the House relating to increased duties on imports, affecting articles that are considered war measures, as little popgun, air-gun bills.

The gentleman said that the Republicans could hurry along general revision of the tariff with the assistance of the Democrats to give them information and pass it quickly. We could pass a Democratic tariff law quickly because it is unscientific, an unscientific, horizontal, reduction all along the line, and let it go at that. That is Democratic, but when the Republicans pass a tariff bill it is scientific; they go to the bottom of the subject and fix the rates on the principle that the Republican Party advocates—protection to our industries and to our American labor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The House passed a bill referred to by the gentleman from North Carolina, the glass bill. There are at least 50,000 American laborers employed in the glass mills of this country affected by that bill. A little popgun, air-gun, squirt-gun bill!

Then there was the pearl-button industry bill, a little insignificant bill; oh, so small, which the gentleman from North Carolina could see only with a microscope, with 20,000 or 30,000 American laboring men employed in the industry affecting a $20,000,000 annual product in this country, with about that many million dollars invested. A little insignificant squirt-gun, popgun bill, in the estimation of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Zinc ore, another little bit of a squirt-gun, popgun bill! To the people down in Missouri and southwestern Wisconsin, it is of considerable importance, where thousands of men are employed but are now out of employment because the little popgun, squirt-gun, air-gun Underwood bill put them out of business. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] We propose by the bill we have passed through the House to put them back into business. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Tungsten ore, another little squirt-gun, popgun bill! This industry employs about 5,000 men directly in the tungsten mines. When the armistice was signed—and it was strictly a war industry, producing a metal absolutely necessary in the manufacture of steel and other metals so badly needed in the war. In a little town out in Colorado, where there were 1,500 men employed and 9,000 people in the town, built up since we entered the war in 1917, the homes are absolutely abandoned and the mines filled with water. Why? Because these industries are not protected against foreign importation of tungsten. Yet this tungsten bill in the judgment of some gentlemen is a little insignificant popgun bill, and the Republicans are fooling away time in passing such bills! Nine thousand people abandoned their homes and gone because they needed protection that will be given them if that tungsten bill becomes a law!

Now as to the magnesite bill before the House. About the same number of people were employed in producing magnesite in this country when the armistice was signed as were employed in the tungsten industry. Some mines are running yet because the War Trade Board has the power to put an embargo upon the importation of mangnesite. Magnesite has remained at a price where it is profitable for those engaged in the industry, operating with the most modern machinery, to operate their mines today. It is a new industry. Magnesite and tungsten are used in every steel mill and every smelting works in this country, with more than 1,000,000 American laboring men employed. Yet it is a little squirt-gun, popgun, air-gun bill, so the gentleman claims, and Congress is fooling away its time protecting an industry of that importance—protecting it against what? We, the Republican Party, propose to protect the magnesite industry in this country against the magnesite mines of Austria and Greece. The great bulk of the magnesite of the world is in Austria. Enough magnesite has been developed in this country since the declaration of war on the part of the United States to supply the world for 25 years, and we have only scratched the surface of the earth. And yet it is only a little insignificant popgun bill, a waste of time! I wonder that the House has the patience to fool away time on such bills, if the gentleman from North Carolina is correct.

Magnesite and tungsten are used in the manufacture of steel and other metals so essential in time of war. Four million American boys dressed in uniform to go to the front to defend North Carolina and South Carolina and the other States in the Union, praying to God to send them more guns and ammunition, and we could not get magnesite and tungsten from Austria and Hungary. Where must we look for it—a very essential material to supply our beloved boys then in the trenches (and fighting a well-equipped and well-trained enemy), begging us for God's sake to send more guns and ammunition to their support?

Oh, who will say an insignificant industry? Two million of our boys over there, facing the German and Austrian hordes, who were well equipped, and yet the gentleman will say that magnesite, a very essential industry in this country to supply our boys who were begging for these supplies, is a popgun industry.

Now, then, gentlemen, if this industry must fail because of your votes against it, and we should engage in another war—and, by the way, under the prospects of a league of nations our boys are now being sent to Europe to fight the battles of that country when the war which they enlisted for long since stopped—suppose, I say, we should become engaged in another war in the very near future, and those mines are closed because we failed to give them proper protection, what will be the result? Who will be to blame for it, you or I? I do not care where the industry is located, whether it is, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] said, "away off out yonder in the State of Washington" or on the coast in California or whether it be away down yonder in the State of Florida or in northeastern Maine or wherever it may be, it is my duty and it is your duty, it is the duty of every man who is sent here, to protect American labor and American capital wherever it may be located in the United States. [Applause.] No man will ever have cause to accuse me of ever discriminating against an industry of this country because of its location—north, south, east, or west.

Dyestuffs is another great industry. All that you gentlemen need to do to convince yourselves that the dyestuffs bill, so far as protection is concerned, is justifiable, is to read the report of the Alien Property Custodian, Mr. Palmer, now the United States Attorney General, which he made in January last, wherein he points out the necessity for protection to the chemical industries of this country and shows plainly that Germany used every means within her power to prevent us from the establishment of chemical industries in this country by bringing her products here and selling them at ruinous prices, far below cost, and putting out of business every American dollar that engaged in that business before the war. Read that report, and if that does not convince you that this industry needs protection, should be protected, must be protected, then there is nothing that will convince you. I commend that report to you for your consideration, my Democratic friends, because Mr. Palmer is a good Democrat, for through that report you may see the light of day.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. I understand from the gentleman's statement that this has been for the last two years a war necessity, a war material.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. And if there was not some protection between the product abroad and at home, those here who are producing it now, who were advised and encouraged, in fact requested, to produce it in this country, would have to go out of business. Is that about right?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, absolutely.

Mr. RAKER. Then, if any difficulty should occur in the United States between us and any foreign country where this material is produced, we would be at the mercy of those people to furnish it to us.

Mr. FORDNEY. Absolutely, as we were when we went into this war. We did not then produce magnesite, and I am very glad that the gentleman has asked me that question, because it brings me to the point. When we entered this war there was but one institution in this country producing magnesite, and when the Tariff Commission made its report a few weeks ago there were 65 industries engaged in the manufacture or production of magnesite. The consumption of magnesite in the whole world amounts to about 500,000 tons annually. During the year 1917 there was produced in the United States 316,000 tons of magnesite. Our annual consumption has been from 60 to 70 per cent of the total production of the world. Therefore in 1917 we produced as much as we ever used in any one year in this country prior to the war, demonstrating clearly that we are in position now not only to supply ourselves with the necessary magnesite used in this country, but that we are getting in position to supply other countries of the world, if we can compete with the prices of other countries.

Mr. RAKER. I voted for the Tariff Commission and thought I was doing right then and believe so now. What I want to know is whether the Tariff Commission ever investigated and reported their testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means, to the effect that there should be some protection given to this industry in this country.

Mr. FORDNEY. The Tariff Commission is made up, in my opinion, of high-class gentlemen. They are all splendid men. I know some of them personally. I think they are strictly fair and honest in all their reports. They attempt in no instance to recommend what the Congress of the United States shall do, but they find the facts and present them to the Ways and Means Committee of the House. They had no money to print their reports, and they came to us and said, "We will furnish you the data if you will do the printing; we have no money to do the printing," and by order and by resolution we obtained, the committee obtained, the money to do that printing; we printed their reports and they are in the hearings, and the information given by them shows the amount of difference in cost of the production of magnesite in this country and abroad, and their report is the best of evidence that the rates of duty as now recommended in this bill are not adequate to give a sufficient amount of protection to offset the difference between the present cost of production in this country and abroad.

Mr. RAKER. The one the gentleman alludes to is the amended bill of the committee?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, reduces the rates from a cent and a quarter per pound to three-quarters of 1 per cent.

Mr. RAKER. Is it the gentleman's opinion that the bill before the House with the suggested amendments provides sufficient to give these people a chance?

Mr. FORDNEY. It is barely adequate to protect the industry, especially under present conditions. The lowest estimate for the cost of production of dead-burned magnesite in this country is shown by the Northwest Magnesite Co. as $21.07 per ton at the mines in the States of Washington and California. The freight per ton of magnesite from those mines to the Atlantic coast, dead-burned magnesite, used in making magnesite brick, is $16.15 per ton. The average cost of production, the Tariff Commission shows, is $25.13 per ton at the mines, the maximum cost of production being $28.43 per ton.

But, as before stated, the average of $25.13 is the cost of production at the mines. Adding to that $16.15 freight makes $41.28 delivered in the East in competition with imported magnesite. That is the actual cost shown by the Tariff Commission and producers.

Mr. RAKER. One other question: That rate will not make it a prohibitory rate, so that the other magnesite may not be shipped to this country?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no, let me say to the gentleman. I want to point out to the gentleman and Members of the House what an insignificant additional charge that amounts to per ton of steel if all the duty provided for in this bill, $15 per ton, were added to the cost to the consumer of steel. Three and three-quarter cents per ton, which is a little more than a 3-cent postage stamp, on a ton of steel is the additional cost if all the cost is added to the cost of production, I say. Now, let me go a little further and show how insignificant that additional cost is to the consumer, and I do not believe any man, Democrat or Republican, can vote against these rates because of the additional cost to the consumer when I give you this illustration. Suppose this additional duty is added to the cost to the ultimate consumer of steel, say a mechanic, a carpenter, for a saw or a hammer or a plane bit or chisel, such tools as the mechanic uses. He would have to use 500 pounds of such tools before the cost to him would be 1 cent, and the average carpenter does not use 500 pounds of steel in tools in all his natural life. The laboring man pays a 3-cent tax on a glass of soda water, yet the gentleman from North Carolina does not want the steel companies to pay 3 cents per ton of steel which this tariff would impose upon them. One cent additional cost for 500 pounds of steel is all this bill provides for if all this cost is added to the cost of the production of steel.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, as I understand it, the gentleman contends that these measures are not popgun measures?

Mr. FORDNEY. Absolutely, no; they affect our most important industries.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is improper for a Member of the House to take issue with a definite fixed opinion expressed by a United States Senator from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point of order is overruled.

Mr. RAKER. One more question and then I am through. What is the approximate amount of revenue that we will obtain by virtue of this legislation?

Mr. FORDNEY. Why, my good friend, it would depend, of course, upon the amount of magnesite imported.

Mr. RAKER. I know.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, I think the gentleman is going to vote with me, and I want to agree with him and treat him nicely. The gentleman is from California and my friend.

Mr. RAKER. I am seeking information.

Mr. FORDNEY. And magnesite is produced in your district.

Mr. RAKER. But I am seeking information.

Mr. FORDNEY. I know the gentleman is and here is the place to get it. You come to the right source to get it. It would depend absolutely upon the amount of magnesite imported from abroad, the number of tons. Now, if we imported all the magnesite we used, and we use 300,000 tons a year, you can figure about half this amount to be dead-burned or calcined, and at $15 a ton would be $2,250,000 if we imported all of it. If this bill becomes a law I promise my good friend that the mines in his district in California will run and will furnish magnesite to our people of this country, if this bill becomes a law as it is now written——

Mr. RAKER. Well, it is a war measure.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is absolutely a war measure, and a good Democrat can afford to vote for it, and I know the gentleman is a good Democrat.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. PURNELL. I am very much interested in what the gentleman is now saying, and really his discussion has answered a number of questions I wanted to put to him. There is a large concern, perhaps the largest one in my district, the user of magnesite. I have had considerable correspondence with that concern about this very bill, and I would like to know what the gentleman has got to say with reference to the statement made by them to me that the local production of magnesite is greatly inferior to that produced abroad.

Mr. FORDNEY. All the party that wrote the gentleman that letter has got to do is to read the reports of the Tariff Commission, the Bureau of Mines, and the Geological Survey, and read the testimony or hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, which will show him that there is no magnesite produced in the world superior to that which is produced in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. COADY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. COADY. I want to say to the gentleman that I received quite a number of telegrams and letters from magnesite-brick manufacturers, both in Maryland and in eastern Pennsylvania, to the effect that the passage of this bill will put them out of business, confiscate their property, which would not be fitted for the manufacture of any other brick but magnesite brick, and throw out of employment hundreds of men.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will answer the gentleman. The American Refractories Co., of which Mr. Allen is vice president, who appeared before our committee, is one of the owners of a magnesite mine in Austria, and he states that he and his associates have $2,000,000 invested over there. That was the only opposition to this bill except some people who are manufacturers of steel, and when the facts were known those steel men were induced to come here and protest against the passage of this bill through the influence of manufacturers of magnesite brick.

Now, the gentleman, Mr. Allen, is incorrect when he says that if this bill passes that will be the result. I am not referring to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COADY]. Whoever wrote to you misinformed you. Mr. Allen testified before the committee that he had sold Austrian magnesite, delivered at Philadelphia, dead-burned magnesite, for $15.75 per ton. It can not be produced for that sum in this country, and if we do not give adequate protection magnesite will not be produced here, and the magnesite will come from abroad, as it did before the war from Austria.

I say there is no opposition to this bill except from the men who make magnesite brick. Now, let me tell you what protection they have in existing laws. It was shown that magnesite brick were selling a few weeks ago for $450 per thousand. It requires five tons of burned magnesite to make one thousand magnesite brick; $450 a thousand, then, is a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem on imported magnesite brick; and it was stated before our committee by Mr. Allen that not a brick had been imported into this country for 20 years or more. Why? Because of the adequate protection given to the manufacturers of magnesite brick in this country.

Now they—the brick manufacturers—are asking for free trade on their raw material, which is burned magnesite, not only because it is their raw material, but it is also because they are the owners of extensive magnesite mines in Austria, and they do not want to be deprived of the right to import free of duty their Austrian magnesite.

Now, gentlemen, the protection given here is $75 on enough burned magnesite to make a thousand brick, and the magnesite-brick manufacturers have a monopoly. They say so. They say the protection afforded them does not permit of the importation of any magnesite brick. Therefore when they are asking for protection on their finished product and demanding free trade on their raw material, they are inconsistent, no matter to what political party they belong.

Mr. COADY. Is the gentleman in a position to state which of these industries employs the greater number of men or has the greater amount of capital invested?

Mr. FORDNEY. Just which industries do you refer to?

Mr. COADY. The owners of the mines or the brick manufacturers in the East.

Mr. FORDNEY. I rather think the manufacturers of dead-burned magnesite have more employees, perhaps, than the people who produce the brick.

Mr. COADY. And more capital invested?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not remember as to that. I do not think they have. I can not answer accurately on that, and therefore I will not attempt to say what is the amount of capital invested in the brick factories.

Mr. COADY. But the passage of this law will affect a greater number of men?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, I am in favor of the enactment of this bill. They—the brick men—complain because the Tariff Commission did not go to them for information. I am going to read a letter from the American Refractories Co., and a reply by Mr. Page, vice chairman of the Tariff Commission. The magnesite-brick manufacturers complain because a representative of the Tariff Commission came before our committee and gave the cost of production at the mines in this country and did not go to the brick manufacturers for such information. Why, in the name of goodness, was it necessary for the Tariff Commission to go to the brick manufacturers to find out what it costs to produce dead-burned magnesite in the State of California or in the State of Washington?

Mr. COADY. The gentleman will pardon me; but does the gentleman think that the mere charge that it will put them out of business is correct?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, their opposition is absolutely selfish, because of their interest in the magnesite mines in Austria. If these tariff rates are put into effect it will not cripple the brick industry in the United States at all. And if I am called upon to protect capital in two places, American capital invested in the United States, employing all American labor, or American capital invested in Austria, employing foreign labor, it is my duty, as I see it, to protect the home industry first of all, whether or not it injures the other capital invested abroad. [Applause.]

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I believe my colleague has stated that we have an unlimited quantity in sight?

Mr. FORDNEY. The Tariff Commission, the Bureau of Mines, and the Geological Survey show that we have enough raw material in the United States right now in sight to furnish 300,000 tons of dead-burned magnesite per year for from 25 to 30 years.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Are the miners interested in destroying the men who use their product? Do they want to drive them out of business? Do they want them to stay in business?

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend, there is one great trouble about magnesite mines in this country. They are located in the West, and the center of consumption is east of the Mississippi River, and the high cost of freight from the Pacific coast east is of great concern to the magnesite producers in this country. That is one of the great obstacles to overcome, but there is a higher rate charged upon burned magnesite per ton from the Pacific coast east than is charged on many other products, and especially if they are imported articles from the Orient. An advantage has been given in the rates fixed by the Director General of Railroads on nearly all imported goods from the Orient as against the domestic manufactures; up to and as great as 60 per cent reduction on freight rates on some imported articles, as compared with domestic-made products of like character.

Let me say to the gentleman from California that on a carload of wool from San Francisco or any other Pacific-coast port to Boston, the wool market of the United States, the freight is $500 a car on a 20-ton carload of wool, plus 3 per cent internal-revenue tax, or $15, a total of $515 on a carload of wool if imported; but on a carload of the domestic wool produced in Nevada, Utah, or Wyoming the freight is $1,119.70 for the same number of tons, almost exactly double the freight, for a haul of 500 to 800 miles shorter than the imported wool from coast ports. And what is true of wool is true of pretty nearly everything else named in the order. There are 483 items of freight on which there is a reduction of freight on the imported article, lower rates given than on the domestic article.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion right there with reference to the interrogatory as to whether this bill will put the brickmakers out of business, the gentleman is quite correct in saying that the brickmakers over in Austria will be put out of business but not in the United States.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is correct.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The brickmakers of this country imported something over 14,000 tons, and the rate they paid for it was something like $43 a ton. The present prices will not be increased by this bill over what they have been paying.

Mr. FORDNEY. The American brickmaker will not be hurt at all by this bill; only the Austrian mines will be hurt.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They will pay just the same as they paid before. They will have just as much chance to make money as they had before in the brickmaking business.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and our hope and belief is that if we give adequate protection to the magnesite industry in this country, in due time the price of magnesite will be reduced, and all the magnesite necessary to furnish our industries which use magnesite brick will be produced in this country. But there is grave fear, I will say to you, of putting out of commission by the passage of this bill the owners of magnesite mines over in Austria. Do not forget that, please.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. While the gentleman's statement is correct as to the extra freight charged from San Francisco to Boston on the domestic article over and above that charged on the imported article, we took it up about six months ago in regard to rice produced in the Sacramento Valley and the rice that was imported, and the Railroad Administration advised us that they would change that and make the rate on both the same. Have not the other articles also been changed by the Railroad Administration?

Mr. FORDNEY. The last order that went out was on the 29th day of May, when the Director General of Railroads lowered the rates of freight on 483 imported articles, but made no change, no reduction whatever, on the domestically produced articles.

Mr. RAKER. Is that differential still in force?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is still in effect, and from New Orleans to points in Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee on certain articles, not on all but on two things which I can remember, the freight is 26½ cents per hundred pounds for the domestic-made article and 16½ cents per hundred pounds on the same article if imported, which is an absolute discrimination against the American-made article. Yesterday there were two very intelligent railroad men in my office, men for whom I have the highest regard, and I asked them why this was so, and they frankly stated that they did not know. It is done, however. I asked them if they could justify a higher rate for a short haul than for a long haul, and they admitted they could not and no man alive could, but they knew that those discriminations were in existence. Oh, gentlemen, this is a matter of great importance to us all and should be corrected.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Is it foreign influence on the rate makers which has produced this discrimination?

Mr. FORDNEY. I asked a representative of the Railroad Administration who it was that was asking for these reduced rates, and he said it was the importers. I asked him, "What did the domestic producer have to say about it?" He replied, "I don't know, sir. We did not consult him. But," he said, "the domestic producer is not injured, because we did not change his rate." I answered, "Why, good Lord, man, you do injure him, because you give his foreign competitor a better rate than you give him. Therefore you greatly injure him and assist in putting him out of business." Gentlemen, those are the rates.

Now, let me give you some concrete facts about this industry.

The commercial value and importance of magnesite is due to its unusual quality of resistance of great heat without fusion, and fully 90 per cent is used for refractory purposes, principally for the lining of open-hearth steel furnaces, electric furnaces, and in copper and lead furnaces.

The mineral magnesite contains carbon and oxygen and magnesium, the chemical symbol being "$MgCO_3$." When calcined or burned the carbon is driven off with some of the oxygen as carbon dioxide, "CO_2," leaving the oxide of magnesium, "MgO," which is known in the trade as burned magnesite, which unquestionably is the best-known material for furnace linings.

Magnesite is also mixed with various substances and used in the form of a cement in the plastic-flooring trade. It sets quickly and produces very satisfactory results. About 10 per cent of the domestic consumption is used in the flooring trade.

Like graphite, there are two forms of magnesite—crystalline and amorphous. Crystalline magnesite has long been considered the best available material for furnace bottoms. Before the war it came from Austria, but during the war important supplies were developed in the State of Washington. Magnesite is strictly a key industry, and its great importance to America's industrial independence was most strongly impressed upon us by the recent World War.

The most important deposits of magnesite in the world, outside of the United States, are in Austria and Greece. The Austrian material, as above stated, is crystalline, and in this respect is comparable with that of Stevens County, Wash. The Grecian material is amorphous and resembles that of California.

According to the testimony of Dr. Manning, of the Bureau of Mines, the world's consumption of magnesite is 500,000 tons annually, of which the United States consumes 70 per cent. Before the war approximately 96 per cent of the material used in the United States was imported, and 95 per cent of the imports came from Austria.

The amount of magnesite used per ton of steel is estimated by Dr. Manning to be from 3 to 7 pounds and to average 5 pounds. Dr. Manning gives the cost of magnesite brick during the spring of this year as $450 per thousand, or $90 per ton, indicating that magnesite brick weigh 5 ton per thousand. The recent price of grain magnesite is given as from $46 to $48 per ton in Pittsburgh and Chester, Pa. Five pounds of grain magnesite would cost about 12½ cents, while that amount of brick would cost about 17 cents. Therefore the value of magnesite per ton of steel is somewhere between 12½ and 17 cents. With better methods of production, which the domestic producers claim are being worked out, the cost will be reduced.

If the entire duty proposed by the bill in question—three-fourths of a cent per pound on dead-burned magnesite—is added to the cost, and experience tells us that such will not be the case, the added cost per ton of steel would be 3¾ cents. Above all things, American industries in an important matter of this character want a dependable source of supply. That source of supply should be in America. The cost is infinitesimal comment. The opposition to the bill is from the people who have money invested in Austrian magnesite. The shortage of magnesite was embarrassing to America during the war. The shortage forced prices to abnormal levels. This legislation is a matter of national welfare and defense. Let us now look to the encouraging of the domestic industry fostered during the war and avoid the possibility of embarrassment to the Nation at some future date.

The competition of Austria is now at hand. According to a letter I received from the Department of Commerce, 900 tons of Austrian magnesite arrived at a port in New York during the month of August, 1919. A letter from the Shipping Board, also received in to-day's mail, indicates that space in ships returning from European ports will be available for the shipment of magnesite. I now read three letters bearing on this subject:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE,
Washington, September 27, 1919.

Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, City.

DEAR MR. FORDNEY: With further reference to your inquiry regarding imports of magnesite, I take pleasure in advising you that during the month of August 324 tons of Austrian magnesite were entered at the port of New York. In addition, 591 tons of Austrian magnesite arrived in New York on August 25, but the entry was not completed during August and the statistics will be included in the September statement of imports. The Bureau of Customs Statistics at New York has made an examination of the manifests of vessels arriving from Austria during the first 25 days of September and has been unable to locate any shipments of magnesite.

Very truly, yours,

R. S. MACELWEE,
Assistant Director.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, D. C., September 27, 1919.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Referring to my letter to you of yesterday relative to a shipment of magnesite from an Adriatic or Black Sea port to the United States, I am advised by the department of shipping trades, United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, as follows:

"The only record we have at present time was an offer of several months ago for 500 tons magnesite from Trieste to Philadelphia or Baltimore for American Refractories Co., from Pittsburgh, but my understanding was that, on account of not being able to complete their financial arrangements, that the amount offered was cut down or later canceled. The steamship Fort Pitt Bridge was named some time in June to handle this cargo on a return trip from Black Sea port. The manifest for this trip now shows that the ship handled 1,300 tons manganese, at $20 per ton, consigned to the National City Bank of New York, being discharged at Philadelphia."

It is not known in this office if magnesite and manganese ore are one and the same material. However, ships are dispatched to the European ports in question, and space for the shipment of this material would be available on most of ships returning from there.

If I can be of any further assistance to you, please command.

Respectfully, yours,

H. E. MANGHUNS,
Examiner, Division of Regulations.

Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee,
House of Representatives, City.

On April 27, 1918, during the discussion of the bill introduced by Mr. Foster—H. R. 11259, "A bill to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply," which proposed a licensing system, Secretary Franklin K. Lane, of the Department of the Interior, wrote a letter to Speaker CLARK, as follows (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 5713, vol. 56, pt. 6, 65th Cong., 2d sess.):

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., April 27, 1918.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: The Foster bill, which is now before you, seems to me one that should receive the support of those who wish to see this country made as self-sufficient as possible at this time. Why should we use ships to bring minerals to America which are to be found here, but which have not been developed because of the cheapness with which they heretofore have been produced in distant countries? This is the insistent question which seems to me to fully justify this measure. And no one knows what dangers we may run as to our supplies being cut off. This seems to me a wise measure—it may be a vital measure—and I hope for its early passage.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

HAS THE NORTHWEST MAGNESITE CO. A MONOPOLY?

Government reports show that in 1917 65 mines produced 316,000 tons. Northwest Magnesite Co. in 1917 produced 60,000 tons, or only 19 per cent of total production.

Government reports for 1918 show total production of 211,000 tons. Northwest Magnesite Co. produced 80,000 tons in that year, or only 35 per cent of total production.

The State of California in 1917–1918 produced a greater amount than mines in State of Washington.

OWNERSHIP OF AMERICAN MINES.

Government reports show 8,000,000 tons proven magnesite in United States.

Northwest Magnesite Co. owns only 1,000,000 tons, or 12½ per cent of available magnesite. Eighty-seven and one-half per cent, or 7,000,000 tons, owned and controlled by 64 mines in California and Washington, according to Government reports, in none of which has Northwest Magnesite Co. any stock or other financial interest.

A company which only owns 12½ per cent of supply and never produced more than 35 per cent of total United States production can not be a monopoly.

AUSTRIAN MONOPOLY.

Hearing, page 21, under Sources of supply, shows Austrian production in control of three companies: (1) Carl Spater, Coblenz, Germany; (2) General Refractories Co., an American company, with mines in Hungary; (3) the American Refractories Co., an American company, with mines in Austria.

These companies have enjoyed world monopoly of refractory magnesite, and this world monopoly makes United States dependent upon Austria if American mines are unable to operate.

QUALITY OF AMERICAN MAGNESITE.

Hearing, part 2, pages 214–215. Letter from Harbison-Walker Refractories Co., largest users of magnesite in United States, introduced in testimony of Bureau of Mines, states: "As to the quality of the Washington magnesite in comparison with the Austrian magnesite, we have substituted it for the Austrian materials for every purpose for which we have used or sold the Austrian magnesite, either in the manufacture of steel, copper, or other metals. We believe it is impossible to make an exact comparison between the Washington and the Austrian magnesite, and can see no conclusive evidence that the Washington is inferior to the Austrian. Some of the largest consumers of magnesite for steel making have told us that the Washington magnesite as now produced is as good as the Austrian. Records made during the past few years can not be absolutely relied upon unless it is known precisely what material was used in the manufacture. Brick have only been manufactured exclusively from Washington magnesite since the middle of 1918, and there were considerable stocks of older material on hand to be worked up."

Prior to the war no magnesite was mined in the United States for refractory purposes.

It was necessary to learn how to make an article the equivalent of that produced in Austria, which had been in the industry since 1888.

Not until 1918 was problem of making American magnesite equal to Austrian solved.

Since then material is equal or superior to Austrian.

Northwest Magnesite Co. spent a million dollars to solve this question when country demanded magnesite for war and now should not be penalized for its efficiency.

PRESENT PRODUCTION.

All mines were shut down at time of hearing.

Since hearing only Northwest Magnesite Co. operating, as it was the only property to receive orders large enough to reopen mine.

All other properties awaiting outcome of tariff to build plants as efficient as that of the Northwest Co. to treat their ore.

Austrian magnesite now being imported; and what American mine would make capital investment to build improved facilities unless tariff given?

NORTHWEST MAGNESITE CO. COSTS.

Sworn statements show average cost American producers $25 and that Northwest Co. produced for $21. Method of depletion and depreciation accounts shown to be in accordance with Treasury Department instructions.

American Refractories Co.:

1. Claimed costs excessive by innuendo. They used proposition of Refractory Co. to Northwest Co. to buy their property, which proposition was refused, as basis of calculating Northwest costs. This is too absurd for argument.

2. Used supposed information of one of their laborers, employed by Northwest Co., to calculate costs. This laborer never had access to records.

3. Claimed manager of Northwest Co. stated material could be made for $13,000. This statement referred to operating expenses, not to his total costs, which he has sworn were $21.

4. Claimed Northwest Co. had contract which would have compelled them to have sold for less than sworn costs. There was clause in contract that gave opportunity to cancel contract if selling price was below cost, and when this contract was made no material had ever been produced and cost was unknown. The Magnesite Co. gave Refractories Co. the right to make selling price, with moral understanding that Refractories Co. would not sell material at a price to cause the mine a loss. Contract was canceled when Refractories Co. endeavored to sell for less amount than mine could afford to sell for.

COST OF MAGNESITE PER TON OF STEEL.

Five pounds of dead-burned magnesite is average used in making open-hearth high-grade steel. Tariff of three-fourths cent per pound will therefore only increase cost per ton of steel 3¾ cents. This is so trivial that no steel company would oppose this tariff on account of excessive increase in their cost of production.

NATIONAL POLICY.

Steel companies should desire this material produced in United States at increase to them of only 3¾ cents per ton of steel, if only as a matter of insurance that, in the chaotic condition of the world, they may have a sure supply of this essential material.

PLASTIC MAGNESITE—CEMENT.

Any objection to the tariff by oxychloride-cement manufacturers, who use magnesite in making flooring, will be due to the fact that they thought a $25 tariff was to be put upon this material, and that this $25 a ton would be added by the American miners to the cost per ton. The flooring manufacturers are at present enjoying a good business at the present prices, and the idea of putting a tariff on magnesite is to permit the operations of the American mines so that they can sell at the present prices. The tariff is to equalize the cost between Austria and the United States, and if the American manufacturers should increase their present selling price the plastic people would buy from Austria.

Less than 10 per cent of the imports of magnesite are used in the plastic trade. Page 19 of hearings shows that in 1912 only 114 tons were imported from Greece out of a total of 103,000, and that in 1913 only 1,605 tons were imported out of a total of 172,000 tons. This makes it apparent that the amount of imports used for flooring is so insignificant as not to be a factor in defeating legislation intended to protect over 90 per cent of the production of a war essential mineral. The flooring people have admitted it would be to their advantage to have an American industry developed and felt a $10 tariff would be sufficient. If the proper tariff is placed on magnesite, American mines can furnish all the material required of the same quality as previously imported.

TARIFF WILL REDUCE COSTS.

A tariff will stimulate research and the endeavor to produce magnesite cheaper than at present, rather than to have any effect of increasing present costs. This applies to both plastic used for cement and to refractory magnesite.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I merely want to say with respect to the bill to which Secretary Lane refers that it was rushed through the House under a special rule, with the view of supplying the country with the needed special ores referred to at that time.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and you and I voted for it, as everybody in the House did.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Irrespective of what you may call it, that kind of legislation ought to be enacted, and it ought to continue to be enacted as long as war materials are needed.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Then what is the use of camouflaging about it?

Mr. FORDNEY. What is the use of talking about its being "popgun, squirt-gun, air-gun tariff bills"? It is essential to the welfare of 100,000,000 people, and if we ever have a war we could not succeed without the raw material so absolutely necessary.

Mr. Allen, of the Refractories Co., wrote a letter to the Tariff Commission complaining very bitterly because Mr. G. C. Riddell, who is connected with the commission, appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and gave information as to the cost of production of magnesite in this country. He criticized Mr. Riddell sarcastically, and said about the Tariff Commission in so many words, "If this is your policy to foster some particular industry without seeking further information than was done in this case the purpose for which you were created fails."

Mr. Riddell writes to the chairman of the Tariff Commission a letter explaining exactly what he did and what he said before our committee, and Mr. Page, the chairman, sends me the original letter from Mr. Riddell, together with a copy of Mr. Allen's letter. I want to ask gentlemen of the House a question. Mr. Allen complains because Mr. Riddell pointed out the cost of production.

He went to the producers of magnesite—not to the manufacturers of magnesite brick, who never produced a pound of magnesite in this country, but he went to the Bureau of Mines and to the Geological Survey for some of his information long before the Committee on Ways and Means gave a hearing on this bill. He comes back and points out to Mr. Allen that Mr. Allen is in error when he criticizes him, Mr. Riddell. I, too, want to say that Mr. Allen stepped out of his way to make statements about Mr. Riddell's testimony before our committee which are not correct.

Now, I want to ask you if you think for a minute that Mr. Allen, vice president of the Austrian magnesite mines, vice president of the American Magnesite Brick Co., would have complained if Mr. Riddell had criticized the producers of magnesite and lauded to the skies Mr. Allen's mines over in Austria? Oh, no. Mr. Allen is selfish, absolutely selfish; went out of his way to criticize an honest man for giving valuable information to Congress that we may act wisely. He gave such information as is correct, no matter whose industry it hit or benefited, no matter whose industry it discriminated against. I assure you that the Tariff Commission did not discriminate against the American institution. They are Americans, Democrats, high-grade gentlemen, honorable, fair, unbiased in their statements. I will put in the RECORD the information given by both.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Washington, October 1, 1919.

DEAR MR. FORDNEY: It would appear from the discussion of September 30 on magnesite bill No. 5218 on the floor of the House that the opponents of the measure intend to discuss at some length a brief by Mr. Burke, submitted during the tariff hearings before the Ways and Means Committee in which he endeavored to establish the fact that certain Tariff Commission testimony was of a prejudiced nature unduly favoring the American producers.

In order that you may have as full information on this matter as we can give, I am inclosing a copy of a letter of July 30 received on this subject from the American Refractories Co. and Mr. Riddell's reply of August 12 to the points raised. These you may find useful in the course of the coming discussion of this measure.

Yours, very truly,

THOMAS WALKER PAGE,
Acting Chairman.

CHICAGO, ILL., July 30, 1919.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Mr. WILLIAM M. STEUART, Secretary, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I herewith acknowledge receipt of your letter of July 7, which I find on my return home to-day.

I wish to call the Tariff Commission's attention to the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means as regards bill H. R. 5218, and held June 16 and 17.

I wish that the Tariff Commission would read carefully the testimony of your Mr. Guy C. Riddell, set forth on pages 9, 51, 100, 106, 133, and 143 of the printed report.

While Mr. Riddell was so busy in getting the costs from the other manufacturers, we would like to know why he never even asked us for the costs from our European works or our American operations in California and Harper, Ohio.

At these hearings, at which Mr. Riddell was in attendance virtually all the time, one would think that he held a brief from the Northwest Magnesite Co., and as we know that the Tariff Commission represents all citizens of the United States, we can not help but feel that the actions of Mr. Riddell in this particular hearing will have a tendency to show that the Tariff Commission is not getting out all the facts on different subjects if Mr. Riddell's work is representative of the commission's efforts.

It came out in this hearing that Mr. Riddell went over the commission's report with Mr. Thayne, of the Northwest Magnesite Co., and we would have only been too glad to give him all the information possible if he had even approached us. Why was it, with our knowledge of the magnesite business both here and abroad, we were kept in the dark in respect to Mr. Riddell's activities or object?

Upon the writer asking him why he did not take this matter up with us, he advised us that he had done so in a letter.

We flatly contradicted him on this statement, and his later excuse was that he had taken up the question of chrome ore with us, and as we had not replied to this letter concerning chrome ore, he thought we would not be interested in magnesite; and we can only leave to your imagination as to what one must think of such an answer on the part of any representative of the Tariff Commission.

Mr. Riddell's pronounced activities, in the interest of the Northwest Magnesite Co., was such that we think that his actions deserve the closest investigation by your commission, if you expect the commission to be above criticism.

If you will read the testimony, the Northwest Magnesite Co. shows a profit of $275,000 on a production of 15,000 tons, which would be $18.33 per ton, which, deducted from the selling price of $32, would leave $13.67 per net ton as the cost; and you can compare this to the statements as made by Mr. Riddell, who apparently was only too willing to give figures handed him by the Northwest Magnesite Co. and act under their instructions.

Feeling the way we do as regards Mr. Riddell's actions, and having been a great believer in a Tariff Commission, we do not want to change our minds until we know to what extent the commission is going to stand for such work as that of Mr. Riddell in this magnesite hearing.

So awaiting your advice, we remain,

Yours, very truly,

AMERICAN REFRACTORIES CO.,
(Signed) E. M. ALLEN, Vice President.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Washington, August 12, 1919.

Mr. THOMAS W. PAGE,
Chairman United States Tariff Commission.

DEAR SIR: In connection with Mr. E. M. Allen's letter of July 30 regarding hearings on the magnesite industry before the Committee on Ways and Means, I desire to comment as follows:

The testimony given on pages 9, 51, 100, 106, 123, and 143 of the printed report itself is perhaps the best and most conclusive reply to the various comments of Mr. Allen's letter. These are, to be sure, the very passages mentioned by Mr. Allen in criticizing the writer's position in presenting the magnesite situation before the committee; but I have gone over this testimony with the greatest care since the American Refractories Co.'s letter was handed me for explanation, and have recalled to mind the entire preparation of the report, and I earnestly urge the commission to apply its disinterested construction to the very testimony referred to in the various paragraphs of the letter.

Paragraph 4: "While Mr. Riddell was so busy in getting the costs from the other manufacturers": The testimony repeatedy shows (under cross-examination by Mr. KITCHIN, pp. 134 and 144) that costs were not solicited or obtained from any manufacturers for the Tariff Commission's report; that the latter was compiled from Government sources many weeks before the hearings. It happened that sworn statements from the six largest American properties came to the commission through the Western Magnesite Association, entirely of this latter body's initiative and long after the Tariff Commission's report had been compiled, and these cost statements were transmitted, as a matter of course, to the Ways and Means Committee at the hearing.

Paragraph 5: "At these hearings, at which Mr. Riddell was in attendance virtually all the time, one would think that he held a brief from the Northwest Magnesite Co., etc.": This suggestion is purely gratuitous. The testimony speaks for itself and should be carefully reviewed. There is nothing in the report that warrants this construction on the part of Mr. Allen. The writer's testimony at all times embraces a group of the six largest American producers, of which the Northwest Magnesite Co. is only one, and these six are mentioned as the direct result of a request (letter of May 29, p. 18 of hearing) addressed to the Tariff Commission by the Western Magnesite Association, over the signature of Roy M. Bishop, authorized representative of the association, who is also vice president of the Northwest Magnesite Co.

Paragraphs 6, 7, and 8: "It came out in this hearing that Mr. Riddell went over the commission's report with Mr. Thane, of the Northwest Co.," etc. The commission's practice of sending copies of its tentatively completed reports to two or three concerns in the industries for criticism is explained in the testimony on pages 133–134 and 143. All the available copies of this magnesite report were used up in April in its distribution to five parties:

George Otis Smith, Director Geological Survey.
W. C. Phalen, Bureau of Mines.
Tulare Mining Co.
American Mineral Production Co.
Northwest Magnesite Co.

While without funds for printing the reports, it was the custom of the commission to merely type four or five copies of each and send same to a sufficient number of well-informed persons. The conference with Mr. Thane was simply one of many conferences which, as a matter of course, have followed this custom. In the light of developments it is a matter of sincere regret to the writer that he did not utilize one of these reports to send to the American Refractories Co., taking for the purpose one of the two sent to the competing producers in the Washington field. The failure to do this was purely a matter of circumstances, coupled with the doubtless erroneous impression of the Refractories Co.'s indifference toward the commission's compiled information. This impression was due to the Refractories Co.'s attitude toward the commission's data on chromite. Two letters designed to enlist the Refractories Co.'s interest in our tariff survey were sent to this company. The first one, April 7, to Samuel H. Dolbear, American Refractories Co., San Francisco, was followed by a similar request, May 1, to the Pittsburgh office, upon receipt of Mr. Dolbear's suggestion that the matter should be referred to that part of their organization. As it has not been our practice or intention, and, in fact, at times is impossible, to refer prepared information for criticism to all parties; when the magnesite material was being reviewed the Refractories Co. was not further considered. The omission now occasions genuine regret, but the suspicion thereby engendered was not warranted, and it is needless to say that there was not the remotest intent on the part of the writer to "keep the American Refractories Co. in the dark." There were many other important companies—Harbison-Walker, Stowe-Fuller, and the consuming steel interests, etc.—that were not included in the mailing list. We could not hope to cover the industry until funds were available for the printing of the report in pamphlet form, which has been done later by the Ways and Means Committee.

The Refractories Co. at the hearing and since has insisted that too large a deduction was drawn from the chromite correspondence. On reviewing that correspondence the writer agrees with that criticism, but the conclusion was inadvertently reached. These letters were among scores sent out and received with reference to this and other industries shortly before the magnesite hearing, and the writer's verbal statement to Mr. Allen in the committee room was made while the hearing was in progress and under the hurried impression that the subject of our correspondence with his company had been magnesite. The writer sent to the commission office for the letter by messenger, so that it could be shown to Messrs. Allen and Mossman, and only when it was brought to the committee room later was the error realized—that it had been on the subject of chromite instead of magnesite. This mistake was promptly and publicly acknowledged; but even conceding it, there was no reason to doubt that the commission's material had been fairly and fully scrutinized by competent authorities.

Paragraph 10: "If you will read the testimony, the Northwest Magnesite Co. shows a profit of $275,000 on a production of 15,000 tons, which * * * would leave $13.67 per net ton as the cost, and you can compare this to the statement as made by Mr. Riddell, who apparently was only too willing to give figures handed him by the Northwest Co. and act under their instructions." This reference to the writer is also wholly unwarranted. The figures in the Tariff Commission's report quoted by the writer (p. 101 of hearing) were clearly shown (pp. 134 and 144 of hearing) to have been compiled some three weeks to two months before the sworn statements of the members of the Western Magnesite Association (including the Northwest Co.) were received by the commission. No figures were "handed" to the writer "by the Northwest Magnesite Co.," nor did the writer receive, much less follow, instructions from any other source than the Tariff Commission. The sworn costs of this company simply formed part of the exhibit of six statements which reached the commission through the agency of the Western Magnesite Association. The writer has not so far located the section of the testimony indicating the profit mentioned by Mr. Allen on the 15,000 tonnage mentioned and would be glad to have the exact page reference to this direct or indirect statement.

The writer wishes only to add an expression of his conviction that eventually the American Refractories Co., from its own careful consideration of the testimony, must conclude that there has never been the slightest intention on the part of the Tariff Commission or its representatives to evade, obscure, or in any way prejudicially present any statement of fact whatsoever.

Respectfully submitted.

G. C. RIDDELL.

Now, I want to call attention to one other important point. My good friends, I have much to say, and I am going to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting a document in the RECORD on this matter, because I want the information to go to the country as to the importance of this industry and the truth and correctness of it.

This Magnesite Brick Co. had upon the floor the other day a representative, a lawyer and a Republican. He appealed to the Members of this House, one by one—to the Republican Members of this House—to vote against this bill, while on the other side of the House a free trader, Mr. HEFLIN, of Alabama, sends a bill to the Ways and Means Committee asking for protection on graphite produced in Georgia and Alabama. Somebody has lost his equilibrium. I insist that Mr. HEFLIN is on a sound footing; he has by the introduction of that bill come out for protection at last; his eyes have been opened.

The man on this side who would have Republicans vote against a protective measure, to protect American capital and American labor, who would labor with Republicans, arguing with them to vote against the protection of our institutions, in the interest of Austrian institutions, he being a Republican lawyer, and of course as such having a perfect right to represent his clients, reminds me very much of an old-fashioned school-teacher out in Indiana, when I was a little boy and when my father was a member of the school board. I heard my father tell about it. A man came and was asking for a position from the school board as a teacher. One of the members of the board said to him—I think it was my father—"My good friend, what do you teach to your scholars? Do you teach that the world is round or flat?" He replied, "Oh, it does not make any difference to me; I will teach them whatever you wish me to."

I say to you, no matter how many appeals you have from the steel industries of this country, or from any other industry, you can not afford to vote against the protection of American labor and American capital, because if you vote against this bill you vote to sustain an Austrian industry, and Mr. Allen and his associates when put on the stand do not know whether they own that property to-day or not. When asked the question, they said they did not know. They owned it before the war, they said, but they did not know whether the Austrian Government had taken it away from them or not, but with the hope that he might get those mines back, if they had been taken away, he comes here and appeals to the Republicans to vote for free trade to protect his $2,000,000 invested in magnesite mines over in Austria. It was stated by one gentleman that he paid his labor over there—females 20 cents per day and males from 50 to 60 cents per day. He disputed this statement and said that he paid them $1.10 a day. What a wonderful wage, when the wages paid here in the magnesite mines average $4.50 for 8 hours per day, while the Austrians work 10, and some say they work as much as 11½ hours at 60 cents per day.

Mr. Chairman, I can not permit my conscience, whether the industry be in the South or North, to vote to protect an industry across the sea as against our own industries at home. I wish to present to the House a report made by an English committee relating to overseas trade, which will show us what we must expect from foreign trade, what we must meet, not only in magnesite, but in every other product that is produced in Europe.

I have here a letter which I received that is dated September 30, which the librarian was kind enough to send me. It is a document that he sent by special messenger because he thought it would be valuable information to Congress so that Congress may guard against this foreign competition that is certain to come soon. In it is contained the information that the English Government appointed a committee to work out some plan most effective to capture the overseas trade of the world. I will put it into the RECORD. It is a valuable document. There is a minority report by one member of that committee. Heretofore the English board of trade has looked after foreign trade, and now this committee in this report recommends that men be sent to the four corners of the earth to further overseas trade and that those men shall come under the supervision of the English consuls and other English representatives abroad, and that the English consuls and ambassadors shall report to the English board of trade, and that they are to go into every country in the world and advance the sale of English goods. They are hoping to capture the markets of the world. I want to read to you at this time just a portion of that report:

Apart from the above consideration, there is much to be said for retaining, at all events during the period of revival of trade, a department which has no duty other than that of fostering British trade overseas.

At the conclusion of my remarks I will insert the entire report.

Mr. RAKER. Might not it be a wise provision for this country to do the same thing?

Mr. FORDNEY. Absolutely.

Mr. RAKER. Particularly as we have loaned $10,000,000,000, and where we have surplus material, which we could send to these people, so that they may be able to pay their debts, when it will not affect the interests of America.

Mr. FORDNEY. My friends, we will buy much merchandise from people abroad, no matter what our tariff rates may be. We do not want to exclude the whole world from our markets. What we want to do is to protect our own industries so that the foreigner does not have an advantage over our people in our own markets. In the last fiscal year our importations were $3,095,000,000 in volume, the greatest amount of imports in the history of our country. Before the war we never imported as much as $2,000,000,000 worth in any one year. Of course the increased value of those imports boosts the volume of money value, but it is evident to you and to me that the importations are coming from abroad greater than ever before, and what we must look after now is the flood of foreign importations, because those people are without money, they are poor, they are in debt, and the only way in which they can get money is to produce goods at home and send them abroad to get money to pay their obligations. They are on the verge of bankruptcy over there. Great Britain, with a population of 45,000,000, has a public debt of nearly $40,000,000,000, practically one-half of the total value of all the property of Great Britain.

Germany's public debt to-day is over $40,000,000,000, and the wealth of Germany is about $80,000,000,000. In other words, the public debt of Germany to-day is from 52 to 55 per cent of her total wealth. But, my good friends, while our public debt to-day is very great, we have 100,000,000 people to pay this debt. We are the wealthiest people in the world, and our wealth as shown by the census of 1910 was $187,500,000,000. It is estimated to-day at $300,000,000,000, and if our public debt reaches a total of $30,000,000,000, which it will within the next 12 months, we owe but 10 per cent of our total wealth. It is a mere trifle after all. It is a big sum of money, but, after all, my friends, we are in the best condition as to our debts of any of the nations engaged in the European war——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has used one hour.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask unanimous consent that I may have 10 minutes more, and I assure you I will not occupy more than that time and I may not occupy all of the 10 minutes.

Mr. KEARNS. If the gentleman will permit, how long is this proceeding going to continue at this time?

Mr. FORDNEY. This concludes general debate and we are ready to read the bill; it is a very short bill.

Mr. KEARNS. Are we going to continue the reading of the bill to-night?

Mr. FORDNEY. I hardly think so; I think not. I think at the conclusion of my remarks I shall ask the committee to rise and we will take up the bill on Monday or some other day for its final disposition, if the gentleman from North Carolina is agreeable.

Mr. KITCHIN. We have plenty of time; we are doing nothing else; we have got nothing else to do.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, we have a whole lot to do. We are going to pass the railroad bill, contrary to the gentleman's statement, in the next three weeks, I am quite sure.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am glad you have changed your mind.

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to say that I will agree with the gentleman that we are hand in hand to do this work well, although the President told us some time ago, "Do not leave Washington; the condition of the country is so critical that I advise you to stay here," and when he started out on his speaking tour and reached Columbus, Ohio, in his first speech he said to the people, "I am delighted to meet you out in the open air; for a long time I have been chafing over confinement at Washington."

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to say to the gentleman——

Mr. FORDNEY. "Because of confinement at the Capital," and he has been here 30 days out of 9 months.

Mr. KITCHIN. As a matter of fact, did not the President scare you and you stayed here, and you have been doing nothing since? He made you stay here. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, we remained here, and we attended to business while the President went away on a political speaking tour; he said he wanted some bills passed to aid him in reducing the high cost of living. We passed the bills, and what has the administration done to lower prices? Nothing but play to the galleries. He is back now; I am sorry the poor fellow is sick, and I hope he will get well.

With reference to passing these tariff bills, the Senate Finance Committee passed a resolution the day before yesterday stating that they would not give consideration to these bills until the peace treaty, now before the Senate, is out of the way. It may be to-morrow, or it may be in January, I do not know. I hope they get it out of the way soon and then take up these bills, because every bill we have sent over there is one of great importance to our people. That is why they were sent there. My good friends, let me say to you some of the producers of steel came before the committee and protested against any duty at all on imported magnesite, saying that it would affect their industry. They have since withdrawn their opposition, saying that they would not take part in this matter. They have discovered that as it would only add the cost of a 3-cent postage stamp to a ton of steel that it is so trifling that it is inconsistent for them to oppose it, so they are now going ahead on that theory. They realize the importance of sustaining that industry here and producing magnesite at home. It is a great industry, and is one of many of our great industries. Gentlemen, if you will follow the hearings, you will find that there is no opposition, as I have said, except from this Refractories Co., the people using dead-burned magnesite and making brick, and the difference to them is that if this duty is added to the cost of the foreign magnesite it will naturally be added at the factory; and, by the way, their opposition is well founded, because they have built kilns or refractories for the manufacture of magnesite brick at Baltimore or Philadelphia—I have forgotten which; I think Baltimore—where they intend to import Austrian magnesite, and unload from the vessel right on the docks of their own factory. Now, they will be affected; but it must be remembered that after magnesite brick are once manufactured they are sent from the Atlantic seaboard inland, and that the freight ought to be added to the cost, because it will be taken from the freight on the magnesite produced on the Pacific coast. If these brick were manufactured in Illinois, much of this difference in cost of production would be wiped out. Gentlemen, I appeal to you to stand by this bill, because the rates are not quite sufficiently high, in my opinion, to offset the difference in the cost of American and Austrian products, as they appear now; but we do hope that in the near future our cost of production will go down to a greater extent than the cost of the product in Austria will be reduced, and therefore I believe that three-fourths of a cent per pound will be sufficient. An amendment will be offered by my good friend, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], to reduce the duty to $5 per ton instead of $15.

Failing to get favorable consideration of that amendment, he will offer another to reduce it to $10, and perhaps $12.50, anything under the heavens to have it reduced. Then he will vote against the bill, just as he did the other day on the dyestuffs bill. He fought tooth and nail for the licensing feature in the bill, and then when that feature of the bill was retained he voted against the bill. That is how consistent a man from North Carolina is upon a protective-tariff measure. My good Democratic friend, I pay you a high compliment. You did your level best to pull the Republican Party into your trap, and then pull the trap. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. No. I would not do anything like that.

Mr. FORDNEY. You would not do anything like that and have us know it before you accomplished your purpose.

Mr. KITCHIN. I was referring to gentlemen who had opposed the bill as un-American. I thought it was undemocratic.

Mr. FORDNEY. Some gentlemen desire that we finish the bill to-night, but I know it is getting late, and gentlemen are tired—more tired now, no doubt, than they were when I began to speak. I will suggest presently that the committee rise.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,

MY DEAR MR. FORDNEY: The accompanying report of the special committee of the British Government on "Government Organization for the Advancement of Overseas Trade and Commerce" may have interest for the deliberations of your committee.

Trusting it may prove useful,

Very truly, yours,

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE THE QUESTION OF GOVERNMENT MACHINERY FOR DEALING WITH TRADE AND COMMERCE.

TERMS OF REFERENCE.

To examine the question of Government machinery for dealing with trade and commerce, with special reference to the following suggestions:

1. That the board of trade should absorb the overseas trade department and the war trade intelligence department, and should take over from the ministry of supply and from departments such as the war office which have functions to hand over to the ministry of supply the control of raw materials held on Government account.

2. That some joint machinery, possibly of the nature of a standing interdepartmental committee of the foreign office and board of trade should be established to control the consular and commercial diplomatic services.

REPORT.

INTRODUCTORY.

1. Our terms of reference are very wide, but we understand that we are required primarily to consider the specific suggestions incorporated in them.

We regret that the issue of our report has been materially delayed owing to the absence of important witnesses in Paris.

2. With regard to the proposal that the control of the raw materials mentioned in the terms of reference should be transferred to the board of trade no difference of view has arisen; and accordingly we have given our attention to the following questions, namely, (1) the machinery for commercial purposes in foreign countries and particularly the consular service and commercial attachés, and (2) the organization at home, and particularly the relations between the foreign office, the board of trade, and the department of overseas trade.

We annex in Appendix (A) a list of witnesses heard by the committee, and in Appendix (B) a statement as to the existing government machinery for dealing with trade and commerce.

CONTROL OF CONSULAR SERVICE.

3. Dealing first with the consular service, it appears now to be agreed on all sides that this service should remain under the control of the foreign office. Consuls, although largely concerned with commercial questions, have other and most important duties to perform, and indeed are, as representatives of the British Government, the guardians of the interests of British subjects in places where no diplomatic mission is stationed. Even in relation to matters which are purely commercial the influence and prestige of the consular officer is dependent to a great extent on his connection with the diplomatic mission to which he is immediately responsible.

4. Nor do we consider it practicable permanently to place the appointment and control of consuls under one department and the supervision of their work of collecting commercial intelligence and safeguarding commercial interests under another.

The consular officers and commercial secretaries who gave evidence before the committee were unanimous in their opinion that consuls would be placed in an impossible position if they were to be appointed and controlled by the foreign office, while their commercial work, which it is hoped will in the future form the most important part of their duties, would be carried out for another department and would pass through the foreign office, if at all, only as a channel of communication. They urge that the department which appoints, pays, promotes, and controls the consuls should be in a position to take a live interest in the work which they have to do and able to appreciate it at its proper value.

There would also be an obvious danger in establishing a system under which the diplomatic and commercial representatives of this country abroad would be acting independently and sometimes in different directions.

5. The evidence on this point is overwhelming, and the necessity of leaving to the foreign office the full control of the consular service is now universally admitted. "The consular service," said Sir Auckland Geddes (president of the board of trade), "is essentially a foreign-office concern, and has so many functions in addition to trade that it would be quite wrong to put it under the board of trade."

IMPROVEMENT OF CONDITIONS OF CONSULAR SERVICE.

6. At the same time we are convinced that an enlargement of the consular staff and an improvement in its training and status are urgently required. We understand that the war cabinet has recently approved a scheme put forward by Sir Arthur Steel-Maitland, so far as it relates to the development of the consular service including the creation of new posts, training, pay, and allowances, and we recommend that the parts of this scheme which have been so approved be brought into operation as early as possible. In this connection we venture to add that while we appreciate the objection to sanctioning the payment to a particular class of civil servants of salaries free from income tax, we think that, in view of the rejection by the war cabinet of this recommendation, the scale of pay will require revision.

COMMERCIAL DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

We also recommend the cabinet to approve the recommendations contained in Sir Arthur Steel-Maitland's scheme above referred to as to the number, pay, and recruiting of commercial counselors and secretaries, but we do not consider that the proposal contained in the scheme for the amalgamation of the trade-commissioner service with the commercial diplomatic service should be adopted.

We approve the proposals contained in the same report for periodical interchange between the staffs of the department at home and the consular and commercial diplomatic services abroad.

BOARD OF TRADE ATTACHÉS.

7. We have considered a proposal made by the president of the board of trade that permanent board of trade attachés should be posted to British embassies in foreign countries, on the analogy of the existing naval and military attachés. We are unable to agree to this suggestion. We are of opinion that, as has been strongly represented to us by all the witnesses familiar with conditions in foreign capitals, it is essential that all British officials permanently stationed in foreign countries (other than those concerned entirely with purely naval and military matters) shall not only be attached to the staff of the British ambassador, but shall also be under foreign-office control. We think that any other arrangement would only produce friction and misunderstanding, and would hamper the work of such officials in their relations with the Government of the country in which they were stationed. Moreover, if board of trade attachés were to be appointed to collect and classify the commercial intelligence obtained from consuls and to survey economic conditions in the countries in which they were stationed, it would be but another instance of requiring consular officers to report to the officials of a department to which they were not responsible, and would also involve a duplication of the work which is already being done by the commercial counsellors and other members of the commercial diplomatic service.

TEMPORARY MISSIONS.

8. On the other hand, we see no objection to, and indeed every advantage in, the appointment, as occasion may raise, of temporary missions deputed by the board of trade for special purposes, such missions to be attached to and work under the British ambassadors and ministers abroad; and we understand that such an arrangement would be welcomed by the foreign office. The foreign office should be consulted as to the political expediency of any particular mission or visit and as to its personnel. Officers sent out in this way would throughout their visit keep in close touch with the embassy or legation, and would be amenable to the control of the head of the mission. It would be part of the recognized duty of the appropriate members of the diplomatic or consular staff to assist and promote the inquiries of these special agents and officials; and they would in suitable cases be given temporary rank as members of the mission.

In order to insure the adequate development of this method it is essential that the board of trade should have free discretion within fixed financial limits with regard to sending its officers or other experts abroad without having to make out a case to the treasury each time. A lump allowance should, therefore, be inscribed on the board of trade estimates for this purpose.

SELECTION AND PROMOTION COMMITTEES.

We recommend that the board of trade shall be represented on the selection committee for candidates for the consular and commercial diplomatic services and also on the promotion committees for both of these services.

LABOR ATTACHÉS.

9. We have also considered the proposal that there should be attached to the British missions in foreign countries permanent labor attachés, responsible to the minister of labor but working under the ambassador or minister.

For the reasons given above we think it is undesirable that members of the permanent staff of a mission should be made responsible to a department other than the foreign office, and it appears to us that such inquiries as the minister of labor deems necessary should be made either through members of the diplomatic staff or by means of special missions of the character above described.

CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE.

10. We think that full use should be made by the diplomatic and consular service abroad of the opportunities for consultation with British traders which are given by the formation in many foreign countries of British chambers of commerce. These chambers are generally energetic and efficient bodies, and it is obviously of importance that the spirit of combination and collective effort which has sprung from the war should be maintained and utilized in the development of our interests after the war.

DEPARTMENT OF OVERSEAS TRADE.

11. Passing now to the organization at home, we proceed to consider the proposal that the department of overseas trade should be absorbed by the board of trade. The duty of advising on the commercial policy of this country, whether at home or overseas, is clearly within the province of the minister of commerce; and there is at first sight much to attract in the proposition that such a minister should have the sole and unfettered control of a department dealing with trade abroad. Trade, wherever carried on by British subjects, is trade; and no very definite line can be drawn between the home, colonial, and foreign transactions of a British house of business.

VIEW OF BUSINESS MEN.

12. But when the proposal under discussion was put before business men, it became clear that there is in the business community of this country a strong body of opinion adverse to such a proposal.

Evidence was given on behalf of the associated chambers of commerce and the federation of British industries to the effect that business men attach great importance to being able to interest directly in foreign commercial questions that department which has power to exercise diplomatic pressure in a foreign country. It is stated that British manufacturers are badly in need of more diplomatic support abroad, that to divorce commercial from political work would be disastrous, and that traders must have direct access to the foreign office. They do not want to go to another department. They feel that it is always difficult to induce a Government department, such as the foreign office, to take the same interest in business introduced by another department, such as the board of trade, as it would take in business under its own control. They say that it frequently is only possible to obtain the desired diplomatic support by enlisting the assistance of the British minister himself in a foreign country, and that this is more likely to be obtained if the foreign office has itself been closely following the course of the business in question than if it is asked by another department to take action.

It is urged that what is really required is that the foreign office should be "commercialized," and the control of our foreign commercial policy extended to that office.

RECOMMENDATIONS BY THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

13. The arguments so put forward are pushed to their fullest limits by the foreign office, who claim not only that they should control the consular and commercial diplomatic services and the collection and classification of economic and commercial intelligence but also that they should be responsible for its issue to the public, and should be the department to which the public should look for information on foreign commercial matters. They accordingly suggest that the department of overseas trade be transferred to and become a department of the foreign office.

14. The committee are unable to approve this suggestion. Apart altogether from the position in which such an enlargement of the powers of the foreign office would place the board of trade, it appears to us that the foreign office is not properly organized for this purpose, and that in view of the many other matters which daily engage the attention of that office, and of the large influence which purely political considerations must have on its decisions, it is undesirable that it should become—as in fact it would become—a ministry of foreign commerce.

The foreign office proposal would have the further inconvenience that while the board of trade would supply to the public commercial information with regard to home trade and trade with the Dominions the public would have to go for information on trade with foreign countries to a department entirely unconnected with the board. The committee are of opinion that this severance is unsound in principle and can not be recommended.

REASONS FOR RETAINING THE OVERSEAS TRADE DEPARTMENT.

15. On the other hand, there are strong reasons, apart from the view of business men to which we have referred, which tell against the proposal to abolish the department of overseas trade or to allow it to be merged in the board of trade. It is admitted on all hands (as above mentioned) that the consular and commercial diplomatic services must remain under the foreign office; and if the department of overseas trade is to "drop its foreign office functions" and become wholly a department of the board of trade, the effect will be to revive evils which so recently as in 1917 led to the formation of that department. The link between the board of trade, on the one hand, and the foreign office and the consular and diplomatic service, on the other hand, which was then set up by agreement between the secretary of state for foreign affairs and the president of the board of trade, and received the sanction of Parliament, would be at an end. The board of trade would lose touch with the British representatives abroad and would be compelled to act in all instances through the foreign office. Delay would be caused and the old complaints would recur.

Obviously there must be a point of contact, and of close contact, between the board of trade and the foreign office. We endeavored to obtain an agreement between the permanent officials of these two departments whereby this contact should be secured without the interposition of the subsidiary department of overseas trade, but without success.

16. The arguments advanced in favor of retracing a step so recently taken are: (a) that the responsibility of the department of overseas trade to two Government departments is anomalous and inconvenient; and (b) that the department has from time to time exceeded its powers as an organization for obtaining and spreading commercial information and has trespassed on the sphere of policy. It does not appear to us that these objections have great weight. There are, no doubt, inconveniences from a departmental point of view in the double responsibility referred to; but the trade evidence founded on experience of the department was to the effect that no practical inconvenience to the public had resulted. Again, it may be that the head of the department has from time to time exercised his judgment on questions of policy; and, indeed, it would be difficult for a capable and energetic minister wholly to avoid that course, even if it were desirable that he should do so. But we are satisfied that Sir Arthur Steel-Maitland has made it his rule to refer to the proper department all questions which appeared to him to involve questions of policy; and he has regularly attended the "morning meetings" held at the board of trade for the purpose of discussing questions relating to the work of that department.

17. Apart from the above considerations, there is much to be said for retaining—at all events during the period of revival of trade—a department which has no duties other than that of fostering British trade overseas. The department has covered a field previously unoccupied, and (notwithstanding some drawbacks, to which attention will be called hereafter) has accomplished valuable work. Our evidence has shown us that it has displayed a very praiseworthy activity in the promotion and development of British trade abroad. The trade evidence from this country is to the effect that it has "made a good beginning," and that traders have become accustomed to it and are giving it support, and Sir M. de Bunsen, speaking of his experiences in his recent mission to South America, informed us that he had frequently referred to the formation of a special department for overseas trade and had found it a strong point with his hearers.

CONCLUSION.

18. The only practical conclusion which emerges from these considerations is that the department of overseas trade should continue as at present constituted, and should receive the full support of both the parent departments, and we so recommend. It will, of course, be for the board of trade to formulate the commercial policy of the country, and it will be the duty of the department of overseas trade to carry it out so far as it relates to overseas trade.

HOUSING OF THE DEPARTMENT.

19. At the same time it appears to us that the efficiency of the department of overseas trade can be increased by certain changes, and of these we put first the question of the housing of the department. The office accommodation provided has until recently been of a most unsuitable character. The headquarters of the department were in the city at 73 Basinghall Street; other sections were scattered in various other buildings in that neighborhood, while the remainder of the staff was in Kingsway and in Sunderland House, Mayfair. The offices in the city were badly overcrowded. In such conditions it was impossible to insure that close and continuous consultation between the officials of the department and between the department and the foreign office and the board of trade which is necessary in order that there shall be effective cooperation between these three departments. The headquarters of the department have within the last few weeks been transferred to Queen Anne's Gate, but this change can only be regarded as a temporary improvement and does not fulfill the condition of physical contiguity which appears to us to be in this case essential.

We are convinced that matters can never be placed upon a satisfactory footing until the department of overseas trade is housed in close contact and indeed under the same roof with the foreign office and the board of trade. We understand that the question of accommodation has already been pressed upon the cabinet, and we desire to lay stress upon the fact that it is in our opinion the most important factor in the whole of the problem which has been referred to us.

The urgency of the matter is such that it should not be allowed to wait until the general question of accommodation for the staffs of Government offices is settled, but should be dealt with forthwith.

TRANSFER OF CONSULAR AND COMMERCIAL DEPARTMENTS.

20. In the next place we think it desirable that the consular and commercial departments of the foreign office should be transferred to the department of overseas trade. We are informed that it was the intention of the foreign office to make this transfer when the department of overseas trade was set up, but that owing to the fact that the offices of that department were in the city it has hitherto been held impossible to make the transfer.

If the transfer is now made, no separate commercial branch need be set up in the foreign office, but inquiries and other matters relating to commercial questions can in most cases be dealt with in the appropriate geographical departments of that office.

21. We consider it desirable to urge that the foreign office shall take care that it is impressed upon His Majesty's ministers and consuls abroad that the department of overseas trade is in fact a part of the foreign office and that they must look to it for instructions and guidance in commercial questions. We think it necessary to emphasize this for the reason that the commercial diplomatic witnesses who have appeared before us have complained that they do not know to whom to look for instructions and that the status of the department of overseas trade is not appreciated or understood in several of the British embassies in foreign capitals.

WAR TRADE INTELLIGENCE DEPARTMENT.

22. We have considered the position of the war trade intelligence department. It is evident that the war trade intelligence department and the department of overseas trade are both engaged in collecting information of a similar character, although for different purposes, and both distribute information to the public. It would probably be convenient that the greater part of the work at present being performed by the war trade intelligence department should be transferred to the department of overseas trade, but it is possible that some part of its activities may conveniently be transferred to the economic department of the board of trade. This is a matter for adjustment.

STANDING COMMITTEE OR BOARD.

23. Lastly, it appears to us that there is great need for closer cooperation and more constant consultation between the departments concerned with overseas trade. The head of the overseas-trade department has, from time to time, attended consultations both at the board of trade and at the foreign office, but it has not been the practice of the three departments to hold constant consultations on trade matters. We think that a standing committee or board should be set up consisting of the heads of the foreign office and the board of trade, respectively (or their deputies), and the head of the department of overseas trade, with power to call into consultation the officials of other departments, such as the colonial office, and the India office, whenever necessity arises. This body should meet at regular intervals, and all questions of policy relating to overseas trade should be brought before them.

24. Certain minor points which have arisen in connection with our inquiry have been dealt with by direct communication with the departments concerned.

25. We have limited ourselves in this report to a consideration of the functions of the different departments concerned with foreign commerce, and we have not thought it our duty to consider other problems, such as the question of the enlargement of the powers of the board of trade so as to convert it into a ministry of commerce and the relationship between that board and the ministry of labor.

26. We feel greatly indebted to Mr. Pembroke Wicks (of the offices of the war cabinet), who has acted as our secretary and has given us the greatest assistance in our work.

We append a summary of our recommendations:

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS.

ABROAD.

1. That the consular service remain under the control of the foreign office (subject to Nos. 6 and 9, below).

2. That the proposals in the scheme for the reform and development of the consular and diplomatic service, other than those which relate to the trade commissioner service and labor attachés, be adopted.

3. That the board of trade be authorized, from time to time, after consultation with the foreign office, to send temporary missions for special purposes to foreign countries, such missions to be under the control of the embassy or legation concerned, and that for this purpose a sum be included yearly in the board of trade estimates.

4. That the board of trade be represented on the selection and promotion committees for the consular and commercial diplomatic service

5. That British representatives abroad be recommended to keep in touch with the British chambers of commerce formed in the countries to which they are accredited.

AT HOME.

6. That the department of overseas trade continue as at present under the joint control of the foreign office and the board of trade.

7. That the board of trade remain responsible for general commercial policy, and that it be the duty of the department of overseas trade to give effect to that policy overseas.

8. That suitable office accommodation be forthwith provided for the department of overseas trade in close proximity with the offices of the foreign office and the board of trade, and, if possible, that the three departments be housed in the same building.

9. That the consular and commercial departments of the foreign office be transferred to the department of overseas trade.

10. That the war trade intelligence department be transferred to the department of overseas trade, except as to those branches which may be more conveniently transferred to the board of trade.

11. That a standing committee or board be formed for the discussion of matters relating to overseas trade, to consist of the heads of the board of trade, foreign office, and department of overseas trade, with power to call in representatives of other departments, and that such standing committee or board meet at regular and frequent intervals.

Mr. Dudley Docker has signed the following minority report:

BRUNSWICK HOUSE, CENTRAL BUILDINGS,
Westminster, S. W., July 10, 1919.

The SECRETARY WAR CABINET.

SIR: I regret that I do not feel able to subscribe to the report of the majority of the committee. While I am in agreement with a number of their recommendations, I am of opinion that they leave unhealed the malady for which we were asked to suggest a cure.

I consider that the system of dual control of the department of overseas trade is at the root of the trouble. Any such system of dual control must be eradicated.

From my own personal knowledge, and after hearing the strong evidence put before us by the representatives of the consular service and the commercial world, I have come to the conclusion that the only remedy that I can recommend is the adoption of the principle that the foreign office must be responsible for establishing the lines upon which our foreign commercial policy should be framed. A similar conclusion was arrived at by the majority of the committee presided over recently by Lord Farringdon, upon which I had the honor to serve.

I have set out these views in the first three of the list of recommendations which I append.

The rest are practically in accord with those contained in the majority report.

I have, &c.

(Signed) F. DUDLEY DOCKER.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

1. That the work of procuring economic intelligence from all foreign countries through the commercial, diplomatic, and consular services, and of analyzing such intelligence, must be carried out by the foreign office in order to enable that department to be in a position to formulate the lines upon which our foreign trade policy should be framed.

2. That with a view to fitting the foreign office for the duties enumerated in (1) above that department must be strengthened by the absorption of the staff of the department of overseas trade, and by the introduction of a commercial man of the highest caliber, who should be given a position only second to the foreign secretary. He should be authorized to appoint such additional staff as he may consider to be necessary.

3. That the decisions of the foreign office as to the lines upon which our foreign-trade policy should be framed should be referred to the board of trade, to assist that department in formulating the general trade policy of this country.

4. That temporary missions from the board of trade should be attached, as occasion arises, to British missions abroad, to be under the control of the head of the mission, but that permanent board of trade attachés shall not be appointed.

5. That frequent and regular meetings for the discussion of business shall be held between the senior permanent officials of the foreign office, the board of trade, and the official whose appointment is recommended in 2. Such meetings to be attended by the heads of the subdepartments concerned for the business under discussion.

6. That the salaries and allowances of consular officers, which it is understood will be raised so as to yield the same amounts to the recipients as would be paid if they were free of income tax, should be made, commensurate with the greatly increased importance which their duties will assume in the future.

7. That the extension of the commercial diplomatic service be approved.

8. That the trade commissioners' service shall not be amalgamated with the commercial diplomatic service, but shall be graded equally with it.

9. That the staff of the war trade intelligence department shall be absorbed by the foreign office and the board of trade, according as the capacity of each individual officer may appear advisable.

10. That opportunity shall be provided for the frequent interchange of officials of the commerce and industries branch of the board of trade, and the corresponding departments of the foreign office; that officials of the board of trade and foreign office shall from time to time be attached to British missions in foreign countries, in order to acquire experience of economic conditions abroad, and that consular officers and members of the commercial diplomatic service shall from time to time be attached to the foreign office and board of trade in order to become familiar with the machinery of the departments at home.

11. That the scales of pay of the various grades should be similar in the board of trade and the foreign office.

12. That means should be devised whereby the knowledge and experience of British commercial men in foreign countries may be utilized by the British missions in those countries. Conversely, the knowledge and experience of business men in this country of foreign trade should be similarly utilized by the foreign office.

APPENDIX B.

Existing Government machinery for dealing with trade and commerce.

The following departments are concerned with trade and commerce:

THE BOARD OF TRADE.

It is constitutionally the function of the board of trade to advise the Government on commercial policy, and the department has been recently reorganized with a view to give special prominence to that function. It is now divided into two independent branches, namely: The commerce and industry department; the public services and control department.

The commerce and industry department of the board of trade is entirely concerned with the development of trade and with the duty of thinking out and assisting the commercial and industrial policy of the nation. It is organized in three sections:

1. The commercial department, which deals with the commercial aspect of treaties and relations with foreign countries, foreign and Dominion tariffs, and trade regulations, and all other matters relating to the protection and furtherance of British commercial and shipping interests in foreign countries and other parts of the Empire, so far as they come within the scope of the board of trade.

2. General economic department, which takes within its survey general economic conditions.

3. Industries and manufactures department, which maintains a watch over the conditions of British industry, and directs the attention of the Government and the interests concerned to weaknesses in industry, and advises the Government on requests for Government action in support of any particular trade.

FOREIGN OFFICE.

The foreign office deals with trade matters through its commercial department.

The functions of the commercial department of the foreign office are not capable of precise definition. In theory it is supposed to deal with the political aspect of commercial questions, but in practice no definite limits have been assigned to it. It has been expected to advise in a wide range of subjects of a miscellaneous character. These are set out as follows by Mr. Wellesley, the controller of the department:

1. Commercial treaty negotiations, including withdrawals and denunciations, and generally economic policy of the British Empire and foreign countries.

2. Defense and support of British commercial interests in foreign countries, in so far as they are not vested interests. This includes:

(a) Investigation of complaints of traders.
(b) Diplomatic assistance to British firms and subjects.
(c) Enforcement of commercial treaty rights.
(d) Introduction of British subjects to His Majesty's diplomatic and consular offices abroad.
(e) Commercial interests of self-governing dominions in foreign countries.
(f) Status of British companies in foreign countries.

3. Collection and distribution to other Government departments of information on the finances, trade, and industries of foreign countries, e. g., reports on bounties, subsidies, strikes, labor questions, railways, shipping, agriculture, fisheries.

4. Tariffs and their effect on British trade, changes in foreign tariffs, etc.

5. Editing of consular and commercial attaché's reports.

6. Copyright, trade-marks, and all protection of industrial property questions.

7. A variety of other matters.

The commercial department of the foreign office also acts as the channel through which commercial questions and commercial intelligence are referred by the foreign office to the board of trade.

The consular department of the foreign office controls the administration of the consular service, including the appointment, promotion, and transfer of consuls, but does not now deal with the commercial side of their work, which has been transferred to the department of overseas trade. The consular department of the foreign office is quite separate from the department of overseas trade, though nominally under the authority of the director of overseas trade, who, in his capacity as additional parliamentary undersecretary for foreign affairs, is responsible for both the commercial and consular departments of the foreign office.

The department of overseas trade is a subordinate department under the joint control of the foreign office and the board of trade. It is primarily concerned with the collection of commercial intelligence from foreign countries, in which respect it has replaced the former commercial intelligence branch of the board of trade.

It deals with the collection and distribution of commercial information as to British trade abroad and the sources of supply at home.

It supervises the commercial work of our consuls abroad, though it does not appoint or control them.

It is responsible for and controls the new commercial diplomatic service. The commercial diplomatic service consists of counsellors and commercial secretaries attached to the various British Embassies in foreign countries, who are charged with the duty of looking after British commercial interests abroad and supervising the commercial work of the consuls in their respective countries.

The department of overseas trade takes such action as may be possible to promote the development of British overseas trade, including the ordinary selling of merchandise and the establishing of enterprises in foreign countries under British leadership.

It also endeavors by advice, information, and suggestion to encourage manufacturers at home to meet the special demands of foreign markets.

The war-trade intelligence department is a subordinate branch of the ministry of blockade under the foreign office. It has been created during the war as an instrument of war for helping to enforce the blockade. It collects information for blockade purposes as to the status of traders, both abroad and in this country.

It is also responsible for the collection of commercial intelligence in the wider economic aspect in relation to the production and distribution of world supplies, as contrasted with the department of overseas trade which is concerned with such matters in their relation only to the trade development of this country.

The information obtained by the war-trade intelligence branch has frequently been communicated by it to business firms, and is at the disposal of the public except in so far as the source from which it was obtained does not prohibit this.

Since the armistice the war-trade intelligence department have also been occupied in collecting economic intelligence for the use of the British section of the supreme economic council, and are at present engaged in that work.

The ministry of shipping is concerned with trade only in relation to shipping, but inasmuch as the vigorous promotion of British trade depends on an adequate supply of tonnage and low freights, the policy pursued by that department has a close connection with the commercial development of the country, and, indeed, the ministry of shipping by its control of shipping is able in a practical way to encourage trade on particular routes and with particular countries.

No mention has been made of the ministry of blockade, the ministry of munitions, the war-trade department, the contracts department of the war office, the ministry of reconstruction, or the ministry of food, all of which have been engaged either in collecting intelligence on commercial matters or in direct trade transactions, for the reason that their functions have either been transferred to other departments or will shortly come to an end, and will not therefore form part of the permanent machinery of the Government for dealing with trade and commerce.

NOTE.—The department of overseas trade was established at the end of 1917. A committee was set up in January of that year by the secretary of state for foreign affairs and the president of the board of trade, under the chairmanship of Lord Faringdon, to inquire into the best organization for promoting our foreign trade through representatives abroad, including the consular service. The committee were unable to agree on the question whether the work of classifying and distributing foreign intelligence amongst the commercial community in this country should continue to be performed by the department of commercial intelligence of the board of trade, or should be dealt with by a department to be created by the foreign office.

In consequence of this divergence of views the department of overseas trade was set up under an agreement contained in a memorandum signed by the foreign secretary and president of the board of trade. The new department was to be subject to the joint control of the foreign office and board of trade under a new parliamentary undersecretary, who was to be responsible both to the secretary of state for foreign affairs and the president of the board of trade. For this purpose a special act of Parliament was passed, authorizing the appointment of the joint parliamentary secretary.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the gentleman concluded his remarks? If he has, I would like five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have finished my remarks, and I beg the pardon of the House for detaining the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, has the time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. There were no limitations fixed.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we have taken considerable time in the discussion of this bill, and it is proper that we have, for while the industry to which it applies is not one of the great industries of the country, yet it is a key industry, and highly important from that standpoint. In passing this bill the Republican Party gives evidence that its faith in the doctrine of protection to American industry is still lively, and that it will, as rapidly as conditions warrant, legislate along the line of a Republican protection policy touching all of the industries of the country.

We can not just at this time have a general revision, because of our lack of knowledge and information. If our Democratic friends were proposing to revise the tariff, of course it would not be necessary for them to wait on information, because they seem to do the best from their viewpoint in tariff revision when they know the least about the conditions of the industries relative to which they legislate. [Laughter.] But under the Republican system, under which we endeavor to enable American industries to thrive and prosper and grow by laying a tariff equal to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, we must have information. We do not know, of course, what another body may do with this bill or other tariff bills we have passed. That really is not our present affair. It is sufficient that we shall do our duty as we see it, and we have no doubt but that in due time, relieved from the pressure of treaty matters, the body at the other end of the Capitol will take up this legislation and dispose of it.

I did not have the pleasure of listening to all of the very interesting discourse of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], but I heard enough of it to remind me of the fact that I have not, I fear, kept him sufficiently informed with regard to what we hope and confidently expect to accomplish before the close of this session. There are quite a number of very important matters—so important that they require much time for consideration by the committees—which are now before the committees, and which will be reported to the House in the near future, and which in due time will be taken up and considered.

In order to give my friend what information I have without taking up the time of the House further, as to what we hope to accomplish before the close of the session, at least a part of what we hope to accomplish, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement of the more important legislation enacted so far at this session, and our hopes with regard to legislation for the remainder of the session. This was prepared a number of days ago and given to the press and published quite extensively, but evidently it has not come to the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina. I now ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD, with some changes necessitated by the fact that within the few days since the statement was prepared the House has passed several important bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the statement to which he has referred. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the gentleman on the fact that since my speech, an hour ago, he has prepared a very elegant program. [Laughter.] I had no idea that my speech was going to bring forth fruit so quickly. But the real reason why I reserved the right to object is to find out if in that statement of the beneficent and wise and patriotic legislation that you have passed at this session you gave the proper credit to us for our cooperation? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. There is certainly no reflection on the minority, because the statement is made simply as to the work of the Congress.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then you do not mind inserting, in the last of that statement, thanks to the Democrats for helping you do that? [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of the right to object.

Mr. MONDELL. I will be delighted to add to this statement, prepared not since the gentleman made his eloquent speech, but nearly a week ago, a statement to the effect that we are always thankful when gentlemen on the other side are near enough right to be with us. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. That is good. Mr. Chairman, in view of the very elegant statement of the gentleman, I withdraw all objection. I shall be very glad if he will put it in, because we will know then for the first time what the Republicans are going to do during the remainder of the session. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the statement submitted by Mr. MONDELL:

At the beginning of the present special session of Congress a conference of the Republican Members of the House of Representatives declared it to be the purpose of the Republican majority to proceed at once to the "orderly, thorough, and careful consideration of a constructive program of legislation," and this seems an opportune time to call attention to the progress thus far made in the carrying out of the definite promises made at that time as the first steps in that constructive program. We hope that the entire program thus far outlined and suggested may be well under way toward final completion before the close of the present extra session.

In an effort to reduce the high cost of living the House demanded and compelled the sale of surplus Army supplies, including not only foodstuffs but articles of wearing apparel, thus not only aiding in lowering living costs but ultimately bringing several hundred million dollars into the Federal Treasury. The House and Senate passed bills strengthening the food control act, extending its provisions and increasing the penalties for hoarding and profiteering. The House has just appropriated large sums to aid the Department of Justice and other departments of the Government in the enforcement of the laws against profiteering, and in the prosecution of activities intended to reduce the high cost of living. The House recently passed a bill aimed to aid in reducing living costs through the regulation of the cold-storage of foodstuffs.

We promised prompt consideration of the appropriation bills which failed of passage in the closing days of the Sixty-fifth Congress. These bills—seven in number—the consideration of which ordinarily required from three to four months were practically disposed of by the two Houses of Congress by the beginning of the fiscal year, July 1, and as they became laws effected a saving of over $900,000,000 as compared with the same bills as last considered in the closing days of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and of over $1,685,000,000 as compared with the estimates of the departments on which these bills were based. Notwithstanding this great reduction in appropriations, it is believed that every governmental activity affected was adequately provided for.

The Republican conference promised the early return of the telephone, telegraph, and cable lines to their owners. They were returned by the act approved July 11.

Early consideration of the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution extending the right of suffrage to women was promised. The resolution was approved within 15 days of the convening of the session and is now before the States for ratification.

Consideration of water-power legislation was promised. The House passed the water-power bill promptly, and it is now before the Senate for consideration.

The conference included in its program consideration of legislation providing for the leasing of public coal and oil lands. The Senate has passed legislation of this character, and it is now before the House Committee on the Public Lands and will be considered in the House at an early date.

Early consideration of tariff legislation was promised, with a view to the reduction of domestic taxation and of providing adequate protection to American labor and industries. The House has passed a bill repealing the obnoxious taxes on soft drinks, soda water, and ice cream, and bills providing for the protection necessary under present conditions for metals which our experience in the war proved vital, such as tungsten, lead, and zinc ores, as well as a bill protecting the important pearl-button industry of the country from oriental competition. The House has just passed legislation necessary to maintain the coal-tar-dye industries built up during the war, the protection of which is necessary to the public welfare. The House is now considering a bill for the protection of the magnesite industry. Further legislation for the reduction of taxes and the protection of American industries and labor is under consideration.

The conference promised measures to conserve the welfare of our returning soldiers. The Congress promptly provided more liberal provisions for the vocational training and rehabilitation of wounded soldiers and made liberal appropriations for the same. The House recently passed a comprehensive bill amending the war-risk act and liberalizing its provisions with regard to soldiers' insurance and compensation for wounds and injuries.

The House has reported, and there is now on the calendar, the national soldier-settlement act, which provides for farm homes for soldiers who take advantage of its provisions.

Early consideration of railway and transportation problems was promised. Committees of both House and Senate have long been continuously considering these questions, and the House committee in charge of the matter will report its recommendations to the House at the very earliest possible moment consistent with a thorough consideration of the tremendously important questions involved, with a view to early consideration of the measure in the House.

The consideration of a military policy and measures necessary for the earliest possible return of our soldiers was a part of the program. The sharp reductions made in the appropriations for the Military Establishment compel the speediest possible return of our soldiers consistent with our national obligations. The Military Committees of the House and Senate are considering the many problems of a permanent military policy, and the House committee will report and the House will consider the questions of this character at the earliest date consistent with careful and thorough consideration of the problems involved.

The consideration of a comprehensive merchant-marine policy was a part of the program. The committees of the House and Senate having these matters in charge have been giving diligent attention and consideration to the various phases and features of this great problem and will report within a few days and continue their labors with a view of final action at the earliest practicable date.

Budget legislation is an important part of the proposed program. Budget committees have been provided, and the intricate and important questions involved in legislation of this character are being carefully considered and will, in a few days, be placed before Congress for its consideration.

In the line of forward-looking and constructive legislation there have been reported and are now on the calendar of the House bills providing for the retirement of civil-service employees of the Government and for Federal cooperation with the States in the vocational training and rehabilitation of those injured in all lines of industry, including agricultural pursuits. These measures are scheduled for consideration as soon as they can be reached in the development of the legislative program.

This brief outline of some of the work accomplished and under way necessarily omits mention of much legislative activity and action of importance, but it is sufficient, in my opinion, to make it very evident that the House is proceeding diligently in the consideration of a constructive program and has given a most satisfactory earnest of the aim and purpose as announced by the Republican conference of legislating "with a view of aiding in restoring and sustaining normal and prosperous conditions in trade and industry and among all our people."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the day following the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles named herein, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions, the rates of duties which are herein prescribed, namely.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. FORDNEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5218) to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of magnesite ores and manufactures thereof in the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SWOPE, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. MANSFIELD, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. LITTLE, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, October 6, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.
